The 29th of December was selected by the Californians as the birth-day of their State—as a festival to be celebrated in honor of their admission to the American Union, and in this wise was the ceremonial solemnized. As the day broke upon San Francisco, the American banner augmented by an additional star, was hoisted in the centre of the town under a "federal salute" of artillery. The anchors were taken up by the ships in the harbor, and the flags of every country under the sun found its appropriate place. Then commenced the procession, which according to the sentiment of the reader, may be likened either to the tournament in Ivanhoe, or the opening pomp of a pantomime. First came the Chief Marshal in white and gold, and then his staff in sky-blue and silver. Next followed the "Mounted Californians;" who would, we are told, have been stronger had they not been disappointed in horses. They were succeeded by the "Californian Poineers," who carried a banner of white satin fringed with gold and charged with a device exhibiting a pioneer just landed, who strikes off a piece of it with his hammer, and discovers the state seal of the community underneath. From his mouth issues the exclamation "Eureka," while by his side stands a native in a genuine attitude of dismay. After these followed the Guards, commanded by Capt. Hovard; an aristocratic batallion, which appeared in new uniforms for the occasion, and attracted particular applause. The officers of the state and of the revenue filled up the interval between the military and civil portion of the procession, which was headed by a company of Englishmen under the red cross of St. George, and attended by Germans, Italians, and Spaniards. Next came the Settlers, from the Celestial Empire, arrayed in the richest brocades of the East, who carried a banner of crimson satin, on which was an inscription of great length and elaborate calligraphy, but which, when interpreted, imported nothing more pretentious than "China boys." In number they were about fifty, commanded by their own chief, and decorously obedient to his command.

At this stage of the procession was introduced the triumphal car. The spacious vehicle was drawn by six white horses, and contained thirty little boys, dressed in "white shirts, black pants and liberty caps," each representing a State of the Union while the honor of personating California was reserved to a beautiful little girl, who stood in the middle, arrayed in white satin with a wreath of roses. The car bore a motto of political significance—"The Union; it must be preserved." From the representatives of the federation, the pomp descended to the delegates of the province. The mayor and aldermen appeared in dark blue scarfs with gold trimmings and white armlets, and were followed by the police, who in this land of freedom, formed an integral part of the procession, instead of escorting it. They mustered in strong force under colors of azure satin, and with a band of their own. Next to the perils of theft in California, come those of combustion, and the "fire department" accordingly outshone all other guilds in the brilliancy of its displays. The St. Francis Hook and ladder Company appeared with their engines beautifully decorated, and bore for their device a burning building, with the motto. "We destroy to save." The 'Monuments' who succeeded them turned out six carriages, one engine: two suctions, and three hose-carriages, their colors like that of Bohemia, being white and scarlet. But the Sanson Hook and Ladder Brigade outdid them all, for while their carrages were covered with decorations, even to the hubs of the wheels, their firemen had ingeniously raised their ladders in the form of a pyramid, on the summit of which was perched a real live eagle, captured that morning at the Mission of Alderman Green. Lastly, by a true Parisian conceit, there came drawn on a car, a veritable printing press in full display, from which were thrown off copies of a laureate ode, composed by a lady for the occasion. An oration as long as a President's message, a concerted execution of the ode by the entire population, a general dance and a universal banquet, concluded the proceeding of the day

Forgetting for a moment the decorative features of this exhibition, let the reader consider the extraordinary character of the facts symbolized. Here was a community of some hundreds of thousands of souls collected from all quarters of the known world—Polynesins and Peruvians, Englishmen and Mexicans, Germans and New Englanders, Spaniards and and Chinese—all organized under old Saxon institution, and actually marching under the command of a mayor and alderman. Nor was this all, for the extemporized state had demanded and obtained its admission into the most powerful federation in the world and was recognized as a constituent part of the American Union. A third of the time which has been consumed in erecting our houses of parliament has here sufficed to create a state with a territory as large as Great Britain, a population difficult to number, and destinies which none can foresee.

THE WORLD'S FAIR.

This great exhibition, which is soon to take place in Hyde Park, London, and for which the most costly and ample preparation are now making, is an event to which no lover of mankind can be indifferent. It is one of a series of movements, the tendency of which is to merge all national distinctions into one united brotherhood. What a contrast does such a scene present to the carnage of Waterloo! How widely different the spirit which now animates the nations! Then they met as savage beasts to devour one another, but now as men associated to add each some product of art or industry to increse the general happiness. Sublime spectacle!

It is commonly said that reform begins in the lower state of society and works upward; but in this case it begins in the palaces and cabinets of power extending downward through all the industrial classes, and the humblest mechanic is invited to show, before the face of all the world, what he can do to increase the stock of general wealth. The idea of such a museum of the arts emanated from the throne of England, has been promptly endorsed by our national government, and hailed with a coreial respons from the proudest monarchs of the world. Government ships are in waiting to convey the materials for exhibition. A building, chiefly of glass and iron covering many acres, itself one of the greatest curiosities to be exhibited on the occasion, is now in course of construction to receive the producers and products of art and indnstry from all lands.

The extent of the gathering to be anticipated may be judged from the fact, that ten thousand persons are already booked at the single port of New York, for a passage across the Atlantic to attend it; and when we reflect that at Paris, Rome, Petersburgh, Constantinople, Calcutta, Canton, San Francisco, and at innumerable other points, all round the globe, a like movement may be seen towards the point of general rendezvous, the spectacle is unprecedent in it social sublimity. The Egyptian comes to compar his wheat with that of the farmers of the Baltic, the Rhine, the Clyde the, Genesee and the Mississippi. The Chinaman places his specimens of oriental art side by side with those of French ingenuity and Yankee invention The Siberian meets the digger from California to compare the latest and rarest discoveries of virgin gold. Thus all kinds of art, industry and production, are brought into contact to complete the means of human improvement and happiness; and the artisans of all lands meet to compare notes and improve their mutual skill.

What an impulse must thus be given to whatever concerns the physical well-being of mankind! Already have the arts advanced to a high degree of perfection. The humblest individuals may now command means of comfort which were once denied to the most opulent and powerful sovereigns. The palace of Diocletian, at Nicomedia, is said to have been without glass windows, an article now deemed essential to the log cabins of the West, and the golden chariot of the Roman lord, which cost him a million of dollars, was without springs, and afforded less comfort to its rider than vehicles which now may be had for fifty or a hundred dollars. But with all this infinite multiplication of the means of physical enjoyment, there are still other achievements to be made that may perhaps exceed them all. There is no conjecturing how much is implied in the command which God gave man, to "subdue the earth." What the soil may yet be forced to yield; what treasures may be exhumed from the foundation of the everlasting mountains, or raised from the ocean caverns; what uses the gases of the atmosphere, the electric fluid and the various agents of nature may be made to subserve in the cause of human advancement, health and happiness, no prophet here can foresee, no imagination can conceive.

While we are by no means indifferent to these physical aspects of this great movement, its civil, moral and religious bearings transcend them all. We do not believe with Lord Byron that "man always has been, and always will be, an unlucky rascal," but that by a comparison of views, and by intercouse, what is true and good in civil government, in moral conduct, and in religious faith and worship, will, in the end, commend itself to all as more worthy to be chosen than what is false and perpicious. This gathering at London cannot fail to be a peace measure to the nations. It will do somewhat towards teaching them to beat their swords into plough-shares and their spears into pruning hooks. It will show them how superior are the arts of peace to those of war

Steam power has already wrought a great work in this respect. It has brought remote and powerful kingdoms into contiguity. and produced between them an identity of interest that did not once exist between the provinces of the same empire. Liverpool and New York are now, commercially, nearer than Liverpool and London were in the time of the Edwardses and Henrys. The nations of Asia, Africa, Europe and America, now enjoy falilities, on intercourse unknown to provinces of the old Roman Empire. The States of Greece, with territorial limits less than those of the single State of New York, had not the means of social identity which will be enjoyed by the confederated republics which now exist, or are hereafter to be created, between the shores of the Atlantic and those of the Pacific, over an area of so many thousand miles. Boston, New York, New Orleans and San Francisco, will, in a few years, if they are not even at present, be united by more intimate and available ties, than those of London, Bristol and Sheffield, in England, a century or two ago.

It has been said that the compactness of society in Attica was owing to its limited territory; that a feeling of nationality cannot be spread over a wide extent of surface; and that like light, the social sympathies diminish with the ratio of the distance which they traverse. But steam power and the electric telegraph have obviated the force of this remark. When we know at evening what the citizens of San Francisco felt and did in the morning, why may we not sympathize with them as well as if only a river, of a mile in width, parted between us? Distance is annihilated by modern invention, and, with the causes now operating, when this nation numbers two hundren millions of people, the several local divisions of them will have a means of acquaintance equal to that enjoyed between the several parts of the inhabitants of ancient Attica or Egypt, limited as was their territory. And the same remarks apply to the intercourse of all nationts. Art and invention are rapidly converting them into one, and hastening the period when "they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree; and none shall make them afraid."

As Christians, therefore, we hail with joy these world gatherings, whether to abolish slavery, to unite the sects, to promote national peace, or to compare the products of art and industry in all lands. We hope the London fair will be the begining of a series of like character, which shall be extended through all coming time We see it suggested that one is to be held in 1852, on one of the islands in the harbor of New York, and that provision is to be made for it by the General Government. We hope it will prove true. The resources of a nation cannot be turned into a more worthy channel. It is encouraging the industrial classes, the creators of wealth; it is raising the standard of excellence in the various occupations; it is increasing the intelligence and the mutual good feeling of all nations; it is hastening the time when.

"Every man in every face Shall see a brother and a friend."

COMMUNISM IN FRANCE.—There are a set of "higher law" men and woman in France who for the last quarter of a century or more, had been preaching doctrines which strike at the very foundation of organized society. Taking their texts from Rousseau and Helvetius, and occasionally from the Bible, as they understand it, they have labored, not without effect, it would seem, to corrupt the popular heart and mislead the popular mind. Their pernicious effects are the most fatal obstacle to the prosperous establishment of republican liberty in France. The wisest and best man of that country—even those most attached to the republican form—have no faith in a people, upon whom such influences have been made to operate and bear fruit.

A Paris correspondent of the Brittania asserts, what other testimony abundantly confirms, that Communist principles, in their most hidious and abominable form—perfect community goods, even perfect community of women—have gained a firm hold of the majority of workingmen of Faubourg St. Antonine, and are spreading every day. In many of the large towns the same is the case, and even in the Departments, Communism is getting into favor, because the peasantry are told that it will lead to the distribution among them of the possession of the rich. "The truth is," says the writer, "the working classes of Paris are now Communists—are now no longer willing to be content with a few necessary reforms, but are bent on stripping the rich of all they have, and reducing every man to the same lodging the same clothing, the same food, crowning all this by the abolition of marriage. There is something so horrible in the idea of the masses in a great country being infective with such atrocious sentiments, that one would fain hope that it is untrue; but, alas, there is no reason to doubt.

The books and pamphlets now circulated among these classes are described as full "of the maddest and vilest communism." The writer quotes one of the mildest of the songs in vogue, omitting all that refers to the non-married state as too indecent for ears polite. Several stanzas, which we find in the National Inteligencer, extol in glowing terms communism. If such sentiments are becoming general in France, is it surprising that all Christian people are shy of the Republic.

"HOW SWEET THE NAME OF JESUS IS!"

TUNE—"Wayfaring Man."

1 How sweet the name of Jesus is!
It charms, above, the angel throng;
They find it fraught with heavenly bliss,
And wake their golden harps to song.

2 How sweet, on earth, the sacred name!
The seraph band, when CHRIST was born,
In melody, proclaim'd his fame,
And usher'd in the Gospel morn.

3 The shepherds caught the holy fire—
His name was wondrous sweet to them;
And glowing with a pure desire,
They sought the BABE OF BETHLEHEM.

4 How sweet the name of Jesus is!
He gives us light to point our way;
To show our feet the path of peace,
The path which leads to endless day.

5 How sweet his name to broken hearts!
His hand supplies the healing balm;
To every sin-sick soul imparts
An amulet, a sovereign charm.

6 How sweet his name to coverts dear!
His word, absolving them from sin,
Is heaven'ly rapture to their ear,
And glory, glory, all within.

7 How sweet to older saints his name!
'Tis fragrant as the dropping myrrh;
They love his glory to proclaim—
His glory to their own prefer.

8 How sweet to them his magic voice!
It speaks amid their gloomy fears,
And bids them in their hope rejoice,
Dismiss their doubts, and dry their tears.

9 How sweet to prodigals, when they—
Far wander'd—find his fold again;
The SHEPHERD sought them when astray,
O'er rock, and hill, and plain, and glen.

10 How sweet the name of Jesus is!
The dearest name to mortals known;
His love-redeeming sacrifice
For all their follies did atone!

11 How sweet the name of Jesus is!
He cures the deaf, and dumb, and blind;
And frequent fills with extacies,
The humble, waiting, godlike mind.

12 How sweet the name of Jesus is!
He calls the waried one to rest;
To find in him the sweets of grace,
And lean upon his heavenly breast.

13 How sweet the name of Jesus is!
His words of promise, fraught with love,
Assure the ransom'd they are his,
To reign, as KINGS with HIM above!

AN ALLEGORY

A humming-bird met a butterfly, and, being pleased with the beauty of its person and the glory of its wings, made an offer of perpetual friendship.

"I cannot think of it," was the reply, "as you once spurned me, and called me a drawling doll."

"Impossible!" exclaimed the humming bird; "I always entertained the highest respect for such beautiful creatures as you."

"Perhaps you do now," said the other, "but when you insulted me I was a caterpillar. So let me give you a piece of advice: Never insult the humble, as they may some day become your superiors."

The Wonderful Dove.—An Indian Tale.

[From the New York Observer.]

"Do the children of the red men, when they have ye[ars] seen the sun sink behind the western hills and smiled into the wigwams? Behold, the last red glance is upon the water, yet the brow of Sunny-Cloud reflects not its ray. And then, Talking Bird, what has happened to-day to cloud your voice? Tell me, have ye seen upon the hunting-ground the wolf to-day?"

Thus spoke the Indian mother to two dark maidens, who came and stood before her as she rested at sunset from labor.

Talking-Bird, the younger of the maidens replied:

"Nay; we were but thinking of a new-found, friend. We are sad, because he is of a race that our mother loves not. Bending-Oak is a wise squaw. Her words are mild and fearless as the south-wind over the prairie. Sunny-Cloud and Talking-Bird will tell their tale and then listen to the wise words of Bending-Oak.

"The sunbeams had not warmed the stream when we entered the canoe to go and seek medicine herbs in the great prairie far down the river. Everything was calm and glorious as the smile of the Great Spirit. Sunny-Cloud and I were very happy. We mocked the birds that sang above us, we repeated the wild legends of our tribe, and talked of all we had ever enjoyed or hoped to enjoy. So the time passed, till the moonbeams fell upon our heads, and the waters dazzled our eyes. We rowed into the shelter of a willow grove, and rested. As we sat in the canoe, listening to the low ripples of the stream, and thinking pleasant thoughts, there came a flash like lighting through the trees, then a sound quicker and sharper than thunder, and a pretty dove fell wounded into the canoe beside me. I took the poor bird, and smoothed down its feathers. It panted for one moment, and its breath was gone. Just then a tall hunter appeared under the shade of a papaw-tree. His robes were curiously fashioned, and he bore upon his shoulder a load of the choicest wild game. He was not like our chieftains; for his face was of the hue of the January snow, when the yellow sun shines upon it, and his eye was bright as the depths of the moonlit sky in summer.

"A white hunter! Why does Talking-Bird use golden words when she speaks of him?" said the aged squaw, peering into the maiden's face.

"The crows of our young men are like the wing of night; and methinks the dark forest girl should admire them more than the bleached visages of her nation's foe."

The maiden turned and averted her eyes, and Sunney-Cloud spoke in her defence.

"The pale hunter was bold and kind. He laid his burden upon the grass, and spoke to us as a brother speaks. He smiled upon Talking Bird and told her that it grieved him to have killed a warbler gentle as herself, whose voice was musical and tender, like her own."

"And did the silly Talking Bird return his smile? These were not the words of a brother, but of a foe. The rattlesnake knows but too well how to lure the mocking-bird. His cheek is bewitching, but he hath a deadly sting."

"Yet surely this was no traitor," persisted Sunney-Cloud. "He spoke of his home in a far off land, as beautiful as the hunting-grounds of our dead warriors. And he called us sisters saying that we had one Father. Then he took dazzling ornaments into our baskets, and promised, before another moon, to bring richer gifts to the wigwam."

"Have ye put the white foe on this Indian's trail?" said the squaw, angrily. "Doth the dove soar over its nest, or the glaring eye of the hawk? Bending-Oak is rightly named. She is like the [illegible] beetons from the crag across the [illegible]. A few more storms will howl [illegible], and they will fall, broken and withered, as the wolf fall from a high place. She has not seen the tree-top, and seen the tempest sweep [illegible] the valley, while others stood quietly dreamed of danger. And she can tell [illegible] daughters, that in the track of the white man, the red race hath ever been swept away [illegible] before the wintry blast. The tongue of the pale-face has two sides; one is [illegible], the other like coals of fire. If Talking Bird listens to him, her fate will be like that of the bird that fell by his fire-arrow. [illegible] taken from the great spirit, to warn [illegible]

"[illegible] Indian girls must not forget to be [illegible]," answered Talking Bird, who had been [illegible] attentive listener. "As I stood in the canoe, to turn its course down the stream, my blanket caught in a dead bough, and I fell. I could have swam to the shore, but the blanket checked me, and I clung to a weed in the deep water. But the strong hand of the white hunter, [illegible] aid, voice might never again [illegible] with the song of the youths by the wigwam fire. Surely, when he comes, we must give him venison and a shelter."

The Indian mother's heart almost yielded but the frown lingered on her brow, and she departed, muttering, "Where is the brave that once dwelt in the tent of Bending-Oak? He fell long ago in the distant wind village, and the buzzards have picked his bones. May the same fate come upon every son of the murdering race. The curse of Bending-Oak is upon the white wolf, and on all who smile upon him."

The next day the aged squaw talked with the chiefs concerning the expected intrusion into their camp, and besought them, by removing to the borders of a distant river, to evade their visitor. But the girls of the tribe had preceeded her with glowing descriptions of the treasures which the white trader would bring to offer in exchange for their furs; and curiosity and avarice, over came all her warnings and maledictions.

For the Liberia Herald.

Bassa Cove Oct. 14th 1851.

My Dear Sir,

It was over two months after the date of the redemption of your promise (as contained in the last number of the August Herald), to give me your views in reference to foreigners being permitted to possess interest in the cultivation of lands in Liberia, that it came to hand. I have unavoidably suffered more than a month to elapse (owing to the pressure of business) before responding to your views either pro or con. For which I need make no further apology, nor even for a dissent from your views (should this be the case,) because we are not strangers, and we would allow such other privileges in correspondence that would, perhaps, to others prove highly offensive.

As the word interest in your article, may be applied in the premises either in a restricted, or more extended sense,—until you define the precise limitation of your application of that word, I shall be at a loss how to express myself, whether as agreeing with you, or dissenting.

If, Sir, by foreigners, you restrict the term to white people, and by their possessing interest in the cultivation of lands in Liberia, you restrict that interest to the investment of capital in the cultivation of lands, exclusively owned by Liberians, (such Liberians as our present Constitution recognizes), and with the expectation of a refundment only through the medium of the products of the land they thus may be allowed to cultivate—an interest to this extent, though attended with some dangers as well as benefit in our infantile state, I have no inclination to oppose; perhaps I might measurably become its advocate, until such arrangement began to wear a suspicious or undermining aspect.

But, Sir, if you mean that their interest shall comprehend the owning of as much as a square inch of Liberia soil, either singly or jointly, to this I must uncompromisingly object, and think that I will firmly maintain the same opinion for many years to come, perhaps to the close of my earthly career.

I confess, that there is considerable plausibility in your remarks that the fearful apprehensions of many of our fellow citizens, that their rights &c &c. will be liable to an abatement, provided whites are permitted to reside in this country, "originate from the fact that nine tenths are from the south where they were accustomed to seeing money—power and intelligence on the side of the whites."

It is but reasonable to suppose that persons bred and born under such influences will be thus strongly impressed, (for it is an old and pretty well received saying" that a burned child will dread fire,) and I cordially agree with you—that such persons should not be ridiculed—for entertaining such notions.

But Sir, after all our speculations in the premises, it must be confessed, that there is something seriously true, in the fact, that knowledge is power,—and wealth is influence, and will always predominate over their opposites. When I speak of knowledge being power in reference to white men, I beg that you will not consider me guilty of the current blasphemy (in some countries) of ascribing intellectual superiority to them! Though immodest circulation is given to such false sentiments, by those who would ascribe or assume this superiority to themselves, and which in my humble opinion but illy accords with the refined manners and good sense of the age. Yet, let my tongue become palsied before it utters such a sentiment and my right hand perish before it pens it. I simply mean that they are in advance of us in acquired abilities, owing to well known circumstances which for centuries have given them the advantage over us.

These acquired abilities are one of the prominent causes of the mistaken idea of natural superiority, and consequently of the prejudicial distinction kept up between the two races, though living in the same country; for wealth and power are the product of acquired abilities and which distinction more or less prejudicially kept up, will never cease, until the distant and scrupulous (as to homes) seperation of the races takes place, and the African in process of time, by a development of his powers under equal advantages demonstrate his equality and susceptibilities in every respect.

But by this time i. e. when this demonstration and "Liberia which is destined (like the sun among the planets) to be the great centre of attraction to the colored race and the instrument of its exaltation in the scale of civil and religious eminence, will no doubt possess sufficient numerical power to demand and coerce that" which, reason morality and religion have failed to produce in the bosoms of their professed votaries. "True Liberty," Perfect equality."

But Sir," until true liberty and perfect equality predominate in every Anglo Saxon heart, as they do now on their tongues; there is much danger and no less folly in attempting a union of the two races in the same nation. I know you believe it to be impossible in the U. States; you are convinced that the prejudice is too strong there from north to south, and from east to west, to admit the colored man to full privileges, and perfect equality. Show me a dozen abolitionists, throughout the whole length and breath of that land, that would be willing for a colored man to be President of the U. S. or unless he was doubly below par, would consent for a colored man to marry his daughter. And if this prejudice is so universal and deep rooted, as that the religious and different fraternities of the age cannot effectually reach it, may we hope for any change shortly in the U. States, or even in the Anglo Saxon bosom of Liberia, though he became nominally or virtually a citizen.

"But Sir," please indulge me by listening to one more objection to any attempt of demalgamation of whites with us and I will have done. Though it may not seem strange to you, yet it may sound quite strange and incredible abroad, especially, to see assumed superiority. That there is as much feeling of distinction in Liberians with regard to white men and women, as ever existed in the U. States towards our race. Do you know Sir, that; that white lady has never been born in the U. States as yet, that some men in Liberia would suffer their sons to marry—nor has that continent—produced the white gentleman that some men in Liberia would give their daughters in wedlock to.

Though Liberians glory in treating all well behaved white people politely and hospitably, and disdain the betrayal of such imbecility, as setting passion so far triumphs over reason as to manifest any signs of the latent fire without cause. Yet I assure you that a majority to day in Liberia had rather see their sons and daughters smiled in coffins and deposited in the house appointed for all the living, than form a matrimonial connection with any white person the U. States ever produced.—they wish no connection of the kind; they despise it with as much—and in fact with more real indignation, than the greatest pro-savery man in South Carolina. Perhaps the truth of these assertions may be questioned abroad, but sir I appeal to you, as a resident in Liberia, and as one of her noblest sons—are they not the essence of truth—they are facts, and will remain so, as long as the prejudice of the U States exist toward our race. There is a supposition reaction of their prejudice, it is both justifiable and sufficiently reciprocal.

You must therefore see Sir, that a white persons interest in real or any other estate in Liberia must be either very limited if to exist at all.

I did purpose extending this article to a dozen or more pages out have since changed my mind—supposing that we possibly possessed a harmony of sentiment.

Yours most Respectfully,
STEPHEN. A. BENSON.

A Bassa man's traditional account of the present condition of the civilized man Kroomen and Bassa man "who were in the beginning created equal"

God after having created all things and set them in their proper order, was one day dwelling in a house he had erected for himself, and he bethought him to find some employment for man, as he was idling away his time day by day, and becoming a troublesome being to creation. So, God, early on the following day, laid off a tract of land for a farm, and set him to work. Well, the Kroman, Civilized man, and Bassa man, went out and worked faithful, in cleaning until noon, when God who had the table laid for dinner;—he had consisting of Dumboys, Palaver-sauces, Palm Butters, together with various meats dressed and cooked after the African style,—called all the men to dinner. The Bassa man came in first, took off of the Dumboys off the table, set it down on the floor, and commenced eating away with his hands, at a rapid rate.

The civilized man came in next, and taking a chair, set himself by the table and commenced eating in a very fastidious and polished manner. The Kroman coming in last, instead of going down to eat at the table or on the floor, took his station behind the chair of the civilized man as steward or waiter, and served until the civilized man got through eating.

God observing all this, at once, forever after assigned to each of the men their respective states or conditions. He bid the civilized man to go no more in the field but walk about and enjoy himself at his leisure, as best he may, or as he pleases, attended by the Krooman, who is at his biding to go fishing, hunt game and dress it. While the Bassa man is to continue to work in the fields and make Palm Oil,—in a word, do anything—and strive to make all the money he can for the civilized or white man as no attention by them—as his complexion what it may—and in any way be conducive to his interest and happiness, and he,—the Bassa man,—is to be renumerated with a small pittance for his trouble.

Thus we have their notions of the different conditions of men, accounted for.

Lib: Govt: Schr. Lark,

Off Trade Town, October 22nd, 1851.

Sir,

We have the honor to inform your Excellency, that in accordance with your instructions, we embarked on board this vessel for Trade Town on the 15th, inst: and the day after, we anchored at that place.

On the afternoon of the day of our arrival, we despatched a note, and a messenger to Prince Boyer's town, informing him of our arrival, the object of which he well knew, and requested him to come down in the morning, and the boat would be sent to the beach for him. We reminded him in our note that we had come down at his request to arrange the difficulties which had existed for years between him and Jim Flaw and that it was the wish of the Government that amicable arrangements should at once be entered into between him and Flaw. In reply to our message he sent word that some of his family were sick and he could not leave them, so as to be down on the morrow; besides he would have to consult with his Chiefs again, before he could talk about a reconciliation with Flaw, or to visit us. The day following we despatched one of the Factors residing on shore, a Liberian, to Boyer's town to ascertain how matters stood—he informed us that Boyer's excuse was groundless—that a brother of B's was ailing, but not dangerously so. Boyer learned from this Factor that we had brought a fine suit of clothes as a present for him, which would be given to him when he came on board the vessel—on this information he sent us word, that he would be at the beach the next morning, and if we would meet him there he would accompany us on board. Early next morning we landed and found him waiting for us. We reiterated the object of our mission, and reminded him of his request and promise made last April: and that we had been sent down agreeably to his wishes—all which he readily agreed were true; but he said, himself and Flaw had agreed to settle their palaver according to their country usage. We said to him that the Government would have had no objection to their doing so; and that course would have saved considerable expense and trouble to the government—but as they had not agreed on the terms of future good understanding, and as James Flaw, his antagonist, still desired the interposition of the Liberian Authorities—the Government had determined to maintain peace in the country, at all hazards, with or without his consent.—We persuaded him to go on board with us, where James Flaw would meet him, and in a couple of hours the difficulties would doubtless be arranged to the satisfaction of all parties. He tried to excuse himself from going on board, saying, he had not brought with him his official habiliments and was therefore not prepared to visit the vessel. He said the difficulty between him and Flaw, could be easily settled, as he only required Flaw to give him five articles amounting to about fifty dollars—which articles, he insisted, must come from James Flaw and from no other person. We said to him that he and Flaw were Chiefs and relatives—that they had been fighting each other three years, and neither had conquered that their case had never been adjudicated, to determine who was in fault; and for this reason an interview was necessary to determine, which of them had a right to ask for reparation; and we further said to him, that his refusing to meet Flaw in presence of the Commissioners, was a strong argument that his cause was a bad one and if he persisted in refusing to have the difficulties settled, there could be only one opinion of him and his cause; which was directly against him. We told him, we had no time to spend unnecessarily he must tell us in plain words what he intended to do; and if he still remained opposed to a reconciliation, the Government would not hold any further communication with him; but would take measures to have justice done in the premises, and in future would recognize Jim Flaw as the principal Chief of Trade Town, acting under its authority. And if he Boyer, again attempted hostilities in the country he would be severely chastised. Boyer then said if such was the determination of the government he would remain at the factory of Mr. Lawrence, on the beach, until the next day, and if we would send him the suit of clothes, he would come on board. This promise he repeated several times. We returned to the vessel and sent the suit of clothes to him. The moment he received them, he left for his town. Having waited till noon the following day, for him to come off, we despatched another messenger with a note to him—his reply was, that he did not intend to come on board—that he had told us what he required of James Flaw and if we would get them from Flaw, he would agree to make peace—and that it was useless for us to send any more messages to, or after him until that was done, as he did not intend to leave his town. On the morning of the same day James Flaw came on board as we had requested him—he came five miles by sea and spent the day and night on board waiting for Boyer, in which time, we had much conversation with him; and we found him not only intelligent but apparently well disposed. It appeared he had often the better of Boyer in the wars so far, and would have possibly driven him out of the country had not hostilities ceased in obedience to your orders in April. "Since when, tho' the contrary had been reported by others, there have been no outbreak of hostilities—for tho' Boyer had threatened, his heart failed him. James Flaw wishes to be distinctly understood; that he has given the entire matter into the hands of the Government of Liberia, and will cheerfully abide my decision, the Commissioners would make after hearing the statements of both parties. He further told us, that he came on board because we had invited him to do so: but he was certain Boyer would not come to an interview. He said Boyer," had been sending him secret messages; and had been geting others to exert their influence with him, since the understanding last April not to allow the Liberian Government to have any thing to do with the settlement of the difference between them, and tried to instil, into him James Flaw, preindices against the Liberians. He further said, that the instigators of Boyer were foreignors, (he would not call their names) but would show us a note that he had received, from which, any reasonable man, could draw pretty correct conclusions. We read the note and the following is a true copy.

Trade Town, Sept. 27th, 1851.

Mr. Murray, Sir.

I am desired by king Boyer to inform you, that I have had a letter from Mr Lawrence calling him down to inform him the Americans are coming here to settle the palaver between him and James Flaw; but he will not allow them to interfere and he hopes that Jim Flaw neither will, but he says he will leave it entirely to you and Mr. Lawrence, who has gone to Cape Monsterado, but will return in a few days.

I remain most Respectfully.

James Travis

This Mr. Murray is the well known Capt: David Murray, the avowed enemy of Liberia—and James Travis, the writer, is a white Englishman serving as clerk for Mr. Lawrence at Trade Town—the letter refered to, by this Travis as having been received by him from Mr. Lawrance, was written by Mr. L. while at Bassa, on his way to Monrovia—the Lark was then lying at Bassa waiting to take the commissioners down. Mr. Lawrence at that time told Hon: H. Teage and Capt: Cooper, that no one but himself could settle the misunderstanding between Boyer and Flaw—that if the Lark went down, she would go to no purpose. Mr. Lawrence may be clear of exerting an opposing influence to the authority and intention of Government. He do not presume to condemn him, but as these facts, so corroborative, have come to our knowledge, we deem it our duty to make them known to you. Mr. Lawrence we hope can and will throw some satisfactory light upon them. Your Commissioners have been treated very kindly by Mr. Lawrence, especially at his establishment at this place, during the prosecution of our mission.

James Flaw informed us, that notwithstanding the many efforts made to with draw him from the authority of the Liberian Government, and to disaffect him towards it, he is determined to keep to the arrangement made last April: and if the government did not have the difficulties settled, or could not do so, he would renew hostilities. We said he knew why Boyer prefered the interference of foreignors. First because he know his cause is bad, and if justice was awarded him, he would be obliged to pay very heavily; and he knew the Liberians would decide in consonance with justice—but foreign traders are guided only by their commercial interest, and would be governed in their decision accordingly—and which he Flaw, would NEVER NEVER, NEVER, submit to. And secondly, if Liberians decided the difficulty they would bind Boyer to future good behavior—and compel him to strict observance of his agreement. Boyer, he said, is not fond of keeping his word, or standing to his engagements—he is like Grando, who lived at Bassa Cove.

James Flaw after having remained on board the "Lark" a day and a night returned home—before leaving, he signed an agreement, which it was hoped Boyer would also have signed in which he pledges himself, for himself and people to submit all their difficulties to this government. He beged the Commissioners to see that he would not be permitted to remain much longer in suspense—that he considered his hands tied, and must remain idle, unless it became necessary to act in self-defence—that his people were obliged to confine themselves at home—they could not go about the country, and hoped the President of Liberia would adopt speedy measures to compel Boyer to reasonable measures. He requested us to say; that you may consider himself and subjects, and the entire country at your command, to assist in carrying out any order you may desire.

The following day Capt: Pannel arrived at Trade Town in the English cutter "Zepher," also a Liberian vessel from Bassa. We had concluded if Boyer continued to presist in his obstinacy, the Liberian factories had better be removed from his place, as a mark of indignation at his unprincipled conduct; consequently every thing was shipped off while the "Lark" was present. Meanwhile we thought we would make another effort, by writing to Boyer, and giving him more fully to understand the degree of indignance we viewed his conduct, and the displeasure he would incur from our government—First, that no Liberian vessel would land any thing at his place until he changed his course, that our Government would perhaps stop further intercourse at his place by foreignors, until he gave satisfaction—that likely his folly in listening to foreign traders would terminate in the appointment and recognization by government of James Flaw as Chief of the entire Trade Town Country—that our Government was determined to maintain peace among his and every other tribe within Liberia; and tho' much patience had been and would be exercised towards them, owing to their ignorance, yet the severest measures would be resorted to, if pacific ones failed. We reminded him, how many chiefs had foolishly suffered themselves to be thus imposed on by unprincipled foreignors, and who could render them no assistance when trouble come on them.

We refered to the New Mess war of 1849, for the extirpation of slavers. A fact which he was cognizant of—and that the obstinacy of the natives and Spanish slavers against all persuasions and remonstrances of our government, originated principally with foreignors, whom we could name—but he knew the fact—he remembered that foreigners told him that Liberians had no right to drive those parties out of the country, and if they had the right they had not the power. We reminded him of foreignors having encouraged Grando, to resist the authority of our Government and to violate our laws—that they wrote letters of the most disgraceful and abusive character for Grando, while the English Commodor were lying in the harbour of Grand Bassa; but when trouble came on Grando, these foreignors could not be found, or they were unable to render him any assistance; and with these facts before him, why should he permit himself to be wrongfully misled. Upon the receipt of this note and message, Boyer came to the beach, with the intention, he said, of doing right—he desired to see one of us on shore, and he would come on board—we sent him word that he had so often deceived us, that we could not confide in him; but if he would now come off, we would overlook his past conduct. In about an hour after this, Capt: Pannel went on shore (perhaps was sent for by Boyer)—a Liberian factor on shore informed us that this Capt: P. and Boyer had a private interview immediately which continued most of the two hours he was on shore; and as soon as Capt: P. left for his vessel Boyer left also declaring he would never come on board, and it was nonsense to send for him any more, as he was done talking on the subject. Under these circumstances we concluded to leave for home; but before doing so, we sent letters on shore to the British traders at Trade Town, which we hope will meet your approbation.

Here is the copy of the letter.

Dear Sir,

As Commissioners appointed by the Government of Liberia to reconcile the two beligerent Chiefs, Boyer, and James Flaw of Trade Town, who have been engaged in a state of war for some years to the great danger of the property, if not lives of both foreigners and Liberia traders, we are sorry to say, that owing to an opposing influence to our efforts, they have as yet proved ineffectual with one of the parties, in whose dominions as a petty chief you reside as factor, in person or by representative. We are also sorry to say, that from all we can gather this opposing influence originates from sources which have a right to ask protection and perhaps redress of the Government of Liberia, in the event of an aggression being committed on your persons or property by either of the belligerents.

Yours Respectfully

S. A. BENSON
J. HANSON

Commissioners

In concluding our report we beg to say that unless something be done to prevent foreign traders from interfering in matters that are belonging to this Government and from trying to lessen our influence with the natives by an unwarrantable expenditure of their owners' property, we will succeed but illy in suppressing the wonted cruelties & other evils existing among the natives of Liberia, without a resort to forcible measures that are equally revolting to the feelings of Liberians—Americans and Europeans—It appear to us plainly that the object is to make the impression abroad that they possess more influence along the coast than Liberians and consequently as they have to settle war, and have to make peace for the security of their property, the Liberians should not exact duties &c, &c, of them. In fact Capt Pannel had the frankness to say to us, in presence of Capt Cooper, that he was instructed to collect all the information he could that would operate detrimentally to Liberia.

We have the honour to be your Excellency's ob. servt.

Commissioners

Remarks.—Our readers, will, we hope pardon us, for giving so much space in our present number to the report of Judge Benson and Hon. J. Hanson of their mission to Trade Town. Indeed not to give the report entire, would be an act of injustice to the people—the people should know, and understand all the relations which exist between this government, and the African tribes residing within its jurisdiction, for it is to them the government look, to uphold and maintain its authority and dignity.

We have given the report an impartial consideration; and it is with regret, that we are obliged to coincide with the Commissioners in all their feelings—in all their disappointments and the recommendations they have thought it their duty, to make in view of all the circumstances. We applaud the Commissioners for the patience they exercised in their intercourse with Prince Boyer, and as strongly do we stamp the seal of reprobation on his insincerity and dishonesty. Prince James Flor is a man of a different character from Boyer—tho' a younger man, he is decidedly more deserving of notice than Boyer. We know these men; and we assure our readers, that our knowledge of the latter will place him in a very unfavourable position. He is deceitful, unfaithful to his engagements; and will put himself not to the slightest inconvenience to gain an honest reputation. Proclaiming himself a mighty Chief he defies the world, until the appearance of the least danger near his strong hold—then, he is as submissive and docile as one could wish.

With his own people, and strangers who may accidentally fall in his power, he is the greatest tyrant imaginable—his ignorance and cruelties are the theme of every African who are acquainted with him. Whilst Boyer is feared and hated, James Flor is respected, and admired for the consisteney of his character, and for his friendly feeling to all who are acquainted withhim.

We fully agree with the Commissioners that Boyer should be punished—and we advise the less expensive mode of doing it—and that is, to prevent all intercourse with him and his people by sea—let the prohibition extend alike to foreigner and Liberians, and if we have not greatly misjudged him in a few months he will crave for a hearing, which he now, so insolently persists in declining.

In April last, Boyer and Flor agreed to leave the settlement of their difficulties with this Government. The President sent a Commission down to them in the hope of restoring peace to the country, neither Chief then, seemed indisposed to a reconciliation of the differences; and a definite period was agreed upon by them and the Commissioners for a final hearing of the matter; —and until then, hostilities would be suspended—the time named for this meeting has just passed, and according to the promise of the Commissioners in the "Lark" was sent down; on board of which the interview between the chieftains were to take place. The report of the Commissioners will show how the pacific intentions of government were frustrated.

It is with deep regret that we are compelled to believe that foreign traders, still exert themselves to create difficulties between the native Chiefs and the Government of Liberia. What advantage they propose to derive from such a course, it is difficult for us to imagine; unless indeed, they wish to throw off every restraint of civilization, and follow the forms and fashions of the untutored aborigines. We know, that this mode is prefered by some of them, but we did not choose to believe, that for the gratification of an unbridled licentiousness, they would venture to create insubordination among the natives over whom, the government exercises jurisdiction. We have frequently called the attention of our readers to the ill-behavior of a few foreign traders on our coast—again and again have we warned them to attend to the business which brought them to our coast, and to cease their meddling with the domestic arrangements of our government. We had hoped that they would, in future, demean themselves as peaceful visitors should do; and not give the Authorities cause to arrest and bring them before our courts on charges for sedition. This course, we now believe will have to be adopted before unprincipled men will learn the truth, that authority exists in Liberia for the punishment of every grade of crime.

It is but an act of justice to the respectable foreigners who trade on our coast, to say, that David Murray, and the masters of vessels under his direction—the Mr Pannel refered to in the Commissioners report included, are the persons our observations are intended to refer to. It is true that Mr. William Lawrence now appears to be somewhat mixed up with the difficulties at Trade Town. Hitherto he has kept himself free from all charges; and if he has changed from the correct principles which we have invariably given him credit for, and falling in with the factious movements of Capt Murray and his followers—then we admit we are greatly disappointed. We hope Mr. Lawrence will clear himself from the imputation of wrong doing. We have always entertained the best of feelings for him and we are unwilling to believe he will be guilty of exerting an injurious influence among the natives, the appearances are somewhat against him.—HERALD.

For the "Liberia Herald"

God uses His own Means.

A few weeks since, a native of Grand Colah dreamed, that he saw the All-wise Being standing before him, and said to him, go and tell all the Chiefs of the country, "that they must not labor on the Sabbath day, nor must they permit their people to do so." The dreamer seemed deeply affected at the command and concluded to go and give the message. He did so—and it affords me great pleasure to say, that the King and Chiefs immediately ordered the people to refrain from any and every labor on the Sabbath hole. And that their should be no mistake in the day; sticks or small peices of boards were prepared, with seven holes in them, and to each peice a round stick was attached, so that at the end of every day, the small stick would be removed into the next hole, and on the Sabbath day—the stick woul reach the seventh day. Not only the natives of Grand Colah, but the inhabitants of the adjoining countries are adopting this plan; and I verily belive that in a very short time hence, none of the natives will be willing to trade, or otherwise violate the Sabbath day. Would it not be advisable at this time to send a teacher or preacher among these people—it might have a salutary effect. Indeed, the way seems open for religious instruction; and no other time, likely, would be as opportune as the present.

I do not think it necessary to say more. I have plainly stated facts as they have come to the knowledge of myself and others. Nor do I wish to be understood as believing in dreams. I only report what I have been told, and what I have seen.

Yours very Respectfully,

J. T. RICHARDSON,

"Watchmen, Watchmen, what of the Night."

Mr. Herald.—Will you be so kind as to inform us, and the world at large, what the missionaries are doing towards civilizing and christianizing the benighted heathen within the boundaries of the Republic of Liberia; and what are they doing towards the general spread of the glorious news of salvation by Jesus Christ, the Savior of the world. Before I further proceed, permit me to offer an apology to you for making these inquiries, now sir, as it is generally thought that editors and news papers know a little of every thing that is going on in the civilized world, and that they take cognizance of all that is doing, and conceives it to be their most imperative duty to Herald the same when necessary for general information, is I hope sufficient reason for the present inquiry, do you conceive it to be the most imperative duty of the christian missionary to stand off from worldly affairs; or to be engaged in those matters which has a tendency to lower the gospel standard; which will have a very deleterious effect upon that cause; namely the Redeemer's, the best of all causes. Now sir, the grand reason that I assign for thus troubling you is this, I see the missionary fields left unoccupied. Notwithstanding it is so very inviting to all the true heralds of salvation. While you will see missionaries whose duty and heavenly calling it is to hold up the glorious light of salvation to a lost and perishing world; moorsed in merchandizing. Now Mr. Herald as it is well known that your judgement about matters and things of the kind, what they become merchants subject themselves to when their interests makes urgent demand? It seems to be a general thing now of days to find the most efficient merchant, a missionary. All that seems to be necessary is, first to be sure and procure a missionary situation and you are a made merchant at once. Oh! what a shame: Oh! what a shame. When thousands of precious souls, for whom Christ spilt his most precious blood; are posting their way down to eternal night.

While the Missionaries are contending for that meat which perishes in the use thereof, I make bold to assert that there are more native converts by far, to be found in the families of the colonist of Liberia than can be found at all the Liberia missionary stations, Cape Palmas not taken in: the account, as we do not know, what is doing there: our churches are crowded with native converts that were raised in the families of our good christian folks.—If this should be questioned by any one, here or else where, just let them visit the different families in the Republic, and count the native converts brought up by the christian people of this commonwealth, and then let the account those, if any at the missionary station they will see at once that the missionary done little or nothing for the salvation of Africa's lost sons and daughters, not that good cannot be done by the missionary system, but let there be proper mens, and suitable mens;—men, that love souls, not then they do, money then, and until that, all there be much good done for souls that are more precious than gold or silver, don't let any one adhere to those fine, and be most high sounding letters that are sent to America &c. &c. but come and see. I will now close these remarks for the present, by begging a place in your present number for what has been seen by me sir, to be Your most Ob't Serv't.

"ONE LORD, ONE FAITH, ONE BAPTISM."

The fulfilment of the Scriptures are being verified every day. On last Lord's day our Methodist brethren, with, solemnity, moved off from their house of worship to the Messurado River, for the purpose of baptising, according to the apostolic mode, four persons, who had made a profession of faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, who felt it to be their duty to be buried with their Lord by baptism. I believe Mr. H. that the day is not distant, when all true christian will meet each other on one common platform, and when the watchman upon the walls of Zion will see eye to eye, and when there shall not be ajarring note in the assembly of the saints, but all will unite their efforts to fight their one common enemy.

Mr. Herald you will confer a favor to give this a place in you present number and oblige your most obt, servant.

Mr. Herald.

It seems I committed a great wrong in sending for your paper the proceedings of the last Court of Quarter Sessions—at least, so far as reference was made to N. M. Hick's insolvency. A writer above the name of "Gonzago," came out in your last number, calling my note to you "a dirty piece," and saying a great many things which to many of your readers, are incomprehensible—altogether, we must view his communication as being the greatest production of Billingsgate slang that ever appeared in your paper. We did not know that you permitted such stuff in your columns. No one can be at a loss to know who "Gonzago" is, there is not another person in all Liberia who could write such nonsence for publication. It was the production of the insolvent. But the offence charged upon me is, that I said he was guilty of swindling transactions. If he thought it necessary to come out against me at all—why did he not defend himself from the charge? He has not dared to attempt a defence. Instead of being called a swindler a word of six letters would more truly indicate his true character. I reiterate the charge then made—that by his confessions in open Court he has for the last seven years, been systematically at work swindling every body he could; and by not vindicating his character, the charge remains to all intents and purposes true; Gonzago says "he knows me well, we have been too intimate &c. &c.—and that I am soured because he did not consult with me." I think he is in the wrong about knowing me--he has entirely mistaken me, or his insinuations are not understood by me—but it is well for my purpose that he has thus unfolded himself. he shows himself in his proper character, that of an ungreatful and unprincipled creature. He intended his nonsence for the man who have always stood his friend, and by his own admission to number of persons "when others would not satisfy his necessary wants, no, not even those he called his family connections."—The person he would now abuse and slander, has been obliged to account for thousands of dollars he expended of property confided to his charge, and now, the only return he is to receive, is abuse and villification. If the man had a consience or the least spark of honesty about him, he would show some contrition for the manner he has gilded those who tried to support him—and for his base ingratitude, if he does not meet with deserved punishment in this life, he may rest assured that a heavy reckoning will be required of him at the bar, before which all our actions will be scrutinised. It would have been well if he had long ere this, consulted with others, if he had, likely, there might be some favorable parts in his case. I do not think, he has shown any good sense in such an observation. I would like to know what kind of intimacy could exist between him and me—surely not such as exists between men of honor. If I have, in the absence of approved society, contented myself with the company of a buffoon, well I plead guilty and I fear many others will make the same confession.

But I have held caucus meetings to talk about Mr. Hick's affairs,—every body knows the man is insolently presumptious but I ask every body what affairs can he have to make it necessary for a caucus meeting. He is very much mistaken if he thinks I have been to any such meeting and, if he will let me know who told him so, I will soon prove that such was never the case. I don't believe any one told him that such was the case.

I wish it understood, that I do not hold it any disgrace for a man to surrender his effects for the payments of his debts. In many cases it is an honorable course. The law justly comes forward to the relief of a struggling honest man when he has been unfortunate in his business—he surrenders his books and papers, and from them his creditors learn how he has expended his funds—such a man is honorably acquitted from fraudulent attempts; and he readily meets with friends, who will assist him to venture out anew. Such is not the case in Mr. Hick's business, can he show how he has disbursed the large sums of money he has got from his creditors? No! nothing of the kind, and tho' the subject of his swindlings are the theme of every body, he meets the charges with insolence and a kind of boasting indifference. He must not lay "the flattering unction to his soul" that his estate will pay one thousand dollars, such is now ascertained not to be the case—if it pays seven hundred dollars it is the utmost. I did not intend to have referred to Mr. 's affairs after the sketch of the proceedings of court, but as he is ready to fight about that, he must take all that follows. It is thought by some that he has one lot too many in the schedule he has sworn to, if such be really the case, another topic may engage the attention of the next court, that will hold him rather hard. I would advise the trustee to examine and see if, there is a deed for the lot in rear of the dwelling before he sells it. In my next; I will give you the names of the creditors—the items set forth in their accounts—the many articles procured for vessels of war and naval officers, for which payments have not been made—and of the description of persons all such things were obtained—indeed one can hardly conceive what was the doings of this man with others' property.

Yours.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, NOVEMBER 5th 1851.

By the return of the Liberia Packet, Capt. Howe from the leeward Counties, we have received advices from the counties of Grand Bassa and Sinoe. The immigrants in these counties have all nearly passed through the acclimating process—and they are well contented. The majority have drawn, and improved their lands.

The rice farms in Grand Bassa yielded bountifully We regret such is not the case in Sinoe; and the inhabitants, the past season have severely felt the want of breadstuffs. We hope the people of this otherwise, flourishing county, will in future give more of their attention to the cultivation of the staple of life. The visitor from other counties, on landing at Sinoe will be astonished at the rapid improvements continually going on in the town of Greenville. Indeed scarcely a week passes, but one or more houses are commenced to be built.

The Legislature

The time is fast approaching for the meeting of the Legislature. The first Monday in December the session will commence; and it is the duty of the people of Liberia to come together,—to discuss subjects—to review the state of their country; and to frame such petitions as are important for the consideration of that body. The fact of their being a Legislature of Liberia whose duty it is to make laws, does not necessarily imply, that, that body should be acquainted with all the wants of the country. The members of the Legislature, tho' they may give more of their time to the state of the country, than others, have in a great measure a right to look to their constituents for their opinion and recommendation. When the people fail, thus to enlighten their representatives—or to instruct them as to their wishes, they have no right to complain if they do not do all they wish, or expected they would have done. It is a wrong idea to suppose that legislators should know every thing; and more so now, when it appears that the only qualification for a seat in that body, is when one has a flippancy of speech and can go hand in hand with all sorts of characters. We know that great importance is attached by many, to the qualifications of the President; and when matters not easily comprehended by the legislators are on the carpet, they are certain to have things done right by him or through his influence. We respectfully ask of all, is this the kind of independence the people of Liberia bargained for? Is their interests secure when the legislators of the country find themselves incompetent to perform the duties of their office? We admit that there are a few members in the Legislature of pure minds and inclined to do what is right—but is there a sufficiency of this kind to overule he narrow opinions of the other class? It is a matter of considerable doubt in our mind if such is the case; and hence we fearfully pen these lines.

Liberia is yet in her infancy, and for years to come will require judicious management to keep her in proper trim, the idea is most simple, to suppose, that our acknowledgment by civilivzed powers takes from us all responsibility—such indeed, is far from being the case. The moment the people of Liberia threw off their vassalage, and assumed an independent position, and became one of the family of nations, they took upon themselves new duties and weightier responsibilities. The Government of Liberia are not only responsible to their constituents for an improper administration of affairs; but they are responsible to the nations of the world—and hence the great necessity, that our rulers should be men of sound discretion, able to discriminate between right and wrong; and to understand the relations which exists between this government and the government of other nations.

The immigrants by the Liberia Packet are going through there acclimation finely. Nearly all of them, have had a touch of the fever; and they are now convalescent. From the opinion of others, we think their will not be a death out of the company.

The immigrants by the "Alida" from New Orleans are sorry to say, are far from being healthy. Our readers may remember, that they were landed here under very unfavorable circumstances. Fifty eight of the company of that vessel had the small pox while on board, and tho' come landed here, actually had the disease, it was the opinion of all, that it was brought on shore in their baggage, or pent up in them.

Cape Palmas.

We have recently received intelligence from Cape Palmas, and we are pleased to hear, that affairs are going on smoothly under the administration of S. F. McGill, A. D. who is at present the Acting Governor.

It may not be premature to say, that intimations have reached us, that at an early day, the people of that interesting colony will be asking to be admitted into the Liberian Republic. Every Liberian long since knew in the natural course of things, such would inevitably be the course that people would be led to pursue, and no doubt, they are prepared to listen favorably to the petition whenever it comes, if the principles upon which the arrangements are sought to be made be honorable and in consonance with the present organization of our government. At another time we intend to make further remark in connection with the subject.

THE BATTLE OF LIFE.

We have often been impressed by the deep significance of the phrase which Dickens has given as a title to one of his Christmas stories, "The Battle of Life." It is full of solemn meanings. All our hours, from the cradle to the grave, are but a series of antagonisms—Hunger, fatigue, sickness, temptation, sin, remorse, sorrow—these are the strong powers with which we must wage continual war. Foes beset us from without and from within, and make life one long and earnest battle. But there are victories to be won on the field, more glorious than those which crimsoned Marathon and Waterloo. Evil habits may be subdued—fiery passions brought under the control of principle—temptations resisted—self denial cheerfully sustained, and life itself consecrated to high and holy purposes. To triumph over the infirmities of a perverted nature, and render life, once deformed by passion and stained by sin, beautiful with love made manifest in deeds of beneficence, is worthier, our ambition than all the bloodwrought heroisms that ever linked a name to a world's remembrance. Every day witnesseth triumphs such as these—yet fame proclaims them not. What matters it? In the serene depths of these all-conquering spirits, God's peace abides, and harmonies so heard, such as the angels make when they welcome the victorious souls from the conflicts of this, to the raptures of the heavenly world.—Exchange.

"LLOYDS"

"Lloyds"—a word often met in English newspapers—is a great company of underwriters, whose agents are located all over the commercial world. It is expected of the agents of Lloyds that they ascertain the workmanship of all vessels when upon the stocks—the injuries they receive in the course of their voyages—the nature of the repairs put upon them—their sailing properties, &c. &c. and transmit all the particulars to the company in England.

The accuracy and vigilance of these agents have been matter of surprise to American and other ship masters; for it is said that the condition and properties of U. S. ships are as accurately understood in London as in Boston or New York. A Yankee shipmaster, making application at Lloyds' for insurance upon his vessel, observed the stone officer referred at once to what proved to be a great alphabetical register, in which were recorded the names and other memoranda regarding thousands and thousands of vessels, arranged under all the classes peculiar to that establishment, from "A. 1. red letter," down to the lowest insurable class. In due time the Yankee was informed that his insurance would be so and so, (naming the terms;) that although once worthy to stand as "A. 1." his vessel had worked into lower classes; that when she ran aground at such a place, she received greater damage than the owners were perhaps aware; and that the repairs put upon her when she was got off were not adequate to the injury she received, &c. &c. The surprise of the Yankee captain, in the language of romance writers, was easier imagined than described. He found they knew more of his vessel than he did himself.

POETRY.

ORIGINAL

The Friend's Meeting

I've stood beneath the georgeous dome,
Of many a structure fair;
And bent me reverently, to hear
The voice of praise and prayer.

I've caught the low, sweet music,
Breathed at dawn, and vesper times;
And dreamed, as incense floated up;
Of soft Italia's clime.

Of andeluvian maids, who kneel,
Where'er the convent bell,
Floats o'er their native vallies sweet:
Or quiet mount and dell.

I've harkened oft, to those who told
Of God's unfading love;
And earnest strove to point men up,
Up, to the realms above.

While dark and terrible, they made
The sinner's doom appear;
And warned him of a precipice;
His feet were lingering near.

Yes, yes, I've drank the words of each;
Yet, where my foot-steps trod,
The gay and costly deckings,
Spoke more of frail man, than God.

And never, to my heart these came,
In those fair temples, aught,
Which the world unmingled was;
Or vain, and idle thought.

But in a simple structure,
Where the Friends, like one fair race,
Meet to worship God most nigh!
I took my quiet place.

No voice, no language bold and free
Swept through the [illegible];
No music broke the silence deep;
But like Angels smiles,

[illegible], flickering through the pane,
[illegible]
[illegible] love, to fold
[illegible] for this grace.

Then, oh, when Heavenly silence reigned
A woman's tones were heard;
Clear as a [illegible] let's ringing notes;
Or wood of a bird—

And then a vain wild dream I'd known
Those days visions fled!
Like night's dark shadows, when
The light, of early dawn is shed.

Gently the stirring accents fell,
And fluted on the ear;
And deep within my heart, joined
God's spirit, [illegible] there.

When meek eyed woman strove with man;
To counsel, and speak the love;
That's freely poured on mortal hearts,
From glorious climes above.

An humble Inquirer after Truth.

The Bright Lone Star in the Field of the Blue.

This is our Motto, "The love of liberty brought us here."
And out the infant Colony a mighty State we'll rear.
O there's brotherhood, there's brotherhood in the hearts that are true,
That's united to the bright lone star in the field of the blue.

We shall not relate a long history, or sing much song,
But to one thing we will pledge ourselves, the notes to prolong,
Oh! there's brotherhood, there's brotherhood in the hearts that are true,
That's united to the bright lone-star in the field of the blue.

'Tis enough, that here we've a home, a country and a name,
Where only independant people are permited to reign
Oh! there's brotherhood, there's brotherhood in the hearts that are true,
Tha's united to the bright lone star in the field of the blue.

Then one and all to the flag, to the flag come far and near,
While beneath its ample folds unfurled, whom shall we fear?
Oh! there's brotherhood, there's brotherhood in the hearts that are true,
That's united to the bright lone star in the field of the blue

Virtue alone is the pride of the nation that is free,
And ours shall be the same, while afloat this flag we shall see
Oh! there's brotherhood, here's brotherhood in the hearts that are true,
That's united to the bright lone star in the field of the blue.

Our flag too has been to battle and beat a savage foe,
Give us a little time and we will beat any other foe,
Oh! there's brotherhood, there's brotherhood in the hearts that are true
That's united to the bright lone star in the field of the blue.

Then again, rally boys rally, we've not yet got through,
For we have our additions to make of five, four and two,
Oh! there's brotherhood, there's brotherhood in the hearts that are true,
That's united to the bright lone star in the field of the blue.

Eleven stripes is the number, of alternate white and red,
And are the additions we intended or thought to have said,
Oh! there's brotherhood, there's brotherhood in the hearts that are true,
That's united to the bright lone star in the field of the blue.

Monrovia October 3rd, 1851.

We are ever asking ourselves each day as we journey on in life, why do the young and gifted die?

We mourn for the youthful dead,
When in tones subdued 'tis said
That upon the bier is laid
The youthful dead,

We sigh for the bright flower,
That perisheth in an hour,
By death's triumphant power.
The opening flower,

We weep for the early lost,
E'er they have life's billows crest
Or upon its bosom tost.
The early lost,

We grieve for earth's beautious,
The kind, the good, the dutious,—
Each hour tending heav'n-ward.
Earth's beautious.

CHINESE JUGGLERS.

Some of the performances of the Eastern jugglers seem so incredible, even to those who have had the benefit of ocular demonstration, that they must appear to those who have not had an opportunity afforded them, as the tales, or long bows of travelers. For our own part, we must confess that we should have ranged ourselves among the ranks of unbelievers and skeptics, had we not had opportunity of judging, as eye-witnesses; of the truth of the facts which we are about to describe.

Having received marks of attention and hospitality from various friends, it was incumbent to return such civilities, and it became a subject of no little solicitude how we best might cater for their amusement. This latter it must be confessed, at the period was a matter of no small difficulty, in a new colony like Hong Kong, composed of raw materials, and unbaked into shape. At length after frequent consultations, with our compradore (who is a head servant or buttler) as to the practicability of inducing a celebrated jugglor of Canton to [illegible] himself to Hong Kong and exhibit [illegible] various acquirements to us "red bristled barbarians," the aforesaid compradore announced to us with much official importance, that the celebrated individual had arrived in the Island. Invitations, in due course were issued, and accepted with alacrity—recreation of any kind, being, at that period in that lugubrous colony, rare—and a large assemblage, consisting for the most part of the lords of creation, arrived on the evening in question.

The room in which the performance took place was denuded of every article of furniture with the exception of chairs, which were arranged close to the walls, for the convenience of the spectators, thus leaving the floor unmated, and a clear and wide arena for the performer. At the hour named the great attraction of evening was introduced by the compradore. He was attired in the ordinary dress of middle ranks of Chinese, which consists of loose jackets and trousers, with white calico stockings and black silken shoes, embroidered with blue and white felt soles two inches thick; he had no covering on his head, and was followed by his coolee or servent, bearing an unpainted teak wood box, of about three feet by two feet in size, who placed it in the room and retired. The juggler commenced operations by placing his box in the centre of the room; he then stripped off his jacket, thus appearing in a state of nudity from the waste upward, having a white cloth twisted around his loins.

He next opened his box, and took therefrom an ordinary basin, or bowl, about eighteen inches in diameter and closed the lid of the box, leaving it exposed completely to one view; he then walked round the room, allowing each individual separately to inspect the basin and handle it—the whole of the time talking in his native language, which we afterward learned was a species incantation.—We were all sufficiently satisfied that the basin was an ordinary one, and perfectly empty. He then placed it on the floor, about five feet from the box, untwisted the cloth from round his waist, which was in size about a yard and a half long, by one yard wide, and which he threw over the basin, spreading it out, continuing during all the time, his mumbling—in about half a minute he raised the cloth from the basin exposing it to view, when to our astonishment, it was filled with limpid water, and a fish 3 or 4 inches long was swimming about in it! He took up the bowl and handed it to each spectator, as he had previously done, and we satisfied ourselves that there was no occular deception but that the water was indeed veritable and the fish a living one.

After we had sufficiently satisfied ourselves, by examining the contents of the basin, he replaced it in the box, and took there from a green flower pot, filled with mould which was about twelve inches in height, and eighteen in diameter.—Holding this in one hand, and exhibiting what appeared to be an ordinary seed in the other, he handed them around for inspection after the previous fashion; he then made a cavity in the mould, and he placed the seed in it, covering it carefully with the earth; he afterward set down the flower pot where the bowl had previously rested, covered it in like manner with the cloth, and recommenced his mutterings, after which he withdrew the cloth, and we beheld a young and tender plant in the flower-pot, about two inches above the mould. This was of a beautiful bright green color, with the leaves folded about the stem, and within the other, and apparently a healthy plant, having all that freshness peculiar to one which has just burst from the parent earth, but of what botanical species we are not in a position to determine. This was handed round by the enchanter, and examined by all, with the same feelings and expressions of surprise, but with no less care and accuracy, than the water and fish which preceded it.

He again placed it in its previous position, recovered it with the cloth and recommenced his incantations, which continued for about twenty minutes, during which period we observed the cloth gradually rising in a comical form, over the spot where it covered the flower-pot, until it had risen about a foot and a half, when the cloth was again withdrawn, and to our increased amazement we beheld the tender plant grown into a small shrub regularly formed, clothed with verdure, and having its branches covered with buds and leaves. The re-placing re-covering, re-muttering, were all severally renewed, and after the lapse of half an hour, the cloth was once more removed and the amazement of the spectators, was considerably augmented by discovering that the shrub was now clothed in blossoms and flowers, in appearance resembling those of the China aster.

Again the Casket of wonders, the teak wood box, was called into requisition, and the lid having been opened, our wonder-worker took therefrom a comon round earthen-ware white and blue plate about two feet in diameter, and placed thereon about a pound of unboiled rice; this he handed round in the manner previously described, and we took the platter examining it more narrowly than any of the former articles, resolved that this time there should be no mistake. All this time, it must be kept in mind, that although the necromancer could see the box, it was kept closed, at a distance from him, and he never approached it during his operations, so that it was perfectly impracticable that he could abstract anything from it during the time. He now put the plate of rice in the centre of the room, and covered it with the cloth, and squatted down, he varied the performance this time by putting his hands over the cloth, scrupulously keeping his arms covered up to the elbows, and then commenced divers manipulations; this continued for the space of half an hour, our necromancer never budging from his post, or changing the attitude which he had first adopted.

We observed sundry movements under the cloth at divers times, and in various places; it appeared to be raised from the ground, until the whole presented an appearance not unlike the uneven surface and undulations of a model of a hill country. At the expiration of the half hour, he arose and removed the cloth, walking round and carefully gathering it up by the four corners which being thus raised discovered to our view, arranged in symmetrical order, six dishes or plates, similar to that which had been handed round, but of various sizes, and these were filled with sundry cooked edibles peculiar to the country, and among them was a dish of boiled rice; but where the dish of unboiled rice had vanished, or whence came the six dishes, or how they came there, amply provided as they were with ready dressed food, it passed human ken to explain.

Neither is it conceivable how he could have arranged these six dishes, without moving them from one spot, as those which were farthest from him when the cloth was removed, were considerably beyond the reach of his arm. The conjurer recovered viands with his magic cloth.

After some time, we observed the cloth gradually rising again in the centre, until it assumed a form somewhat conical the apex of which was removed about two feet or upward from the floor; during the whole of this rising or ascending progress the manipulator remained without removing from the spot where he had originally squatted; but he now assumed the same posture and again, for the last time he raised the cloth, when, wonder upon wonders; there were the six dishes, which we had seen arranged flat and symmetrical upon the floor, now piled one upon the other, in regular order, commencing with the largest at the bottom, each dish, in ascending order being of diminished size, until the smallest crowned the top, the food remaining in the dishes, thus, forming a pyramid of alternate layers of earthenware and viands.

The emperor of the conjurors now took his leave with a "chin-chin," meaning, in good honest English, farewell; his coolee removing the teakwood box; and some of our own domestics carrying out the flowering shrub, in all its pristine beauty, and the pyramid of viands; of the latter of which we have no doubt they partook in company with our friend the empty, and washed them down with sundry cups of their favorite sam-shoo.

CURIOSITIES OF ART.—Dresden in Saxony, and capital of that country, is perhaps the most beautiful city in the world. It has been the theme of praise by every tourist who has travelled throughout Europe. Its beautiful gardens which line the banks of the Elbe, together with the recollections of its battles and sieges, which fill the pages of warlike story, render it one of most interesting portions of the wide earth to visit on that account, if for nothing more.—But Dresden is famous for her works of art. Her porcelain is still unrivalled, and her Museums are unequalled by those of any other city in the world. In the palace there is one chamber in which there are 100 small statues curiously wrought in brass, besides some huge statues of warriors and kings on horseback, surrounded with centaurs and innumerable figures of every description. There is another chamber, all of ivory, full of figures wrought in that beautiful stuff. There are fine crucifixes, ships in full sail, with gold wire for ropes; and there are figures of Abraham offering up Isaac, with an angel descending and grasping the hand of the patriarch, as if raised to give the fatal blow. This piece is five feet and a half high and of the most exquisite workmanship. There are two chambers of silver and gold, containing hundreds of figures of various sizes, with fountains and vases and cups and plate of great antiquity.

Another room is adorned with precious stones. There is a statue of one of the Kings of England, another of the archangel Michael vanquishing Satan, wrought in a wooden cup with all manner of gems.—It is two feet high. There are tables of the richest Mosaic work cups of single stones and mother of pearl, and pearls in countless forms. There is a statue of Stanislaus of Poland, wrought in onyx, and the representation of Jonas thrown into the sea, made of various gems, and a great number of other works of the like nature.—There is a sword with a silver blade, so tempered that it will bend like steel and has a hilt of gold—this is a present from one of the Popes to some of the Saxon Kings. There are six dozen court buttons and button holes, made of rose diamonds, as big as common sized walnuts. There is an emerald more than an inch long and an onyx of seven inches, estimated at one hundred thousand dollars, and there is a cup representing Diana in a bath, made of gold and diamonds, sapphires and brilliants of every description.

An honest Hibernian had come far to see Niagara, and, while he gazed upon it, a friend asked him if it was not the most wonderful thing he had ever seen, to which he replied: "Never a bit, man—never a bit. Sure, it's no wonder at all that the water should fall down there, for I'd like to know what could hinther it, but it's mighty quare though I'm thinking, how the mischief it will ever get up."

LIBERIA HERALD.

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Herald,

Reading a few hours ago, a back number of the Missionary Magazine, I saw a letter therein from the Rev. J. H. Cheeseman, under date of Sept 1850, a paragraph of which is entitled to some notice. Speaking of a superintendant for a proposed station in the interior, he says, "If the appointment of a person be left wholly with the Committee, the Board may not expect the station occupied until a man deeply pious can be obtained." Now before I proceed further, it is proper that I should remark for the information of your readers, that this committee consists of brethren Day &, Cheeseman. What we have quoted above is, in itself, very good—none but deeply pious men should be employed as missionaries; and had bro. C. stated whether more and deeper piety is required in a missionary for an interior, than for an Atlantic station, we would not be thrown upon conjecture as to his purpose in penning the paragraph. But let us see the next period. "I think a good old Southern Baptist would answer well—I mean such men as may be found in the South, whose whole souls seem swallowed up in Christ" I have nothing to do with the pitiful flattery of this odious period—nor of its air and mein of begging for popular favor—sent as it was, to be published and widely circulated in those sunny regions where "souls seem swallowed up in Christ:" I notice it chiefly in its character of a downright and outrageous attack upon the piety of the whole Baptist population in Liberia!! Did bro. C not see it? Was bro. C. so absorbed in egotism and in a desire to hold himself up as a man of "deep piety," and of a "soul swallowed up in Christ," that he could not see, how, while he was doing this he was stigmatizing his brethren?—How that he was telling the world, there are only two baptists in Liberia of "deep piety" with "souls swallowed up in Christ" and those are myself and my brother of "the Committee."? Although I have no well marked lead-line, or other definite admeasuring instrument with which to take the gauge or depth of piety in a brother; yet judging as seamen sometimes do, of depth by the color of the surface, I dispute most flatly bro. C.'s inferential position. Piety is seen and known in certain affections, and dispositions, and actions, and of these I may bring forward—meekness—gentleness—deadness to the world—humble-mindedness—quietness—and a spirit that is not puffed-up. Now I will not be judge—but I call upon all Liberia to say whether our bro. C. has engrossed all these heavenly dispositions, and left all his brethren graceless and hopeless.

Out of the Providence Baptist Church most of the Churches in Liberia proper went forth.—From her originial number of seven, hundreds have sprung up, and bro. C. himself was born of her, and nursed in her, and brought up and sent forth to preach, by her. How is it, or can it be that now, neither in the original parental, nor in all the numerous branches only one brother of "deep piety" is to be found? If so what have the Missionaries been doing? Year after year letters go—the mail swells with letters telling of "glorious times; refreshing seasons—God powerfully at work, edifying christians and converting sinners:" and yet after all these letters, and all these seasons and all these processes, in one brother alone the work of "deep piety" is effected. If nothing has been effected wherefore these letters—would it not be better to work more and write less? I think so; and so think the majority of Liberians.

I have however nothing to say against missionary brethren praising and extolling themselves, whether in outright eulogistic strains, or covertly in tomes of diatrive of personal doings and personal feelings, provided they do not at the same time depreciate others. It is therefore much to be regretted, that the pedestal of personal worth is so often overlooked, and the shoulders and heads of others is too often regarded as the only proper position of notoriety. We are here no strangers each to other—each others' virtues, talents, vices, failings are known. To the people in America we are unknown. Against a desire to be formally known abroad I have nothing to object. Nor do I complain of many of the letters sent to America and published there, but I and numerous others do regret they were returned here—and that, just because it forced us upon an alteration of our opinion of the writers. The letter which calls forth these remarks is peculiarly unhappy in this respect. Containing, as it does more than an invidious comparison, it almost provokes the institution of a comparison of the present state of the Baptist denomination in Liberia, with its state ten years ago when missionaries had nothing to do with it—of the harmony, peace and unanimity among the missionaries themselves, with the harmony peace and unanimity among brethren and missionaries—of the amount and success of unpaid baptist labor ten years ago with the amount and success of paid baptist missionary labor at this day; and then if success is to be expected to follow in the footsteps of "deep piety" and of "soul's swallowed up in Christ; and if the the bag proof of the pudding is in chewing we might arrive at a just conclusion. But I have no time for this at present. I cannot however close without remarking, that I have not penned a word in a spirit of unkindness. I hope therefore my communication will not be regarded as depreciatory: for although I do not by any means believe all I see in the letters referred to, yet I do not regard the writers worse than other men—I regard the writers as good as their brethren and no better.

Very Truly Yours
A. BAPTIST.

Monrovia Nov. 10 1851.

For the "Liberia Herald"

Mr. Herald.

I notice in the last number of your paper that some one calling himself Wm. Providence expresses great desire to know, what the "Missionaries are doing, towards civilizing, and christianizing, the benighted heathen within the boundaries of Liberia." I see also that the only reason he assigns for wishing to be informed on the subject is, that he sees "Missionary fields left unoccupied." Not that he feels any interest in the cause himself, but according to his notions every missionary field should be occupied now. He for gets that God works in his own time, according to the good pleasure of his own will—that he works when and wherever he pleases. Missionary fields left unoccupied. True there are hundreds of fields—inviting missionary fields unoccupied. But why! Is it [because the missionary wil] not occupy them? Is it because missionaries have abandoned them to sit idle! Surely not. It is because (we say it with feeling of regret) there are no men to occupy them. "The harvest is plenteous" we know, "but the laborers are few." That there are missionary fields unoccupied, is no reason to justify the belief that there are men to occupy them who will not. But says Wm Providence these unoccupied fields are all "so very inviting to the true Heralds of Salvation" Surely he does not mean that Missionaries should leave their present field of labor—their present sphere of action and usefulness to occupy these unoccupied fields—for we believe that every unoccupied missionary field, whether in Africa or not is interesting and inviting to the true Heralds of Salvation. But the "missionaries, says he, whose duty it is to hold up the glorious light of salvation are immersed in merchandizing." Certainly Mr. P. knows better—he knows that this assertion will not stand the test of unprejudiced minds. How he could be guilty of such a mistake in the face of evidence to the contrary, is a mystery to me Mr, Herald. We are aware that those missionaries living distant from the settlements, are obliged to indulge in petty trade with the natives around them, that is, exchange foreign articles for the products of the soil they must either do this or starve and if this is being immersed in merchandizing then the assertion is true. If this is being immersed in merchandizing, then the apostles were merchant For they were commanded by our Saviour, a little before his death, to take their purses and scrips with them, in their missionary tours (Luke 22—36) and they were allowed to engage in any lawful trade for support. Paul, though supported by the liberality of the Churches, wrought at tentmaking. (Acts xviii 3.)

But it appears that Wm. P. after speaking of the inefficiency of Missionary labors in Liberia, goes on and contradicts himself. He says. "Our churches are crowded with native converts raised in the families of our good christian folks," here he bears testimony to the good that the missionaries have been instrumental in doing. For where did these "good christian folks" of whom he speaks obtain their knowledge of their duty? Perhaps he replies, from the Bible Very well. But has not the Bible, the doctrines it inculcates, the duties its enjoins, been explained unto, and constantly kept alive in the minds of the "good Christian folks" by the preaching of the word by the labors of the faithful missionary! Else how could "good Christian folks" be kept up and encouraged in the path of duty! Else where would there be any "good Christian folks"! But Mr. P. wishes to see more done, he wishes to see Africa immediately evangelized and complains of the inefficiency of the missionaries, as a reason why this is not done. Let him remember that the missionary has no power to convert or to do any thing of himself. The work is the Lord's; he blesses the labor of missionaries whenever and wherever he pleases, so that the missionary might preach and preach again. If the enlightening influence of the Holy Spirit do not accompany the preaching, nothing can be done. "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it." "Paul may plant and Appollos water, but God giveth the increase." Mr. P. speaks of the propriety of having suitable men—men that love souls &c. Where are they? Is he one of them! Let him come forward and set an example to these who are not suitable. As he appears to have a knowledge how to do more good than the missionaries are now doing—let him come forward and do it. But perhaps he has no love for souls. If he has not, we think him a very poor judge of what the love of souls is. It might be proper here to remind Mr. P. that Liberia is the result of missionary labors—that it has arisen to its present stand among the nations, through the slow and silent, but powerful influence of missionary operations. Because the progress of civilization and christianization among the heathen in the boundaries of Liberia is not perceptible to Wm. Providence he infers that nothing is being done, he comes forward and accuses the missionaries of unfaithfulness. Mr Herald, does he in such a course exhibit wisdom, or does he display the most egregious folly? But before we close, let us notice the inquiry he takes up with reference to the ministers of Christ,—Zion's watchmen.

"Watchmen, watchmen, what of the night"! It might be replied, a night of gross darkness to thee Wm Providence, but the forerunner of a glorious day to the benighted millions of Africa. What of the night? A night of ignorance and iniquity to thee, but precursor of a day in which the Sun of Righteousness will rise with healing in his wings upon the degraded sons of the forest. What of the night? A night Wm that will continue a night to thee forever, unless thou repent.

Letter, No 1.

Bassa Cove, Nov: 7th, 1851.

To His Excellency.
President Roberts.

Dear Sir:—

I had the honor of transmiting by the English bark "Ariel," two communications, dated 4th, and 5th, instant, informing you of the massacre, by Grando, and others, of a part of the garrison at Fish Town—but I have certain reasons to suppose; (and which induces me now to give you the substance of what I then wrote by express.) that those communications did not reach you.

The communications refered to, would have informed you that Grando, the Fishman, and a number of Bassa people, and the largest portion of Fishmen, resident at Fishtown, (the Cove), notwishstanding, their profession of friendship, made a sudden attack upon the garrison on Wednesday morning about 8 of the clock. Three hundred is supposed to have formed Grando's troop, and before our men who were out at work on immigrant houses, could get in, they took possession and conquered the five men in garrison; two of them were shot down dead,—the other three made their escape.—also a boy, two women and four children were massacred by the villians.—The nine thus murdered, are Asbury Harland, Talbert Majors Mrs. Mabry and her three children, (one an infant,) Mrs. Briggs and her infant, and a boy named Charles, about 16 years old.—They plundered the place of every thing and fired the garrison—ten immigrant houses and Mr. Gardiner's lumber, which he soon expected to use in the erection of a building. The fellows did not fire many guns, less the attention of the people at our settlement should be attracted, and relief be sent down, before they could complete the destruction of the place—they used their knives and spears mostly, as they had no one to oppose. As soon as the news reached town, a company of men were sent down to recover the property, and to afford assistance to any of our people who may have fled to the woods; and to prevent if possible, the entire destruction of the place—but they found every thing burned to the ground—the property conveyed off, and a part of the enemy slowly retiring toward the extreme point, as our men advanced.

Mrs. Hudson, and Mr. Ephraim Tiller, who had concealed themselves in the high grass near the garrison, awaiting the approach of night, to escape to the settlement, were relieved from their uncomfortable position by the arrival of our men.—The enemy fired at Mrs Hudson, and tho,' not wounded, she fell,' and they supposed she was dead, and in their eager pursuit of some other person, passed her, when she managed to strip herself and find concealment. The nine persons killed, were shot and chopped in the most cruel and aggravating manner—some apparently having adozen musket balls in them, and then cut from head to foot—stomachs ripped open—hands cut off and thrust into their mouths.

There were nine men of the garrison at the place, the other four were up in the settlement. Captain Preston says, they had as usual, been on guard that night, and four of the men had gone out that morning to work—they usually take their guns with them, but it having rained nearly all the night, and in the morning,—they concluded to leave the guns in the garrison, less they should get wet; and tho,' the furtherest immigrant house was not more than two hundred yards from the garrison, the enemy had nearly reached it, before they were aware of any danger. It was madness then to attempt to get their guns; and their escape was nearly prevented by the Fishmen at Fish-town, (about two hundred yards this side the garrison) the most of whom assisted in concerting the plan, and murdering the people.

Captain Preston had heard that morning, that the Fishmen were moving their property from Fish-town, and apprehending some danger, went to Fish-town to assertain the fact, and the cause for such a movement—he saw they were moving off their effects and failing in obtaining any satisfactory answer, he hurriedly returned back to mount a double guard, but before he reached the garrison a volly of musketry were let loose and the fellows were inside shooting and cutting up the few helpless women and children.

Jack Master is as true to us as ever. He told Mr. Gardiner the previous day, at Fish-town, that a country woman had told him, in confidence, that Grando and the Bassa people intended to attack the garrison that night or the next day. Jack further said, that his countrymen tried to keep all their matters a secret from him, knowing him to be friendly to us. Jack said the report might be false, but he advised him not to come down the following day, as he had been doing every day for a week, superintending the collection of his lumber and building; but to wait two or three days to see what would transpire. Jack, also, had to fly for his life—he took his women and child in a canoe and left as soon as the fighting commenced—landed them on Edina point, & was in town as soon as any of our people who had escaped. He tried hard to save poor Harland, there were about thirty natives after him just as Jack was preparing to push off his canoe, and Jack beckoned to H to run to the canoe; but before he could reach it they shot him; when Jack saw him fall, he pushed off to save his own life

Our object is to attempt a re-occupancy of the place immediately—the principal difficulty in the way, is the want of shelters. Four log houses can be put up and shut in, within the garrison in four or five days; but as I have already spent several hundred dollars over the Society's appropriation, I don't know how the expense of them will be borne. We propose getting timber ready and going down with it in about four days from this, with the hope, you will allow a judicious expenditure of as much of the remainder of the $2000 00 as may be necessary; and that you will advocate a still further appropriation, if it be necessary.

It is true, we have not more men than enough to protect our settlements, but we must, notwithstanding, do all we can in the way of rebuilding and destroying all further attempts at treachery.

Of all the base treacherous acts I have heard or read of, I think Grando's exceed all. Up to the very time of his depredation, he pretended the greatest humility and friendship—his people visited our settlements daily—two of them were working in Mr. Lawrence's boat the very morning of the massacre. Only six days ago, he sent me a calf to pay on his palaver, which I returned to him with a very civil message, that the remainder of the cattle must be large ones—to which he agreed.

But sir, in my opinion, Boyer, of Trade Town, encouraged him to the attack, promising him assistance, and that there are others, NOT PROFESSELLY HEATHENS NOR LIBERIANS, who, also, have "a finger in the pie."

I have lost, in this affair, exclusive of lumber, in oil and goods, $1500 00—but I am somewhat inured to losses, and though I am but illy prepared to sustain them, yet, it appears I must, as I frequently have had to do before.

Our people after viewing the mangled state of the dead, came home very desperate: and that night, a campany sallied out and burned two Fish-towns, and in the mele perhaps killed one or two fishmen and returned home before day. Prudence requires, that we keep up these night excursions 'till we hear from you; and the tribe of Fishmen must be driven out of the country before they will learn how to behave themselves. They are well panic stricken now, and if we had more help, an ample atonement could be had for the murder and robbery at the garrison. There are plenty of friendly native tribes, who are anxious to accompany us in our nocturnal excursions for the sake of plunder, but we think it best not to take them with us.

Tho' Grando's people are seen occasionally about the point, the impression is, which is well founded, that if a determined effort is made by our government for his arrest or punishment, he will make his escape to leeward, and not let it be known where he may go, and which the villians will keep secret—but if no strong effort is made, he intends to hover about the country and annoy us until we yield and consent to his occupying the Cove—these are his plans:—and sir, tho' we reprobate the customs of the heathens, and would deeply lament a condition of affairs, that would compell us in self-preservation, to adopt them—we must not remain blind to the fact, that hitherto, all the plans we have had recourse to, to obtain culprits and redress from the Piccanany Cess Fishmen, have proved failures; and that they were not in the least calculated to give them a correct idea of the power and resources of the government. Matters now, have reached that height, as to warrant, we think, the adoption of a different course. As it has again and again been proven, that there is no confidence to be placed in this tribe of Fishmen; and that it is certain that they boast of their character as deceivers, will it not be best to deal with them in this wise—Arrest any of that tribe wherever they may be found—prevent their being employed by vessels: and place them in custody: and let them know, they will be held as hostages, until they deliver up Grando and his confederates, for the murder and robbery at the garrison. If this course be adopted, you may rest assured sir, that the relatives and friends of those arrested, will invent measures to catch Grando and deliver him up. We do not advise this course without knowing, that it would have a good effect—as several of the tribe have said, that if Grando continued his depredations, and in consequence, their relations and friends were caught and held responsible for his good conduct or delivery—they would not hesitate to seek for him: and deliver him up. This is the only course that will prove effectual and prevent an expensive military expedition As matters now are, they will inveigh against Grando to your face; but will never aid you in arresting him. Grando and his brother Wea should be unconditionally demanded—adopt the course, and I firmly believe you will get them in thirty days' time

I think by prudent management, those Bassa Chiefs concerned with Grando in the murderous attack can be procured. I have a plan now in operation, which I hope may prove successful.

I hope Sir, you see the necessity of having every factory removed between this and Grand Colah, as I feel confident that Boyer had a hand in this affair; and if not in this, other ill conduct of his, justifies such a course; and it will teach malignant and medling foreigners also, a lesson.

It is likely Mr. Lawrence may complain to H. B. M's Consul, that our people fired into his boat. I was not present, nor did I know any thing about it, till several hours after it occured: —but I gathered from good authorities—That Mr. Weaver's son Napoleon was in Mr. Lawrence's boat coming on shore with the crew-men from the ship—(he understands the fish language;) that when the boat approached the bar, he heard them say, that two of Grando's men were in the boat, (this was the same day of the massacre) and that one of them would be recognized by us, if he came on shore; but the other would not; so they called a fish canoe and put him in it—the other continued in the boat. When the boat landed, the "youngster" reported what had passed in the boat; and three or four of our men started towards the boat on the beach opposite my store: —and tho' they were one hundred yards from the boat, the men had made but few steps, before this man plunged in the river and swam off for the bar. Mr. Lawrence's boat then went to his relief; and when he got into the boat, our men told them to bring him on shore, but they pulled away, determined to carry him off—(all in the boat were ascertained to be fishmen) our men then fired one or two muskets—not at the boat, but to induce them to bring the man on shore:—and even, if they had fired at them, or the boat, under the circumstances, they would have been justified. I communicate this occurrence, in case a formal complaint is made.

I am your Excellency's.

Obt: Servant,

STEPHEN, A, BENSON.

Letter No. 2.

Bassa, Cove, Nov: 7th, 1851.

To His Excellency.
President Roberts.

Dear Sir.

Mr. Lawrence arrived in our port last Sabbath with his two vessels, and by times Monday morning he was over to see me; professing unusual friendship and manifesting unwonted kindness.

He informed me that the difficulty between Boyer and James Flaw was settled—that he had settled it on his arrival at Trade Town; and shewed me the instrument he said, they had signed, witnessed by Capt: Pannel.

We do hope, beg, and pray; that his deceitfully, malignant medling may not be recognized by our Government. Now I am perfectly satisfied that he was the cause of Boyer's obstinacy—and he Lawrence has a two fold object in view. ;First to lessen our influence with the natives—Second, that his and Murray's owners may have it to report, that their servants on the coast have more influence with the natives than our government—that they have to settle palavers for the security of their property and have to make large expenditures for that purpose, consequently they should pay no duties &c to our Goverument. I would stake, every thing I am worth that these were the primary objects of Lawrence and Murray in influencing Boyer to treat the Commissioners with the contempt he has.

Boyer really thinks that the power of the English traders is superior to ours—because, he say, they have British men of war at their back.

We are strongly of the "opinion sir," that the most advisable course for us to adopt, in view of the present condition of things, is to have every factory removed between this place and Grand Colah. Make foreignors and all abandon Trade Town for a season: and to demand of Boyer remuneration for the expense, Government went to, in sending the "Lark" and Commissioners down, at his own request, to settle the difficulties existing between him and Flaw. This would be punishment on Boyer and those who improperly interfered with matters which do not concern them, and would seem to show them we are capable of understanding and maintaining the authority of the government.

Situated as you are at Monrovia, you can have no adequate knowledge of the malignant, deceitful and subversive exertions making by foreignors on the African tribes; and their goods have great effect with them; and every thing they can gather along the coast injurious to us, false or true, they send to their owners Pannel told us in the cabin of the "Lark" that he was particularly instructed to find out and communicate to England every thing he possibly could, injurious to us, that it may be used to our disadvantage with the British Government; and that he was doing so. He then commenced a slander on you, but when he saw with what indignation and somewhat dan-sternness we were about to resent it, for I got blind and could not keep my seat, and was about to take the liberty of asking him out of the cabin—he retracted and said he meant nothing out of the way about you—he had a high opinion of you; and shifted the falsehood which he charged you with, on an Hon: gentleman at Monrovia; and said this Hon: gentleman made that impression on his mind, and that what he said in the cabin was only a repetition of what that Hon: Gent: told him

I will try to manage every matter down here connected with this late difficulty, so as to restore peace and order as soon as will be practicable, as I know our Government have not a cent to spare, nor a life to lose. If I have taken liberties in thus freely communicating to you; and taken more upon myself, than belongs to me. I hope you will pardon me. I am looked up to here as an advisor, in some respects; and besides all my property &c. &c. is here; and if I remained indifferent, to what is being done to our injury, it is possible, that by the time others might act, we would be more seriously injured. You may be assured sir, that I wil do nothing that will lay me liable to censure.

I am Respectfully,

Yours, &c, &c.

STEPHEN, A, BENSON.

Letter No. 3.

Bassa, Cove, Nov: 8th, 1851.

To His Excellency.
President Roberts.

Dear Sir.

In an hour after closing my letters to you I learned most confidently that Boyer sent a large number of his people to Grando's barricaded town yesterday; and that he is to be there himself to day, with a reinforcement—this is so. and you may depend upon it.

Wee' of New Cessters has not come out openly, but has expressed himself as Grando's friend, and has promised him assistance. I heard the guns firing at Grando's town this morning expressive of joy at the arrival of the Trade-Town people.

Respectfully Yours,

STEPHEN, A, BENSON.

Letter, No 4.

Bassa Cove Nov. 15th 1851.

To His Excellency,
President Roberts.

Dear Sir:—

Just after the close of a bloody engagement at this place this morning, with the Fishmen, I was handed your letter. I exceedingly regret that my communication to you per "Ariel" did not reach you, as I then wrote a detailed account of the state of affairs here.

We had determined to re-occupy the garrison immediately, but, on ascertaining that almost, the entire "Bassa Country and Trade Town had joined Grando with the determination to lay waste our settlements and massacre the inhabitants"—the idea was abandoned and we commenced to prepare for a vigorous defence until the arrival of re-inforcements. Excepting Peter Harris's tribe Young Bob's and some few other tribes up the St: John's river—the entire Bassa County lying east of the St: John's are our enemies, and are now fighting us or our allies every day and night. We had not ascertained their true position when I last wrote to you.

Some of the New Cesster's Chiefs are the only one's who had not consented to join the combination. when we last heard from there, which was last Tuesday, by some congoes and Hudson—the former having made their escape and traveled by night until they reached here, and Hudson was brought home secretly by Croo Peter's people of New Cessters.

Boyer of Trade Town, came up to New Cessters in William Lawrence's vessel for the express purpose of enlisting troops to join Grando against us; and Lawrence conducted or accompanied him on shore at Cessters—prepared a dinner at his factory for him and the New Cessters Chiefs, and were siting with them at table in his factory, when Boyer broached the object of his mission to the Chiefs. All this took place three days after the massacre at the garrison; Lawrence was here at the time of the massacre and left the morning after. We had heard that there were suspicions of Lawrence's agency in the whole matter, but were not certain of the fact. I send your the statements of Jeremiah Martin, and one of the congoes who were present when Boyer and Lawrence landed, and who over heard much of the conversation.

Joe West and Jabbah abruptly refused to join Grando: and tho' I have heard nothing to the contrary, I cannot vouch for their continued friendship in the present state of things. The Fishmen demanded the Liberians, residing in the New Cesster's Country, to kill them, but Joe West refused to deliver them up; and said he would lose his life first—he carried them to his town, where we hope they are safe.—Thomas R. Barbour and Edward Carrol, are among the number now under the protection of this Chief.

King Jabbah in the same country had taken Jeremiah Martin's son to his town for safety—it is about fifteen miles from the beach—but Martin having beged Lawrence when he was here to take him off, which he faithfully promised to do, wrote Jabbah to give him up to Lawrence—Jabbah brought the boy to the beach, and tho' he cied and beged Lawrence to take him off, he would not, but left the boy in his factory to be taken care of:—and it is more than probable he has been murdered.

I have no personal misunderstanding with Lawrence—he manifested the greatest friendship to me when he was here last, and made me a present of nearly fifteen dollars worth of delicacies; and was more than ever accommodating. So you can see, I do not give the information of him from spite or malice—but because I as firmly believe that Lawrence instigated this war upon us, and is now encouraging it, as I believe in my own existence: and his object is either, that the natives may exterminate, or so subdue us, as to cause us to relax in the enforcement of the Revenue and Navigation laws. This was the argument Boyer used to enlist the New Cesster's Chiefs (Lawrence was present at the time), and Lawrence's white clerk who were also present actually advised them to join and help to cut our throats.

For the Lord's sake, Sir, have every foreign factory removed within certain defined distances from this place.

The information of Hudson's was obtained by him from Croo Peter's town at New Cesters. At the present moment, the entire country to fifteen miles up the St: John's river and to the borders of the New Cesster's country is in commotion; and an attack is made upon some town every day and night—there has been as many as three attacks in one night.

Last Monday a small attack was made on Bassa Cove by the Bassa people, I think, but they soon fled. Tuesday night a general attack of the Bassa people was made on Bassa Cove—they commenced at A. P. Davis's and my farm—the attack was made at midnight. Several, were killed, and as they fled, the wilderness resounded with "nabo" (a cry of pain) our cannon having been well charged with slugs and grape shot. On examination the next morning we found the bushes covered with blood, and picked up, several guns and "gregrees" the fellows had droped. Doar Gar's own brother, and who was his chief warrior was shot; he died three days ago and was buried yesterday amid much grief. This Doar Gar, who sent the war, is the same fellow in whose town our troops quartered when on their way to Wee's town—it was but four days previously, that he sent one of our Liberians home, to keep him from being killed he said; and sent to us at the same time strong professions of friendship. I sent him a small present in acknowledgment of his kindness for sending Mabry home. On Tuesday night the Bexians sallied out to one of the enemies towns, and broke it up. They wounded two of our men, Blane and Hol, the later a missionary)—not mortally however. From Bassa Covewe have burned up three towns, in the Bassa Country. Yesterday, the Bexians finished the last enemies town on the left hand side of the St: John's—last night they crossed over and made an attack upon another town aided by native allies, and destroyed the town

The Fishmen having showed themselves between this and the Cove daily since Wednesday, in large numbers, made, the most desperate attack this morning at 7. o'clock upon Bassa Cove, that I ever knew the natives to make. There seemed to be no end to their numbers; and they were as fearless of cannon as if they were pop-guns. After they fired the first volley, they made a rush, some passing between fortification & my farm, and actually got in town—others came up within forty yards of the two cannons & loaded & fired bravely, nor would they give an inch, for thirty minutes until Tarplan, Grando's principal warrior, and in whom he placed more dependence than in any one hundred men, was shot down dead within thirty yards of the cannon's mouth. When he fell and his war-horn ceased, there was a general panic, and a few more rounds put them to flight. I have the fellow's head at my farm and intend to preserve his skull for examination only, for there must have been something extraordinary about the man. I never saw such quantities of blood, as was seen, on examining the battle ground:—from thirty yards from the cannon's mouth on the fort below the first pawn on the beach, the bushes and path-way are died with blood—in some places it stand in puddles. Both of the head warriors were killed and three men were shot down dead in succession, in attempting to take off their bodies, during the heat of battle I never before witnessed such bravery in the natives—their number as I before said, seemed to have no end—they covered the ground from the first prawn, across to, this side of the immigrant houses built on the hill. We do not think that the killed and wounded can be less than forty to fifty. We could distinctly hear the cry and wailing of the wounded at the distance of a quarter of a mile.

We had only about sixty men in Bassa Cove during the engagement, and they were at three stations—one on the beach near John Dunn's—one on fort hill and the other at my farm. If it had not been for the cannons the fellows would have taken the town, for there could not have been less than one thousand of them, perhaps many, more they passed between fort station and my farm, and got well in town, the two stations being far apart; but I took a detachment of men, and a small cannon of mine, and drove them back.

Some two or three of our men are wounded. J. M. Horrace had a ball through his hat, which slightly touched his head, and knocked him down, but in a moment, he was again on his feet, rallying his men. Wesley Harland is shot in the head, and there are fears as to his recovery.

Thus Sir I have given you a full account of our proceedings since I last wrote to you and the present state of affairs.

We want help—men and ammunition, and that immediately. We have thousands against us backed by foreignors, and our men are exhausted from keeping guard night and day—and as they cannot work for their livelihood, a few of us have to support them. Such are the condition of affairs, that nothing less than severe punishment of all from here to Trade Town will change the aspect of things; and the sooner we can commence a campaign, the sooner will order be restored. Until then, disorder will reign triumphant. Unless we are reinforced, the Representatives from this County cannot leave. And as a campaign will not proceed till after the session of the Legislature, I hope you will send down some men to assist us; and measurably relieve our men, as they cannot hold out much longer.

Before I close it is proper to inform you that Grando occupies his barricaded town near the borders of Tobacconne, most of his time. He is constantly going to and fro collecting force and compelling many to join him.

The killing of so many Fishmen by us this morning & especially, the great men—together with the large number of Bassas killed, will I think turn many of Grando's friends against him, for he certainly brought on this war without the approbation of three fourths of those who have joined him; and if Boyer had not joined him, they would have remained neutral.

We have concluded to get the George R. McGill to return to Monrovia with despatches; to prevent miscarriage, as have been the case.

Very Respectfully I have the honor to be Yrs: Excellency's obt: Servt:
STEPHEN A. BENSON

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, NOVEMBER 25th 1851.

We would apologize to our readers for the paucity of editorial in our present number, did we suppose it needful! In fact there is one subject that engrosses every other: and that is, the distressing condition of affairs in Grand Bassa county.

That interesting country now the theatre of a most bloody war, brought on by Grando, the Fishmen, at a time when he professed the greatest friendship for the people of Liberia, and while pretending due obedience to the laws, and authority of the government. Our readers will remember that Grando incorporated himself and people with the government and people of Liberia—that he became one of us, and subjected himself to our laws. We now find him at war with us, massacreing in offensive men women and children, and marshaling forces from all quarters, with the determination to attempt the entire destruction of the settlements in Grand Bassa.

Prince Boyer of Trade Town has joined Grando in his depredations he like Grando, are ameniable to our laws, and will we doubt not be held to strict accountability.

We cannot possibly imagine the kind of defence Grando and Boyer will set up, if they are ever arrested, for their murderous onslaught on our towns. We did not know, that they had any cause of complaint against the government or people of Liberia: and if they had, we are certain they did not make known their grievances

Our readers will find in our present number the several communications from Hon: Stephen A. Benson giving minute information of the difficulties now existing in Grand Bassa. We prefer giving his letters to the public, to writing ourselves, for then, they will have the opportunity of judging for themselves of the condition of affairs and be better calculated to propose plans for the restoration of peace; and for the punishment of the rebellious chiefs.

Our readers will also learn that the unprincipled foreign traders on our coast are deeply implicated in the massacreing of our fellow citizens; and for the continued hostilities in Grand Bassa.

On Sunday afternoon, the "George R. McGill" returned from Grand Bassa, with despatches to the President giving information of the attack made by Grando and his allies, on the town of Bassa Cove, and of the repulse of the assailants with considerable loss, in kill and wounded—and that men and ammunition were wanted. The President immediately assembled his advisors, and laid the despatches before them. The result of the consultation was, to despatch men and munitions of war, at once to Grand Bassa. The President fearing another attack on the settlement before re-inforcements could be ready to leave here, made application to Capt. Pearson commanding the U. S. Ship "Dale" then in our harbor, to take him to the scene of war; and represented to him that the presence of his ship in the harbor of Grand Bassa would, very probably have a tendency to influence the natives from another attack until the arrival of re-inforcements. Captain Pearson met the wishes of the President, and received him on board his ship the next morning at 7 1-2 o'clock.

About 12 of the clock seventy five men well armed and equipped were counted off into boats and sent on board the Government schr. "Lark" and by one of the clock the men were on board and the schooners were underweigh standing on her course to the leeward. We had the pleasure at 5 P. M. to know that both the "Dale" and the "Lark" had passed "King" Gray's point and doubted not, they were at anchor off Bassa the next morning.

We feel certain that the sight of the "Dale" and "Lark" and the security which will be given by the presence of the President, & the re-inforcement of seventy-five men will have a good effect in keeping up the spirits of our harrassed citizens and tend greatly to depress the courage of the savage foe

We will not apprehend another attack; even if infrigueing foreignors should double their fiendish plans, to instigate it.

The Lark took down a supply of munitions of war—and persons are engaged here, to prepare a large quantity, to be ready for delivering at any moment it may be required.

Our present number will be delayed beyond the day of its regular issuing, in the hope of receiving further intelligence from Grand Bassa. We hope our readers will appreciate the motives which induced us to this course The present distressed condition of that county weighs heavily upon the minds of every citizen; and however prone we are to the belief that our fellow citizens at the Cove may be able to sustain their position against the murderous onslaughts of the notorious Grando, and his allies; we are not without serious apprehensions. Grando has placed himself in a position from which he will not be able to extricate himself. This he knows full well, and he will use every stratagem for the complete distruction of that settlement. Boyer, of Trade Town, is equally aware of the unfavorable position he has placed himself, in conbining with Grando against us. Is it not therefore reasonable to suppose they will persist in their attacks? Our hope is, they will be detered from openly continuing their warfare after the arrival of reinforcements—as they so were severely repulsed in their general attack last Saturday. What they may fail to do openly; they may accomplish by strategem. It must be remembered that Grando has acted most treacherously against the people and Government of Liberia—In many instances within the last ten years he has shown a total disregard to the tenor of his agreements and stipulations with the government and when he has been called to account for his want of faith, he has escaped chastisement by apparent plausible stories. In 1849, when our troops were returning from New-Cesters, and approaching his town, he erected at every conspicious point, a white flag in token of friendship. It would have been an easy matter to have driven him out of the country. He then renewed his professions of amicable relations. No intercourse in future can be held with him and Boyer. A war must be carried against them, which will continue until they are slain or driven to foreign parts.

It is, we think, the duty of the Government to lay interdict on the countries where they now are, or in which they exercise influence and adopt the most strenuous efforts to prohibit all intercourse with the shore between Grand Bassa and Grand Colah—An order for the immediate removal of all factories should at once be issued. The adoption of this course may produce the most desirable effects.

Immigrants. On the evening of the 21st inst, arrived the brig "Zeno" J. L. Sturtivant master, 52 days from New York, via Gambia and Sierra Leone, with 36 immigrants sent out by the New York Colonization Society, for Bassa Cove All well. This company is highly spoken of, and it is believed they will prove a great acquisition to that interesting county. They will sail for their dsstination to day.

Assembling of Kings.—The Kings, Chiefs and Headmen from Sugaree, Grand Cape Mount, Little Cape Mount, and the Dey countries, are now assembling in this City, in obedience to the summons of the President. The object of this general meeting, is to arrange difficulties that may be existing between any of the Chieftians; and thereby put an end to the petty wars which have for a long time existed among the Kings. All the Chiefs are now here, with the exception of Dwarloo Bey and Tom Gum, of Little Cape Mount; and they are hourly expected.

Recognition. We are happy to inform our readers that the President has received from his Excellency Chevalier Bunsen, His Prussian Majesty's Envoy extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, at the Court of St. James, a despatch containing a formal recognition of the Independence of Liberia by his government.

PROCLAMATION!!

Where as on the morning of the 5th inst a treacherous and cruel attack was made by a band of savages, headed by one Grando, a native of Piccanny Cess, on a settlement of this Republic, known as Fishtown, Grand Bassa Point, who sacked and burned said village, and barbarously murdered nine of its inhabitants; And wherens the said Grando, subsequently, on the morning of the 15th inst—having succeeded in inducing three or four of the Chiefs in that neighborhood to join him with a large force—made a desperate attack on the Township of Bassa Cove, but was happily repulsed; And whereas the said Grando, and the Chiefs of Tabacconee, New Cess, and Tradetown are still in arms, and rebelion against the authority of the Government; And whereas it is expedient—information having reached me that the said Chiefs are receiving supplies of munitions of war &c &c from vessels trading on that part of our coast—to interdect all trade and intercourse with the Chiefs and natives, or other persons, residing in the districts of Tabacconee, New Cess, and Tradetown, that is to say, between Grand Bassa Point on the North west and Tradetown Point on the South east:—

Therefore I Joseph J. Roberts, President of the Republic of Liberia, by virtue of authority in me vested, do hereby interdict and prohibit every species of intercouse whatever with any person or persons residing between the points above mentioned. Any master, supercargo, or other person, in charge of any vessel or cargo, who, having a knowledge of this edict, shall be found violating its provisions, shall be seized and with the vessel, taken into any port of this Republic for legal adjudication.

It is further ordered that all persons having trading factories between the points above named will remove, or cause the same to be removed on or before the 15th day of December next ensuing Any such owner or owners of factories requiring the assistance of the government to enable him or them to remove said factories, will apply to the Secretary of the Treasury who will supply the necessary aid.

Given at Monrovia this 24th day of November A D 1851.
and of the Republic the 4th—

J J. ROBERTS.

By the President
J. H. CHAVERS
Acting Sec. of State.

The U. S. Ship "Dale" Commander Pearson arrived here from Grand Bassa on the evening of the 21th inst: with President Roberts. The President's arrival at Grand Bassa in the Dale, was very opportune. Grando and his allies had contemplated another attack on the town of Bassa Cove; but the presence of the President with the reinforcements by the "Lark," no doubt, had the effect of detering them from their course.

Commander Pearson is entitled to the thanks of the people for the prompt manner he met the wishes of the President; and to his readiness when at Grand Bassa to render all assistance in his power to the Government. The appearance of his Ship off that place had a very good effect.

The President does not apprehend another attack on Bassa Cove. The Fishmen on the landing of reinforcements, began to leave the country The President after visiting Grand Bassa and directing further measures for the security of the place, went on board the "Lark" and proceeded to Grand Colah and Manna—at these places a number of our people are residing: and to learn of their safety was the object of the President. They had not been molested; notwithstanding, it was thought advisable to remove them

The Legislature. On monday the first of December, the Legislature of Liberia will meet in session.

VANDALISM.—There was a fine painting of the battle of Marengo on a ceiling in one of the apartments of the palace of the Tuileries. When the Bourbons returned to France, the noble memorial of one of the noblest exploits was ordered to be expunged.

STUDY.—The first time I found myself a regular frequenter of a large library, it affected me with a painful feeling. I had come too suddenly upon the world of literature, and the contemplation of it made me wretched, for the mind expands but gradually to knowledge, as the eye does to light, and aches without seeing when brought too abruptly into the glare.

NAVAL.

Nov: 12 Arrived the U. S Ship "Dale" Commander Wm. Pearson—days from Cape Town, South Africa. All well. She sailed on the 17th for Grand Bassa, having on board as passenger, President Roberts The Dale returned from Grand Bassa on the 21st. Passenger President Roberts. 22nd H. B. Majesty. Brig Spy, Lieut. Beresford commanding from the windward. The Dale sailed on the 25th for Port Prayer.

Nov. Arrived Lr Govt: schooner "Lark" Reid Cooper Esqr: Commanding from Grand Cape Mount. She sailed on the 17th for Grand Bassa, with a detachment of seventy-five men, from the 1st Regiment, for the defence of Bassa Cove. Capt: John H. Paxton had charge of the detachment. The Lark took down a supply of provisions and munitions of war.

POETRY.

The Floating Straw.

BY CHARLES MACKAY.

The wild waves are my nightly pillows,
Beneath me roll the Atlantic billows;
And as I rest on my couch of brine
I watch the eternal planets shine.
Ever I ride
On a harmless tide.
Fearing naught—enjoying all things—
Undisturbed by great or small things.
Alas! for the lordly vessel
That sails so gallantly;
The winds may dash it;
The storms may dash it,
The lightnings rend its tall masts three:
But neither the wind, nor the rain, nor the sea
Can injure me—can injure me;
The lightnings cannot strike me down,
Whirlwinds wreck, or whirlpools drown;
And the ship to be lost ere the break of morn,
May pass o'er my head in saucy scorn;
And when the night unveils its fare,
I may float unharmed, in my usual place,
And the ship may show to the pitying stars
No remnant but her broken spars.
Among the shells
In the ocean dells
The ships, the crews, and the captains lie,
But the floating straw looks up to the sky,
And the humble and contented man,
Unknown to fortune, escapes her ban;
And rides secure when breakers leap,
And mighty ships go down to the deep.
May pleasant breezes waft them home
That plough with their keels the driving foam.
Heaven be their hope, and Truth their law;—
There needs no prayer for the floating straw.

Italian Patriotic Song.

TRANSLATED BY WM. CULLEN BRYANT.

Hero ye the trumpet that calls to the combat?
Up with your banner to stream in the sky?
Children of Italy, forward together!
Bravely in battle to conquer or die.
Down with the Germans, with kings and cowards!
Spurned be their bribes, and their tortures defied.
Freedom for Italy! what if we perish?
Greatly we perish on Liberty's side.
Mafcons, come forth, with the old men and children,
Grasping your weapons at Liberty's call.
Charge on the tyrants, the foes of your country—
Foes who for ages have held her in thrall.
Loud be the cry, that for battle and vengeance,
Rises from millions on Italy's shore:
She shall be free, and her children united,
Slaves to the Austrian despot no more!
She shall be free, or we sleep in our graves—
Better die bravely, than live to be slaves.

NAPOLEON AT MOSCOW

We subjoin from Headly's work 'Napoleon and his Marshals,' a brilliant account of the burning of Moscow, which is well spoken of in the American Whig Review as superior even to Cooly's picture, in 'Salathiel, of the conflagration of Rome.—Headly's descriptive powers have rarely, if ever, been surpassed:

At length, Moscow, with its domes and towers, and palaces, appeared in sight, and Napoleon, who had joined the advanced guard gazed long and thoughtfully on that goal of his wishes Murat went forward and entered the gates with his splendid cavalry, but, as he passed through the streets, he was struck with the solitude which surrounded him.—Nothing was heard but the heavy tramp of his squadron as he passed along, for a deserted and abandoned city was the meagre prize for which such unparalleled efforts had been made. As night drew its curtain over their splendid capital, Napoleon entered the gates, and immediately appointed Mortier governor. In his directions, he commanded him to abstain from all pillage. 'For this,' said he, 'you shall be answerable with your life. Defend Moscow against all, whether friend or foe.

The bright moon rose over the mighty city, tipping with silver the domes of more than two hundred churches, and pouring a flood of light over a thousand palaces and the dwelling of three hundred thousand inhabitants. The weary army sunk to rest; but there was no sleep to Mortier's eyes.—Not the gorgeous and variegated palaces and their rich ornaments, nor the parks and gardens and oriental magnificence that every where surrounded him, kept him wakeful, but the ominous foreboding that some dire calamity was hanging over the silent capital When he entered it, scarce a living soul met his gaze as he looked down the long streets; —and when he broke open the building he found parlors, and bedrooms, and chambers, all furnished and in order—but no occupants.

The sudden abandonment of their homes betokened some secret purpose yet to be fulfilled. The midnight moon was sailing over the city, when the cry of 'Fire!' reached the ears of Mortier; and the first light over Napoleon's falling empire was kindled, and that most wondrous scene of modern times commenced—the burning of Moscow.

Mortier, as governor of the city, immediately issued his orders, and was putting forth every exertion, when at daylight Napoleon hastened to him. Affecting to disbelieve the reports that the inhabitants were firing their own city, he put more rigid commands on Mortier to keep the soldiers from the work of destruction The Marshal simply pointed to some iron covered houses that had not yet been opened, from every crevice of which smoke was issuing like steam from the sides of a pent-up volcano.

Sad and thoughtful, Napoleon turned towards the Kremlin, the ancient palace of the Czars, whose huge structure rose high above the surrounding edifices

In the morning, Mortier, by great exertions, was enabled to subdue the fire. The next night (September 15) at midnight, the sentinels on watch up on the lofty Kremlin saw below them the flames bursting through the houses and palaces, and the cry of 'Fire! fire! fire!' passed through the city.—The dread scene had now fairly opened Fiery balloons were seen dropping from the air and lighting upon the houses —dull explosions were heard on every side from the shut dwellings, and the next moment a bright light burst forth, and the flames were raging through the apartments All was uproar and confusion. The serene air and moonlight of the night before had given way to driving clouds and wild tempests, that swept with the roar of the sea over the city. Flames arose on every side, blazing and cracking in the storm, while clouds of smoke and sparks, in an incessant shower, went driving towards the Kremlin. The clouds themselves seemed turned into fire, rolling in wrath over devoted Moscow.

Mortier, crushed with the responsibility thus thrown upon his shoulders, moved with his young guard amid this desolation, blowing up the houses and facing the tempest and flames, struggling nobly to arrest the conflagration He hastened from place to place amid the blazing ruins, his face blackened with smoke, and his hair and eyebrows singed with the fierce heat.

At length the day dawned—a day of tempest and flame—and Mortier, who had strained every nerve for thirty-six hours, entered a palace and dropped from fatigue. The manly form and stalwart arm that so often carried death into the ranks of the enemy at length gave way, and the gloomy marshal lay and panted in utter exhaustion

But the night of tempest had been succeeded by a day of tempest, and when night again enveloped the city, it was one broad flame, waving to and fro in the blast. The wind had increased to a perfect hurricane, and shifted from quarter to quarter, as if on purpose to swell the sea of fire and extinguish the last hope.

The fire was approaching the Kremlin; and already the roar of the flames, and the crash of the falling houses, and the crackling of burning timbers, were borne to the ears of the startled Emperor—He arose and walked to and fro, stopping convulsively and gazing on the terrific scene. Murat, Eugene and Berthier rushed into his presence, and on their knees besought him to flee; but he still hung to that haughty palace as if it were his empire.

But at length the shout, 'The Kremlin is on fire!' was heard above the roar of the conflagration, and Napoleon reluctantly consented to leave. He descended to the street with his staff, and looked about for a way of egress, but the flames blocked every passage. At length they discovered a postern gate leading to the Moskwa, and entered it; but they had only entered still further into the danger. As Napoleon cast his eye around the open space, girded and arched with fire, smoke and cinders, he saw one single street yet open, but all on fire Into this he rushed, and, amid the crash of falling houses and raging of the flames, over burning ruins, thro' clouds of rolling smoke, and between walls of fire, he pressed on, and at length, half suffocated, emerged in safety in the imperial palace of Petrowsky, nearly three miles distant Mortier, relieved of his anxiety for the Emperor, redoubled his efforts to arrest the conflagration.—His men cheerfully rushed into every danger.—Breathing nothing but smoke and ashes—canopied by flame, smoke and cinders—surrounded by walls of fire that rocked to and fro, and fell with a crash amid the blazing ruins, carrying down with them red hot roofs of iron—he struggled against an enemy that no boldness could awe or courage overcome These brave troops had heard the tramp of thousands of cavalry sweeping to battle, without fear; but now they stood in still terror before the march of the conflagration, under whose burning footsteps was heard the incessant crash of falling houses, and palaces, and churches. The continuous roar of the flames was more terrible than the roar of the artillery; and before this new foe, in the midst of the elements, the awe-struck army stood powerless and affrighted.

When night again descended on the city, it presented a spectacle the like of which was never seen before, which baffles all description. The streets were streets of fire, the heavens a canopy of fire, and the entire body of the city a mass of fire, fed by the hurricane that whirled the blazing fragments in a constant stream through the air. Incessant explosions, from the blowing up of stores of oil, tar, and spirits, shook the very foundation of the city, and sent vast volumes of smoke rolling furiously towards the sky. Huge sheets of canvas on fire came floating like messengers of death thro' the flames —the towers and domes of the churches and palaces glowed with red hot heat over the wild sea below—then, tottering a moment on their basses, were hurled by the tempest into the common ruin. Thousands of wretches, before unseen, were driven by the heat from the cellars and hovels, and streamed in an incessant throng in the streets. Children were seen carrying their parents—the strong the weak; while thousands more were staggering under the loads of plunder they had snatched from the flames. This, too, would frequently take fire in the falling shower, and the miserable creatures would be compelled to drop it, and flee for their lives Oh, it was a scene of fear and woe, inconceivable and indescribable! A mighty and close packed city of houses, and churches, and palaces, wrapped from limit to limit in flames, which are fed by a whirling hurricane, is a sight this world will seldom see.

But this was within the city. To Napoleon, without, the spectacle was still more sublime and terrific. When the flames had overcome all obstacles, and had wrapped everything in their red mantle, that great city looked like a sea of rolling fire, swept by a tempest that drove it into vast billows. Huge domes and towers, throwing off sparks like blazing firebrands, now towered above the waves, and now disappeared in their maddening flow, as they broke high over their tops, scattering their spray of fire against the clouds. The heavens themselves seemed to have caught the conflagration, and the angry masses that swept or rolled over a bosom of fire Columns of flame would rise and sing along the surface of this sea, and huge volumes of black smoke suddenly shoot into the air, as if volcanoes were working below The black form of the Kremlin alone towered above the chaos, now wrapped in flame and smoke, and then again merging into view—standing amid the scene of desolation and terror like virtue in the midst of a burning world enveloped but unscathed by the devouring elements Napoleon stood and gazed on this scene in silent awe. Though nearly three miles distant, the windows and walls of his apartment were so hot he could scarcely bear his hand against them—Said he, years afterwards.

'It was the spectacle of the sea and billows of fire, a sky and clouds of flame—mountains of red rolling flame, like immense waves of the sea, alternately bursting forth, and elevating themselves to skies of fire, and then sinking into the ocean below. Oh, it was the most naked, the most sublime, and the most terrific sight the world ever beheld!"

MANUFACTURES FROM THE COCOA NUT.

The cocoa manufactures are remarkable for simplicity of the process resorted to, and for the usefulness of the articles produced, in many instances, from materials formerly thrown away as useless. The cocoa-nut as it comes from the tree consists, first, of the outer husk, composed of fibres matted and adhering together; secondly, the shell, and thirdly, the kernel. The manufacturers up to the present time employed only the outer husk and kernal. The natives of India have long used the fibres obtained by rotting the outer husk till the fibres can be separated by beating the husks. The fibres are spun into yarn by the native girls and women, by rubbing such fibres between the palm of the hand and the surface of the leg, and in this manner is made the large quantity of Coir yarn brought into that country, and used for weaving cloths for covering passages and rooms, and also matting for various uses. Notwithstanding this rude mode of spinning the fibres up to the present time no better means have yet been introduced; and the whole of the yarn employed in England is imported. This, however, may be accounted for by reason of there having been no practical mode of obtaining the fibre in Britian from the husks till very lately. Now, however, that ready means of obtaining the fibres from the husk are known it is reasonable to expect some better means of spinning will be invented. The husks are beaten to obtain the fibre; which consist of three descriptions first, a light elastic fibre for stuffing furniture; secondly, a coarses fibre used for making mats; and, thirdly, a strong fibre used for brushes and brooms. The husks are soaked for some time, then subjected to the pressure of grooved rollers, and then, by successive processes of carding by revolving cylinders armed with bent teeth, the fibres are combed out, the separate descriptions of fibres being deposited in different receivers. The uses of these fibres are for making of brushes, brooms, mats, and mattresses. The kernels are dried in the sun, then pounded in mills, to extract the oil; but in more modern times the dried kernel has been pressed between mats in powerful presses. The oil, for the most part, is sent to England, and was formily largely employed in the manufacture of candles. The oil being, when it comes to London, of about the consistency of lard, requires pressing to seperate the stearine from the œlaine, and this is done between mats of cocoa-nut fibre pressed in powerful presses. The stearine was used for candles at first alone, then in combination with stearic acid of tallow, producing what are called composite candles; and it was the introduction of stearine of cocoa-nut, combined with steric acid which constituted the first step to the great improvement which has taken place in the manufacture of candles. The larger quantities of cocoa-nut oil, however, are now exported to France, to make soap—the use of such oil in candle making being now, for the most part, substituted by palm oil. It has lately been proposed, in Ceylon, to employ the juice of the cocoa-nut tree for the making of sugar; it being considered that each tree is capable of producing upwards of one hundred weight per annum, and that an acre of cocoa-nut trees, requiring little cultivation, will produce at least twice as much sugar as an acre of sugar cane requiring much more cultivation. —Scientific American.

THE MINUTENESS OF CREATION.—It is utterly impossible for the mind to conceive of the almost infinite minuteness of an atom. A single grain of gold, for instance, might be beaten out so as to cover a square foot of space, and yet we have not approached its reduction to atoms. An old mechanical illustration by Delper, he would give, as he had never seen it quoted: it was this: Reduce a cubic inch of sulphur to fine powder, and you may cover with it an area of six square miles. Take one grain of this powder and triturate it thoroughly with ninety-nine grains of sugar of milk, and its presence would be detectible in every grain of the hundred. Take a grain of this, and treat it in the same way with other ninety-nine grains of sugar of milk, and so on; at the third dilution as we may call it, the powder thus resulting from a cubic inch of sulphur would cover two square miles of area; at the fifth, the empire of Austria at the sixth, the whole of Asia and Africa; at the ninth, it would cover the entire surface of the sun, with all its planets, and all their satellites. And yet, although in every grain of this powder the sulphur was found to be present, we had not reduced it to atoms. Again, it is well known that every drop of putrid water, under certain circumstances contains millions of animalcules, invisible except to high powers of the microscope. And every one of these animalcules is a highly organized being, having at least something analogous to a skeleton,—capable of action—of pursuing, of retreating, of attack and of defence. The globules of the blood of the tea plant are perceivable only with a powerful microscope, and yet these animalcules must have blood and that blood must consist of similar globules. Once more! The Boviata Giganteo, species of mushroom, in the space of twelve hours shoots up from a scarcely perceptible germ to a plant a foot in diameter. Every square inch of its surface contains three hundred and thirty six millions of cells, every cell, with their six sides is divided from those around it by filaments of far more complex structure than an atom of potash, and we have not got a glimpse even of the atoms of which they are composed. He would confess, inquiries such as these inspired him with but one feeling—fear. It was as if he were taken, by some profound archaeomer, far amongst the worlds that people infinite space, and he was ready to cry out for some one to lead him back to solid ground once more. One thing only give him comfort; he knew of something higher, deeper than those facts—it was their idea. These were, after all, only the letters in which the infinite idea is blazoned. He felt as did the deep-thoughted Pascal, when he exclaimed, that although the universe were to crush him, he would still feel himself greater that the universe, for he knew that and how it was crushing him. PRESENCE OF MIND.

The Southern Christian Advocate coutains a fine article on the above, from which we clip the following:

Presence of mind is occasionally shown in quick conception of some device or expedient, such as we usually suppose to be an emanation of supe for intellect. This has been repeatedly exemplified in rencontres with the insane. A lady was one evening sitting in her drawing-room alone, when the only other inmate of the house, a brother who for a time had been betraying a tendency to unsoundness of mind, entered with a carving-knife in the hand, and shutting the door, came up to her and said, "Margaret, an odd idea has occurred to me. I wish to paint the head of John the Baptist, and I think yours might make an excellent study for it. So, if you please, I will cut off your head. The lady looked at her brother's eye, and seeing in it no token of a jest, concluded that he meant to do as he said. There was an open window and a balcony by her side, with a street in front; but a moment satisfied her that safety did not lay that way. So, putting on a smiling countenance, she said with the greatest apparent cordiality, "That is a strange idea, George; but would it not be a pity to spoil this pretty new lace tippet I have got? I'll just step to my room to put it off, and be with you again in half a minute." Without waiting to give him time to consider, she stepped lightly across the floor, and passed out. In another moment she was safe in her own room, whence she easily gave alarm, and the madman was secured.

A lady, one day, returning from a drive, looked up and saw two of her children, one about five, and the other about four years old, outside the garret window, which they were busily employed in rubbing with their handkerchiefs, in imitation of a person whom they had seen a few days before cleaning the windows. They had clambered over the bars which had been intended, not to appear to observe them; she did not utter one word, but hastened up to the nursery, and instead of rushing forward to snatch them in, which might have frightened them, and caused them to lose their balance, she stood a little apart, and called gently to them, and bade them come in. They saw no appearance of hurry or agitation in their mamma, so took their time, and deliberately climbed the bars, and landed safely in the room. One look of terror, one tone of impatience from her and the little creatures might have become confused, and lost their footing, and been destroyed.

For the "Liberia Herald"

Mr. Herald.

I see in your last paper an article over the signature of "Edward," which I suppose was intended as a reply to Wm. Providence, who made some pertinent inquires in relation to what the missionaries are doing towards civilizing &c of the benighted heathen within the boundaries of Liberia, to which I purpose to take some little notice of. Edward in speaking of unoccupied missionary fields, would have your readers to understand Wm. Providence to mean, that those fields unoccupied should be occupied, by those missionaries now acting in the field, and to enable them to do so, they must first leave the present fields now occupied, to attend those unoccupied, of which Wm. Providence speaks. But not so Edward, and for the satisfaction of your readers, and friend Edward, it is proper that I should state fully the ground of Wm. Providence's inquires and complaints;—which is this: the fields that are said to be occupied and are so much neglected, is in consequence of the missionaries, turning their attention to merchandizing, instead of attending to their heavenly calling, for Wm. Providence knows full well that all of the inviting fields of this dark region is not the work of a day, or a year, but is a gradual work that must be accomplished in the Lord's own time: but there must be a begining, and I had charitably hoped that it had; but alas! alas! they have stopped by the way, and are grasping after that which is contrary to the spirituality of their holy religion, money; that which perishes in the use thereof. Edward says they must trade, or exchange foreign articles for the products of the soil, or starve; strange language indeed Edward, knowing as well as you do, that those benevolent societies that sends those missionaries out to preach with success, and to hold up the true light of salvation to a lost world, makes every necessary provision for those thus employed, by giving them a competent support yearly; and how can they starve! should they not exchang foreign produce for that of the soil of the country, for I know that the less the missionary trade with natives, the more confidence will they have in them. But agin, Edward speaks of Wm. Providence as having contradicted himself when he speaks of our churches being crowded with native converts, that were raised in the families of our good christian folks, you wish the world to believe that those good christian folks in Liberia are the fruits of missionary labor, not so Edward, don't take so much credit to yourself, for they will tell you to your teeth it is not the case. Again Edward, you say how could these good christian folks have acknowledge of their duty were it not for the doctrines &c &c which they receive from the missionaries, I precieve that Edward are on very good terms with himself; however, I am sure of one thing, that Edward has not been instrumental in making any of those good christian folks of whom Wm. P. speaks since he have been blessed to be among them, again Edward used a little scripture in his reply to Wm. P. I think it necessary that Wm should use a little scripture too, such was the importance of the message given to the missionaries in the time of the saviour's mission on earth, that he expressly commanded them to go in haste, and publish the news of salvation by faith and repentance; their once crucified saviour and was not allowed to salute any one by the way; as the time was too precious, and the souls of men; to spare any time whatever, again hear what the apostle Paul says to Timothy, first; Tim: 4 & 16 verse, take heed unto thyself, and unto the doctrine; continue in them: for in doing this, thou shalt save thyself, and them that hear thee, and I will give the same advice to you, Edward, Oh! Edward, you certainly is in need of light upon your path, way, as I conceive you to be altogether out of the old way, that leads to those blessed regions, of eternal light and glory, I would like to see you standing upon that high and noble platform, pointing sinners to the lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world then I will be able to follow you as you follow Christ.—but cannot at present.

Wm. PROVIDENCE.

A VOICE FROM CAPE PALMAS.

"The Love of Liberty brought us here."

REPUBLIC & ANNEXATION!

Whereas, we the undersigned on proper principles of natural freedom, regard ourselves identified in feeling to the people of the Republic of Liberia, do; highly and enthusiastically approve of the step which they have taken to be one among the nations of the earth. And whereas we believe that it was for this glorious purpose and end, why the Colonization Society was founded, and that this result prompted us to forsake our home, and we do cordially, and in the fear of God, who planted and sustains, us here, adopt the following Resolutions.

Resolved—That we believe that the time has come wherein we should begin to think, speak, and act upon the important and desirable subject of our being annexed to the Republic of Liberia, and as freemen in common with them, shall use every honorable exertion to be united to them with credit to ourselves, and posterity.—We hope to do nothing in the dark, but rather to advise and confer with the Parent Society, that we may receive from them all possible aid and advice in such an event.——

Resolved—That we will with due respect, to our present situation, compliment the 26 of July 1851, it being the Anniversary of the Republic of Liberia, and all who feel themselves united by communities to the Republic; are requested to give a small amt to have prepared a Lunch for the occasion.

Resolved—That we will from time to time advise and confer with the Agent or Gov. on all matters touching our Relation with the Society, while in the prosecution of this our desirable object.

Mr Editor: We are happy to say that the 'complimentary Lunch," went off in fine style, and the gentlemen who are supporters of this, circular, feel quite lifted up because of the prospect ahead. We are gratified to know of the success of the Republic, and it is our high wish that she may continue to ascend untill she shall reach the zenith of its glory. We at this end of Liberia, are not less concerned about the welfare of our common country, and we hope, that the good people of the Republic, will be assured, that we appreciate the step they have taken. Freedom, is our theme, and we hope to sustain it by perserverance and industry. The supporters of this circular on the 26th of July last, were only 18. and we regret to say that we were opposed by the remainder of our fellow citizens. Our lives were threatened, and the premises where we resorted, to partake of the 'lunch' was invaded by a mob, determined to stop free speech, we however, stood our ground and conquered. The ladies deserve great praise for their kind attention. Mrs Rus-wurm, Mrs Dr McGill, Mrs Thompson, Mrs Rev Burns, Mrs Dennis, and Mrs Drayton, treated us to very fine cakes, and as they appeared so patriotic we of course were obliged to carry out the dearest object of our heart. We think the feeling is quite more moderate now with those who opposed us so vehemently.

If our time was sufficient we would feel bound to give you a full description of the whole affair,—the toasts, and the notes of apologies, please accept of our best wishes and prayer for the success of the Republic, and we hope, soon to be united to the glorious and noble fabric of freedom—the proff of the coloured man's ability to govern. All a Hail the Republic!!!—God save the infant Republic!!!—

Yours Respectfully in the Bond of Republicanism

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Herald,

"A Baptist" has been pleased to speak of the Rev. John H. Cheeseman in your number of the 19th of November, as designing to convey the idea that in all Liberia there is not a pious christian to be found, but his brother committee and himself. I really regret Mr. H. that the person whoever he may be, has attempted to draw such an inference from Mr. C's writings. Mr C. was not writing to gain the favor of any one abroad, but to say what he believed in reference to such persons as would answer for an interior station. Mr. C. does not for a moment question the fact that there are pious baptists in Liberia, but he really questions whether every pious baptist would answer to take the superintendence of a Mission station in the interior or on the atlantic.

Mr. Cheeseman begs that his baptist brethen will not indulge the vain idea that he regards himself any thing more than a sinner saved by grace.

Now Mr. H. There are several remarks in the article by "A Baptist," which were not intended to be answered, they being perfectly gratuitous, consequently I conclude this short item by saying why trouble Mr. C! what evil has he done?

Is it possible that he a poor baptist is despised by his brethen because he has written to American what he regarded as the truth? Let all baptists know Mr. Herald that Mr. Cheeseman intends to write whatever concerns his business, while he continues to act in his present capacity.

A Wellwisher of the Baptists.

BRITISH CONSULATE IN LIBERIA.

Monrovia 28th: Nov: 1851.

To The Editor of the "Liberia Herald"

Sir.

In april last I received from Mr. David Moore a ginned sample of cotton which I transmitted to Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign affairs, and which was sent to the President of the chamber of commerce at Manchester.

That gentleman in reply reports that so far as the small quantity sent will justify any expression of opinion, the cotton itself in its natural state, possesses qualities which under better treatment in the cleaning would render it very useful to British manufactures; and says that "it has been manifestly very much injured" in the ginning, and its value greatly impaired "thereby. An experienced broker values it in its "present state, and at today's prices" (28th June 1851.) "at from 5 to 5 1-2d per. lb; there is therefore little doubt, "that, if it had not been so much injured in the "ginning the quality of it would be worth 6 to 6 1-2 d per. lb

Mr. Bazley further says, that, if the landowners of Liberia will turn their attention in earnest to the cultivation of cotton, and if they will clean what they raise by hand rather than using the gin,—"in which manner the safest "test of the working value of the cotton would be "best obtained,"—it would give the chamber of commerce at Manchester great pleasure to receive as much cotton prepared in this way as I could send them.

I can only add, that, I shall be greatly obliged if you will permit me through the medium of your columns to assure your readers that I shall be happy to forward Mr. Bazley's views.

I am, Sir, your most obt. Servt.

PROCLAMATION!!

"Whereas on the morning of the 5th inst a treacherous and cruel attack was made by a band of savages, headed by one Grando, a native of Piccanny Cess, on a settlement of this Republic, known as Fishtown, Grand Bassa Point, who sacked and burned said village, and barbarously murdered nine of its inhabitants; And whereas the said Grando, subsequently, on the morning of the 15th inst—having succeeded in inducing three or four of the Chiefs in that neighborhood to join him with a large force—made a desperate attack on the Township of Bassa Cove, but was happily repulsed; And whereas the said Grando, and the Chiefs of Tabacconee, New Cess, and Tradetown are still in arms, and rebelion against the authority of the Government; And whereas it is expedient—information having reached me that the said Chiefs are receiving supplies of munitions of war &c &c from vessels trading on that part of our coast—to interdict all trade and intercourse with the Chiefs and natives, or other persons, residing in the districts of Tabacconee, New Cess, and Tradetown, that is to say, between Grand Bassa Point on the North west and Tradetown Point on the South east:—

Therefore I Joseph J. Roberts, President of the Republic of Liberia, by virtue of authority in me vested, do hereby interdict and prohibit every species of intercourse whatever with any person or persons residing between the points above mentioned. Any master, supercargo, or other person, in charge of any vessel or cargo, who, having a knowledge of this edict, shall be found violating its provisions, shall be seized and with the vessel, taken into any port of this Republic for legal adjudication.

It is further ordered that all persons having trading factories between the points above named will remove, or cause the same to be removed on or before the 15th day of December next ensuing. Any such owner or owners of factories requiring the assistance of the government to enable him or them to remove said factories, will apply to the Secretary of the Treasury who will supply the necessary aid.

Given at Monrovia this 24th. Day of November A. D. 1851. And of the Republic the 4th—

Acting Sec. of State.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, DECEMBER 11th 1851.

Mr Herald—I send you the following extracts from a scandalous letter addressed, by a person in this place, to an eminent philanthropist in London, who, for many years, and more especially within the last few years, has taken great interest in the prosperity of Liberia; and who now feels deeply concerned at receiving such statements respecting the character of a people in whose welfare he has felt the liveliest interest.

As the letter contains so many falsehoods intended to wound the reputation of the whole people of this Republic I think it necessary that you should impart it to the public, that the people may know something of the pernicious statements that have gone abroad respecting them; and how shamefully they are misrepresented and traduced.

These black and infamous misrepresentations, Mr. Herald, as applied to the whole people of Liberia will doubtless provoke a word or two from you. With respect to the base and scandalous imputations respecting myself, I leave the author to the stings of his own guilty conscience. I, however, here once solemnly, wholly and publicly deny all he has written in regard to the Gallinas Country; and also what he has been pleased to state in reference to me, and a certain Frenchman at Grand Cape Mount.—I repeat sir, the statements are basely false, in every particular, and I stand prepared to prove that they are as malicious as they are false.

I am Mr. Herald.
Yours &c. &c.

J. J. ROBERTS.

Monrovia Dec. 2nd 1851.

London, July 11th, 1851.

My dear sir:

I have not had the pleasure of hearing from you for a length of time, but suppose that your engagements, like my own, are neither few nor far between. But despite the unceasing demands upon my time, I must make leisure to communicate to you some extracts from an important letter recently received here from Liberia.

The letter is dated "Monrovia, February 25th, 1851," and says, "Of the state of society here, I can speak only as I have found it in Monrovia. I hesitate not to say, that society here, —in its moral and social aspects, especially, is at a low, a very low mark. The prevailing principle, in every dealing of man with his fellow-man here—especially with foreigners, chiefly, perhaps, with an Englishman—seems to be to get every thing, if possible, and give nothing in return.—All idea of equivalents seems to be utterly foreign from conception. * * * The version here accepted, teaches, that it is permissible to obtain the effects of others, and then pertinaciously to persist, not in avoiding simply, but in actually refusing to give an equivalent in return. Hence, when observations are passed as to the odium which the community is bringing upon itself, by countenancing individuals who are notorious for having swindled foreign traders, once and again, out of considerable quantites of goods, or large sums of money, it is unblushingly maintained in defence, that they had a right to get credit, and if captains choose to take their chance to trust any one, it is their affair alone. The English is made the chief nation in this popularized system of frauds, from exaggerated notions of the superabundant wealth of British merchants, and of the overflowing tone of the Englishmen to the negro. * * "Can you wonder that there are some of the British merchants who represent the religion of the Liberians to be hypocrisy; their morality, a pretence; and their vaunted desire to redeem and elevate the African character, a sham? You will not be surprised, I think, after what I have written, to find, in the end, your experimental cotton farm on the St. Paul's, a sadly losing concern. I may not conceal it from you, that, it is not the intention of the people of this Republic, that you shall ever make any thing by it. They hope indeed that cotton cultivation will succeed here, because they believe it will be lucrative to themselves; but you may depend upon it, that, as they have got the idea, that money is of no value to the gentlmen interested in that speculation, they will ever charge extravagantly high for their services in connection with it, so as to make it impossible it can ever pay you. You may get cotton from Liberia—you may have it constantly, abundantly, and good; but my impression is that if you ever do it will be when the Liberian is the producer, and the Englishman the purchaser merely."

"Of the condition and prospects of the government, I hardly know what to say; for I confess that I some times fear the very worst. The resources of the State are derivable solely from the imposts upon imports; and if, therefore, in consequence of the repeated severe losses to which they are exposed, the foreign traders (the only importers to any extent) are compelled to cease their commercial intercourse with this Republic, bankruptcy must inevitably follow. One would suppose then, that policy, the desire of self-preservation, a principle every where operative, would urge the authorities here to interfere with the commercial transactions of the citizens so far as to compel honesty of dealing. But such is not the case. As a case in point, I may say that there is at the present moment, a French trader at Cape Mount, landing a large proportion of cargo, with the expectation of receiving palm oil in return. President Roberts has been there pending this transaction, and although it seems that the Frenchman told him his prospect, while he very well knew that there had never been one cask of palm oil made or purchased at Cape Mount, he refrained (fearing, as I believe, to offend the two Liberian citizens who are receiving the goods,) to give the Frenchman a hint as to the possibility of his being deceived. These facts were communicated to me by a partizan of President Roberts, who, when I indignantly condemned the unkind reserve of the President, attempted to exculpate his conduct by insinuating that, perhaps, after all, the Frenchman was bargaining for some thing more abundant at Cape Mount than palm oil—meaning slaves. But if this alternative is to be accepted, what is proved by it? why simply this: —two citizens of the Republic of Liberia are openly receiving a cargo of goods, to supply slaves in return: the President is aware of the whole affair, and although lying in the "Lark" for 24 hours, he does nothing in the premises! I confess that for one, I do not believe this of President Roberts. I am afraid that he would connive at fraudulent transactions on the part of Liberians with lawful traders; but I believe him to be sincerely opposed to slave trading. * * * Since then, several other little things have come to light, which are far too personal for me to mention, further than that they all illustrate the observation I made, that from fear of offending a known sharper, he would, by his silence, allow a stranger to be defrauded; thus by withholding more than is meet, laying up poverty and ruin for his country—

"I am bound also to state, that, although the President went up in the "Lark" recently to Gallinas, with the avowed intention of paying for the territory alleged to have been purchased from the Chiefs of that district, not one foot of soil in all the Gallinas country has been purchased by the Liberian Government.

My informant (the partizan of the President already alluded to) declared to me that the utmost the chiefs would concede was the right of sovereignty. They distinctly disclaimed all intention of selling any part of the country."

Much more might be extracted from the letter, but have I not the time. Yet you have the pith of it.

Yours truly

We insert the above extracts from a letter sent to England, dated at Liberia, Feby. 1851, that Liberians may have another evidence of the character, candor and kind feelings of most of the Englishmen, who come among us for the purpose of trade, or who come to reside here for any other purpose; and to whom, knowing their querulous, and meddlesome disposition, we endeavour always, to avoid giving any just cause of offense. But even here, we are, not unlikely performing an unnecessary service. For whilst there has been no abatement in the feelings of high respect and veneration, with which we regard the British people as a nation, we have been too long upon the coast, and our intercourse has been too extensive among the visitors to it, not to have undergone, with others besides Liberians, a material modification in our estimate of the character of some of the individuals who compose that nation; so that whilst we still admire and venerate the British government and people generally, for their magnanimity, generosity and high toned philanthropy, we have yet to lament that a people so noble and so generous, should be so wretchedly caricatured & misrepresented by the de-humanised specimens that come to this coast; for whom the utmost liberality and charity can entertain no feelings but pity and contempt. But this is th "land of dead Ned" and few can be found to come here, who can find bread and water elsewhere. And if we must be abused, we leave it to others not concerned, to say, whether we should regard it a matter of consolation or regret, that we are abused by those, whose good opinion, where they are known, would render us suspicious, or who owe their bread and butter, and all their personal consequence to the opportunity afforded by our establishment here.

It may be proper to remark that the writer of the odious and abusive extracts, appears from his style, to be superior to that class of visitors and residents, to which we shall have occasion more particularly to refer. We know of but one Englishman, who has resided long enough in our midst to ascertain, by his own observation, any thing correctly of the charges alledged; nor had this solitary one, at the date of the letter, been here sufficiently long to obtain the necessary information by actual personal inspection, to justify him in venturing upon the allegation of so grave charges, against a people, every where else persecuted and trodden down, and who, here, in this last place of effort left to them, are struggling for an existence. But as the intercourse of that solitary Englishman up to the date of the letter, had, as since it has, been confined to these Captains and traders, his extracts are entitled to no more regard than the old stereotyped villifications. If the writer has stated truth, let him come out manfully, & vindicate and establish what he has said. We challenge investigation. We might very properly record an emphatic negative against every one, or nearly every one of the writer's allegations, and throw him upon the proof of them and rest there without uttering another word: the ordinary rules of society and also of judicial inquiry could demand no more. But in deference to the opinion of our friends abroad, we submit the following remarks.

The state of society in Liberia, or rather Monrovia, may, as the writer remarks—"be at a low,—very low mark" The most of our days have been spent in Liberia; we cannot, therefore, assign the exact height of the state of society in other places, so as to institute a comparison. Nor would it be wholly equitable to demand, that society here in Monrovia shall be in all respects, what society is, in polished Europe and America. We shall stand acquitted if not vindicated, if on inquiry and examination, society here in its moral and religious aspects, and in its redeeming bearing upon the natives, should compare favorably with society in the settlements, of other nations along the coast. Does the writer know any thing of the state of society in the settlements upon the gold coast? Will he point out the features of difference in society there, and society here? There are very striking differences, and if necessary, they can be pointed out. We ask these questions, not for the mere purpose of recrimination, but to provoke investigation, and by the result of that investigation, to make it manifest, that the charges, if true, are more strictly applicable to others than to us, and that being urged against us alone, they have their foundation in a fiendish malice. Are there no swindlers, insolvent debtors, drunkards, hypocrites, and pretenders in London, or Liverpool or Bristol, or Gambia, or Sierra Leone, or Cape Coast. We might infer an affirmative response, as to some of these places at least, if Mr. Redman testified truly, when on oath, he swore, there is not an honest man in Sierra Leone; or if Capt——, an Englishman, spake truth, when he denounced all the merchants there as cheats and swindlers.

We have been led to suppose there are some such in these European cities at least; especially as all the English papers contain reports of trials and convictions, and long lists of insolvencies—and it is yet in our recollection, how, that not long since, the flourishing colony at the Cape of Good Hope, was in an attitude of defiance of the home government, for an attempt to make it a penal colony, & to flood it with criminals from the European portion of the empire. Has the writer heard of a Boolum Shore, of Isles de Loss, of numerous factories up the Port Logo, and Rokell branches of Sierra Leone River—of a Nunez and a Pongas—of the causes which keep the very large portions of their population there; has he learned whether they reside there from choice, or merely to avoid too close familiarity with a certain official called Bailiff? If he is ignorant of these facts, we would advise him to enquire into them, that he may commence the work of reformation at home; and carry it on to completion, ere he utters his righteous malediction upon people abroad. And should he ascertain these facts to be true—namely, that there are in the places we have named, characters of the stamp of those, which in Liberia have roused his indignation, but should yet decline to enter actively and practically upon the work of reformation; still if alongside of his denunication of us, he will put down his condemnation of them, we will award to him the character of a candid, consistent and impartial censor. Now we feel assured that the writer was perfectly acquainted with the truth of all we have openly stated, as also of that of all at which we have hinted.

Why then is he so loud and vehement in abuse of these crimes here, and so perfectly dumb in respect of them elsewhere? Why is bankruptcy and insolvency on the part of Liberia, so loudly talked of by Englishmen—when these same Englishmen pass by the same conduct and condition in their own colonies, in perfect silence? The reason is obvious to us. Change the color of our skin, and what now are crimes of deepest dye, will fade into venia blemishes—will be reported as Englishmens' crimes are reported by Englishmen, in inaudible whispers, except to the ear of a compatriot. But why do these persecutors of Liberia deal in vague and barren generalities—why not come out plainly, and state the sum due the English, by these villianous Liberians? The fact is, Liberians owe English merchants much less than they owe others, and for these reasons; the English confine their trade mostly to the coast, and not to ports of entry; and they have much smaller invoices than the vessels of any other nation, seldom more than will load them with Palm Oil, at native prices. We have been at some pains to ascertain, and there is reason to believe there are not five thousand pounds due by all Liberia, to British merchants: in Monrovia not five hundred. Perhaps the writer of the extracts will inquire and inform us.

But even this aspect of the subject will be softened by a little attention to the character of the English traders who come here; and to the means which they some times adopt in the prosecution of their trade. We will not place ourself in the unenviable position of the writer of the extracts—namely that of a wholesale calumniater, by uttering a sweeping condemnation of a whole people: which perhaps we might do with far more justice and truth, of the class we have alluded to, than he has done of us: yet we regret to be compelled to say, that, with few exceptions, the English traders who come here, are from the lowest dregs of English society—are men profoundly ignorant in every thing, excepting only such as relate to the tar-bucket—quadrant and the low species of barter trade, &c; which obtain on this coast—are hostile to every measure of their own government, that has in it the least tincture of liberality or justice—can see no reason nor utility of cruisers on the coast, except to protect them in just such pursuits as they may think proper to follow, and being raised suddenly to a command and responsibility, so much above any thing they ever dreamed of, they foolishly fancy that every one the coast must be ready to pay their persons and their opinions the humbiest deference. They are impertinent, intrusive and curious about matters with which they have no concern, to a degree which contempt for their ignorance, and a consideration of the condition of their early life, alone render tolerable.—Have systematically and pertinaciously opposed our government; have abused all the indulgences shown to them; have either from ignorance or malevolence endeavoured to impress upon the minds of the natives, that these indulgences were a grant, either of fear on our part, or to the demand of a right on theirs: They have used all their ingenuity, and no little of their owners' money to excite the natives to opposition to our laws, and resistance of our authority—and when we have been at no little expense to settle hostilities among them, they have been personally, and by agents and emissaries secretly at work, to defeat and render abortive our attempts. They make very large presents to the Chiefs; much larger perhaps than they would do, was no American settlement with custom house regulations near, and then to enrage the Chiefs against our laws, they tell them I would give you plenty tother thing, no more 'Merica man make duty too high, spose no be for duty palaver you can get plenty tother things—you make rich too much. In a word they are just such in their moral habits—social maxims and mental capacity, as one might fancy vengeance would spare, when virtue is to undergo an ordeal, and society to be tortured.

That this picture is not overdrawn, we leave it to the few better informed and better bred of the English traders to determine; and we submit it with very little concern to the judgement of the commanders and officers of H. B. M. Cruisers on the coast.

Now it is from these chiefly, from a Townly—a Murray—a Pannel—a Henderson—and a Lawrence from whom the people in England and the writer of the extracts derive their information. Sworn enemies to Liberia—firm and fast friends of the slave trader, men some of whom have used their owners property to excite the natives to insubordination and hostility against the Liberian Authority; Men, who, while they are eternally carping about the few hundreds which Americans owe them, are silent about the uncounted thousands which they have thrown away among, and which are due to them by, the natives. And why? simply because among the natives they are free from all the restraints of law, order and decency—a liberty so congenial with their unsophisticated nature; whilst among the Americans they are compelled to observe in some degree, these to them odious regulations. The American settlers learned in the land of their youth and from the few book they have read, what is due from man to man; and established here as men, they endeavour to demand and reciprocate this right. This, however, does not suit these steam-made gentry. They have heard we were in subjection to a dominant class in the country where we were born—that the laws abandoned us to the tender mercies of just such conscience-wanting and virtue-abandoned beings as they are; and forgetting how they pined without symp thy in the potatoe fields of Ireland, and famished unheeded on the quays of Great Britain, they would look upon and treat us with the disdain, with which they are regarded by the respectable at home. Who are these traders, in the name of justice and candor, we ask, who are these Captains, that so much reliance is placed upon their adverse testimony, when Liberia is concerned! Are they men whom their employers invite to a social meal, or a social chat? Do they look upon the interior of their owners' parlor? Are they ever in their owners' presence, except when touching their hats, they say "I have arrived sir!—or when beckoned to the door of the office only to hear, here are your papers, get to sea as soon as you can?" Is there one in ten, who can tell whether Vattel was a North American Indian or a Chinese? Whether Blackstone wrote on law or physiology? Whether there is any difference, abstractedly considered, between the sovereign rights of a nation having only ten ships of war, and another having a thousand? Put the question to nine in ten, and the unhesitating answer will be, the nation with a thousand ships, has more right—because it has the most power! Power with them is the measure of right; and that state of society is to them most delightful, and most to be desired, in which each individual will, is allowed to be law. Hence their silence about the indebtedness of the natives, and their eternal carping at us; and hence their constant foolish threats to bring upon us the power of the British Navy if we attempt to restrain them.

But these traders delight in competition and they delight also in boasting. Each one has an owner worth more millions than Liberia has citizens. And he is sent out to break up all the Liberians take from them all the trade and gather it into his own hand. He proceed, down the coast, finds squatting here and there along the beach, an American loafer just as you would find loafers on the quays and around the ginshops in London or Liverpool.

As his object is to set up opposition he avoids every respectable factory, and consorts with these loafers. They tell him fine tales about the employement they had lately left—how much oil they bought for Mr—and how he did not pay them—and how they left him and how they only want a supply of goods to purchase an immense quantity of oil and in a very short time.

The bait is taken; and large sums of money, or amounts of goods are landed to an individual whom no Merchant in Liberia would credit a farthing!! The foreigner proceeds down the coast, returns for oil, but finds none. The next we hear is a thunder of abuse of all Liberia for consequences which his own malicious act brought upon him. But perhaps we shall be told we are sustaining the allegations of dishonesty contained in the extract. Well let it be so. If truth sustain them we are content But if we admit a lamentable fact, applicable alike to Liberia and to England, and the writer of the extracts admits it as to us, but denies, or withholds the declaration of it as to his own people, it will show that at least, in one respect we are in advance of him; that is in candor and ingenuousness.

We have said enough of the character of these men. A few words will suffice for their conduct. Instances are in the recollection of many present in which English traders were warned in regard to certain proceeding which it was supposed they were about to enter upon. What has been the consequence—Why they have supposed that those who advised them had an interest in doing so—and have not only pushed more vigorously than before, in the course they had intended to adopt, and against which friendly warning had been given them, but have actually made sure by meanly rehearsing what was told them from the purest motives and in the secrecy of friendship. English traders come here and sell goods to merchants in this place to be paid for in produce at the leeward factories. They take orders on these factories. When they arrive there—they retain the orders until they have purchased all they can persuade the factors to sell them. They then present the orders which they know cannot be paid, because they have purchased the Oil that was to pay them. They quietly pocket the orders return here and demand payment. Will the English traders deny that this has been their custom? Many of our merchants have been sadly embarrassed by this mode of procedure. Recently our people have learned better in this matter, and when they have chosen to keep the orders quietly in the pocket until they had purchased the Oil for which the orders had been given, they have been as quietly told—you were to receive payment at the factory, and as you chose to keep back the order until you had put it out of the power of the drawer to pay you, you may keep it in your pocket until you can get your money. Thus occasionally the biter is bitten. But O what grimaces and anathemas and imprecations upon all Liberia—what abuse of the government that it does not at once manacle these villanous merchants, and sell them for the payment of debts, which the clamorous creditors themselves put it out of their power to pay!!

We have already drawn out our article to a length we did not at first anticipate: we must therefore be brief in what we may further say.

In relation to charges against the President that he did not apprise Celse that he could not purchase Palm Oil at Cape Mount, it is only necessary to state that it is wholly groundless. Mr. Celse who is daily expected from France will we are sure contradict the stupid charge if requested to do so. The President lost nearly a whole day endeavoring to get an interview with Mr. C. to warn him against his course, but could not. He went on board his vessel and requested that his Captain would say to him that he would not collect Cargo of Oil in that region in five years: Mr. Celse has since confessed he received the message, but thought the President was only anxious he would remove his seat of trade to Monrovia. The Gallinas affair is next and last: and thus that matter stands—The natives there agreed to sell the lands and cede all territorial and political jurisdiction over them. The price demanded was more than at that time could be conveniently paid. Arrangements were put on foot to meet their demand. In the interim, Parker, who had been left there by the English Commodore, fearing that the arrangements might affect his interest, and terminate his authority induced the natives by false representations to retract from a part of the agreement, shrewdly concluding that a recession by them from a part of the stipulations, would induce a like a retreat by the President from the remainder.

The remarks in relations to cotton are really too stupid and contradictory of the other to merit a reply. Are the people really so cunning as to cheat all the Englishmen who come here, and yet so stupid as not to know, that to induce foreign merchants or manufacturers or agriculturalists to prosecute any enterprise here, which demands an outlay of capital it must be made lucrative to those who are thus expending their money? If the Agent of this cotton establishment chose to adopt measures and institute regulations with which the people generally could not comply—which they foresaw would prove ruinous to the experiment—which inevitable ruinous result they not only foresaw but fore-told to said Agent, and to which said Agent replied "I am authorised to do as I choose and I have made my arrangement, and I am satisfied with them If all this is true—shall I blame be thrown upon the people? Now we are prepared to prove not only all this, and that by J. K. Straw himself, but we are prepared to prove further that other and much more feasible arrangements were proposed to Mr. Straw, which would have met the concurrence of all classes, which Mr. S. approved, and which he was only prevented from adopting—so he said, by the necessity of returning to England. Mr. Straw will be out shortly and we use his name that he may correct us if we have misstated.

We have thus gone hastily over the whole ground of complaint and charges. We have stated that if society here is low, it is not lower than in other settlements and colonies of much older date upon this coast. If religion is here only hypocrisy, morality a pretence and a desire to improve the natives a sham, there is at least the merit of a resemblance of these desirables: a merit which others cannot boast, and that the character of our assailants giving no claim to credit, we demand a full investigation of the charges, and a comparison of the points upon which we are condemned with the same points in other communities upon this coast.

Since the above went to press we have obtained further information in respect of the above charges. We learn that it can be proven, that the President previously to the warning sent to Mr. Celse, the Frenchman, by his Captain, had in person apprised Mr. C. of the loss to which he would expose himself, by landing his cargo at Cape Mount. This was done before the President went to Gallenas

On returning then, to Cape Mount finding Mr. C. landing goods he repeated his warning through his Captain. In regard to the Gallinas, we have learned, and it is proper we should remark, that the natives were prompted to demand in addition to their original stipulations, that this Government should undertake to settle the slave war which then raged in the interior, and reduce the thousands revolted slaves to their original servitude to their masters. To the first part of the proposition there might be no objection, provided it had not been insisted upon as an addition to be made to previously concluded arrangement Would the author of the extract have us agree to the second part; and thus establish a fugitive slave law in Liberia! Had the goverment insisted upon a fulfillment of the agreement and taken possession of the place we are not left to conjecture what would be said by the author of the extracts and the rest of the calumniators. In reply to the positive statement that not one foot of the Gallinas teritory has been purchased, we will only ask whether Soolima form, any part of the Gallinas? The author of the bold, but groundless assertion must be acquainted with some of the African dialects, if so, he can enquire of the natives whether Soolima was sold to us; and whether the purchase was made prior to any proposition having been made to Prince Manna for the sale of that small part of the Gallinas, over which he stretches the horse-tail. In fact the writer of the extracts has not even the merit of being a good fabricator. But false witnesses are frequently blind.

We refer to the testimony of Mr. Redman and an English Captain but we do not endorse the extent of their statements, being confident there are honorable men in the place they, allude to.

We take great pleasure in leting our readers know, that no furher depredations have been committed by Grando and his allies, since our last issue. Indeed, from all accounts they have had enough fighting; and are quite willing to make friends.

Grando would have left the country soon after he was repulsed by the Bassa covians, but the Bassa Chiefs, whom he had seduced from their allegiance to this government, and who had allied themselves to him, protested strongly against it; and told him that as he brought them into collision with the Liberians; he must, and should remain until they had ascertained how their case would be. He will be narrowly watched by them, and the first attempt he makes to escape from the country, will be the warrant for his arrest and delivery to the government.

The Legislature is now in session; and it is presumed it will give immediate attention to the condition of affairs in the Bassa Country; and adopt stringent measures to restore peace and quietness; and to prevent a re-occurrence of the lamentable affair by the defection and rebellion of Grando.

To permit a wholesome and urgently called for chastisement of Grando and his allies, without too greatly inconveniencing our farmers, no delay should occur. The sooner it is undertaken the better. It must be borne in mind that in a month's time the season will commence for farmers to prepare their land for planting; and they should be at liberty to resume their labors as soon after the commencement of the season as possible—even if it should be necessary to shorten the session of the Legislature; and leave the unfinished business for an extra session.

We have been furnished with the following statement of the cruise of the U. S. Ship "Dale Commander, Pearson by one of the officers. We present it to our readers without comment.

The U. S. Ship "Dale" arrived in Messurado Roads on the 11th November from a cruise to the Island of Johanna, whither she had been ordered to demand satisfaction for the illegal detention of an American whaling Captain. The Dale was temporarily detached from the U. S. Squadron on the West Coast of Africa—by Commodore Gregory to perform this service. She left Porto Praya on the 7th: May last, and arrived at Johanna via Rio de Janerio and Simon's Bay, on the 4th. of August last, on the 5th, she hauled up in front of the town, and sent a boat on shore with officers for a settlement—on the morning of the 6th. no satisfactory terms being complied to—opened her batteries upon the Forts, when after a few shots having been fired, a flag of Truce being hoisted upon the principle fort, another boat was sent on shore. After some hours detention the boat returned and yet no satisfaction—Again opened the batteries; and the Flag of truce again being hoisted another boat was sent on shore; when the terms offered by Commander Pearson for settlement being agreed to by the king, hostilities ceased.

It is matter of surprise to us, (and in no other way to be accounted for, than the great superiority of American metal and the means of American warfare recognized by half civilized nations) that the fort prominent and convenient to the Ship and with a sufficient Battery, capable of sinking an ordinary squadron, did not make effort for defence.

The Brig "Zeno," Capt Sherwood, has returned from Grand Bassa where she landed the immigrants and stores sent out by the New York Colonization Society. We are happy to say that the immigrants are pleased with the appearance of the country, and from all we learn they will prove a great acquisition to it. They are favorably represented, and it is not doubted but they are an enterprising company. We are also informed that they are well provided; and have the means to carry on farming operations on a respectable scale. We wish them success in all their honorable undertakings.

The Legislature commenced its session on Monday the 1st inst. By 12 of the clock the Senate was organized and ready for business. The House of Representatives, having to determine the qualifications of some of its members; and attend to claims of others, who thought themselves entitled to seats, was not prepared for business till the 3d, on that day the tickets of the last regular election were counted; and the result proclaimed—that Joseph J. Roberts was elected President and Anthony D. Williams Vice President, for the next two years. On the 3 inst at noon, the two houses, met in convention, when the President delivered his inaugual address, and with the Vice President, was sworn into office. This ceremony was deeply interesting and impressive. As the President laid his hand upon the Holy Bible the convention and a number of other gentlemen within the bar of the Senate arose in profound silence and remained standing during the ceremony. One individual only within the bar—a foreign official—retained his seat and seemed to view the whole proceeding with the greatest indifference if we may not say with disrespect. Immediately after this ceremony, the Message of the President to both houses was delivered. There is but one opinion about these two documents and that is, that they show the superior intelligence of our worthy Chief Magistrate. In our next, our readers will have the pleasure of reading them. The message plainly sets forth the state and condition of affairs and that there are matters to correct and improve, we see nothing that should dishearten; but much to inspire the people to a renewal of their energies for the honor and prosperity of their country.

pathise in every effort which is being made to extend the blessings of civilization, civil and religious liberty into Africa: and that you will aid, by every means in your power, every such effort to the end that her sons may be redeemed from their deep degredation. And I beg to say further, gentlemen, that I shall not fail to recommend, from time to time, such measures to the Legislature, as in my opinion may be necessary and proper to promote the interests of agriculture, commerce; and internal improvements. To enforce a strict accountability on the part of the officers concerned in the management of the affairs of the government; and observe the utmost economy in all public expenditures, shall be my constant care.

I have now only to add that our grateful acknowledgements are due to an all-wise Providence, for the state of improvement, which is everywhere manifest in our infant Republic, and for the great prosperity with which, in his goodness, God has blessed our country—let us then continue to trust in him, and not fail to invoke a continuance of that protecting care which has led us, step by step, from such small beginnings to the position we to day occupy.

J. J. ROBERTS.

Government House.
Monrovia December 3rd 1851.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

To the Hon: the Senate and House of Representatives,
Gentlemen

It is the business of the Executive on every occasion of the meeting of the Legislature to inform them of the condition of the Republic, and to recommend to them any public measure, which he may think expedient for their adoption. It is therefore my first, and indispensible duty to invite your attention to the Providential favors with which our country has been blessed during the past year.

In addition to the inestimable privileges of civil and religious liberty, which we are still permitted to enjoy—we have abundant cause for congratulation and thankfulness that our land has been exempted from the visitation of any pestilential disease, and that, in the general, a remarkable degree of health has been preserved to its inhabitants.

The agricultural departments of the country were never more encouraging than at the present time—commerce is also rapidly increasing, both in variety and quantity of the articles of export; and I am happy in being able to info m the Legislature that a decided improvement, in the several towns and villages of the Republic, is every where observable. Indeed every fundamental interest of the government and people seems to bear the impress of Divine favor and approbation. These circumstances cannot fail to awaken in us a deep sense of the goodness of God—and inspire us with feelings of profound reverence and devotion to Him, who is the author of all good, and draw from us grateful acknowledgements for benefits so bountifully bestowed.

But, gentlemen, in the midst of so many gracious favors, we have not been wholly exempted from the evils incident to human nature; and from the innumerable difficulties and embarrassments, which more or less, surround all governments. And, as if to test our faith; or to remind us of our obligations to the Great Governor of the universe; or to convince us that in God alone, is strength, and that in him only we should put our trust—we have recently been called to experience a severe affliction in the sacking and burning of one of our villages as es in the county of Grand Bassa, and cold blooded murder of a number of its inhabitants, by a band of ruthless savages, headed by Fisherman Grando; who, ten days afterwards, having collected a formidable force, made a desperate attack upon the Township of Bassa Cove, but was happily repulsed with great loss on his side. This fellow Grando, for the last fifteen years has been hanging like an incubus, upon the skirts of the villages of Grand Bassa County, taxing his evil genius to the utmost, to invent annoyances by which he might distress them;—and by this last act, has crowned his diabolical purposes.

This, gentlemen, is, indeed, a distressing occurrence, individually or politically considered, and is truly calculated to arrest our attention, and impress us with the fact of the uncertainty of all human affairs, and teaches us how constantly dependent we are upon God for his protecting care over us.

And while we lament the occurrence, and especially the loss of so many of our fellow citizens—prematurely cut off in the vigour of life by barbarous hands—we can but bow in humble submission to Almighty God—acknowledging our entire dependence upon his infinite goodness—supplicate His Divine aid and protection—humbly entreating that He will deliver us from the machinations of all our enemies: and that He will bless us in the adoption of such measures as will be conducive to the good and welfare of our infant State

Gentlemen, it is with inexpressible concern, I have to inform you that among the evils likely to result from these attacks upon our settlements in Grand Bassa, there is every reason to fear; nay, I cannot see that it can possibly be avoided,—that we shall be involved in difficulties with several of the Chiefs in that neighborhood—who, influenced by their cupidity—Grando it appears, having divided with them the plunder he procured from the settlement at Fish-town—joined him in the attack upon Bassa Cove, and are now maintaining a hostile attitude; defying the authority of the government.

Foremost in these acts of rebelion, and threats of insubordination, is that miscreant Boyer of Trade town; who, actually sent a large force to aid Grando in his attack, and has now a number of men armed at Grando's barricaded town, to defend him against any attempt that may be made to arrest Grando and his associates.

It is well known to you gentlemen, that Boyer and Grando, are kindred spirits—both alike destitute of every honorable sentiment, and capable of any act however base and treacherous I have great satisfaction, however, in remarking that as far as I am informed, all the Chiefs, except those of Tobacconee, New Cess and Trade-town, adhere strictly to their allegiance, and manifest the deepest concern at the treachery of Grando, and Boyer's participation; and several of them have sent me assurances of their readiness to co-operate with the government in maintaining its authority, and punishing the guilty parties.

This unprovoked and cruel outrage has aroused universal indignation; and every voice is raised to demand that a just retribution be visited on the perpetrators of so foul a deed And, gentlemen, the period is now arrived which claims from the legislative guardians of the nations' rights, the adoption of such measures, as will at once convince all within its jurisdiction, of the power and determination of the government to maintain its authority, and punish all crimes committed within its territorial limits. Every consideration demands this at your hands. To war against the dangers that assail—to guard against the dangers that threaten—to destroy or drive to a distance, every thing by which security might be invaded, is the purpose for which civil governments are formed; and and the people have a right to require of the guardians of the public safety, the adoption of such measures as will secure these important ends. Therefore, gentlemen, this subject will doubtless claim your first attention

The circumstances of the several attacks and massacre, are fresh in your memory—and I deem it wholly unnecessary to tresspass upon your valuable time, doubly so at this juncture, to recount them here.

With respect to myself, I find that my duty is plain before me—and however painful the being obliged to resort to military force—though justifiable by example and necessity, yet disagreeable in itself—and repugnant to my own feelings. I should certainly but all deserve the confidence of my fellow citizens, were I not on the present occasion earnestly to recommend that immediate and efficient steps be taken to apprehend Grando, and his associates, and bring them to justice; and also to punish those who, by their menacing preparations, and aspect of combination against the authority of the government, have placed themselves in a position which justly entitles them to the severest chastisement. That strong measures be immediately resorted to, is absolutely necessary to the permanent establishment of the authority of the government, in certain districts, and the future security of persons and property, as well also of the peace and harmony of our citizens.

The protracted moderation of the government towards certain Chiefs and Headmen in the Bassa Country, seems only to have had the effect of producing in them the belief, that the government will either continue its forbearance, or that it has not the power of maintaining the majesty of its laws. This latter, as you well remember, gentlemen, was the opinion of Gatomba for several years; who continued his depredations, tho' admonished again and again until arrested in his career by the strong arm of military power—since which time, no one has been more peaceable and scrupulously obedient to lawful commands. And this appears to be the only method of effectually arousing others from the same delusion Had this course been pursued, as his conduct justly deserved, in regard to Grando, some years ago, we might have been spared the outrage he has committed, and the present necessity of punishing his guilt.

Besides the almost innumerable minor depredations of Grando, upon the inhabitants of Grand Bassa—this last, gentlemen, is the fourth capital offence of which he has been guilty—thus four times has his life been justly forfeited to the satisfaction of outraged law. That he procured the murder of Governor Finley, there is but little room for doubt; that he, at another time ordered the murder of two of our citizens, is also certain; that he soon afterwards assembled in arms and twice attacked the said village of Bassa Cove is a fact of history, and the cruelties he committed on those occasions will long be remembered by many of our citizens who severely suffered. And is his cup of iniquity not yet full?—Shall he be longer permitted to revel over the mangled corpses of our murdered fellow citizens?—It is for you, gentlemen, to answer.

I am satisfied, however, that you agree with me that the time is fully come when the government cannot longer suffer its authority to be trampled on with impunity; and that you will now take measures to put an effectual end to these cruel depredations, and establish permanent security to the persons and property of all within our jurisdiction. This is due not only to our own citizens, but also to strangers sojourning among us, peaceably engaged in mercantile pursuits And to neglect this duty longer, you will be assuming, gentlemen, an immense weight of responsibility

Under the existing aspect of our affairs, in the county of Grand Bassa—especially, information having reached me that the Chiefs of Tobaccone, New Cess, and Trade-town, were supplying themselves with powder and guns from vessels trading along that part of our coast—I have thought it not inconsistent with a just precaution to interdict all trade and intercourse for a time, with the inhabitants of the above named districts; and to require the removal of all trading factories established in said districts. It remains for the Legislature to determine how long this restriction shall continue.

After the attack of the 15th, ultimo, it was thought advisible, at least to relieve the citizens from the fatigue of constant watching, to send down a smal detachment of men from this place; and on the 17th, a company of seventy five, was embarked on board the Government schooner "Lark," and was landed there the following day, where the company still remains on duty. I should not omit to mention here, that we are indebted to Captain Pearson, of the U. S. ship "Dale," for his prompt response to my application to be conveyed in his ship to Grand Bassa. The arrival of the Dale and Lark was very opportune, as we have every reason to believe that another attack, by the natives was contemplated, and that they were only deterred by the presence of these vessels, and the arrival of re-inforcements. Up to the present time, nothing further has occurred there, except that the fishmen are rapidly leaving the country.

It affords me great satisfaction to be able to inform the Legislature that, excepting the difficulties in Grand Bassa, our relation with the tribes bordering on our territories, and those within our jurisdiction, have undergone no material change since your last session. And generally, from a conviction that we consider them a part of ourselves, and cherish with sincerity their rights and interests, the attachment of the natives is daily gaining strength. Constant application, are being made to the government to supply them with school teachers, and with other qualified persons to reside among them, to instruct them in the civilized modes of agriculture, and the mechanic arts, and it is a matter of deep regret that the government, for want of pecuniary means, has not been able to meet their wishes, but to an exceedingly limited extent.

In conformity with the wishes of the Legislature, expressed in their resolution of December last, the government interposed its authority, and succeeded in putting an end to actual hostilities between the Vey and Golah Chiefs; but failed to effect a full reconciliation between the contending parties. They, however, pledged themselves to a perpetual armistice. Nevertheless, I regret to say, symptoms of an outbreak have manifested themselves, now and then, on both sides; but the government has kept them in check; and has not relaxed its endeavors to effect a pacification; and to accomplish this purpose strenuous efforts have been made to assemble the whole of the Chiefs at this place. And though both parties express a decided willingness to have their disputes and difficulties arranged and settled, and friendship restored, still owing to their natural jealousies and great propensity for war, as yet, this desirable object has not been effected. In obedience to the government, in September last, a part of the Chiefs assembled here, but in consequence of the absence of some of the Vey Chiefs, who had not been summoned, and whose presence was necessary to the adjustment of some of the difficulties, the council was adjourned till the 17th, ultimo. The Vey Chiefs, G. Cane and Boombo, were punctual in their attendance, and have remained here ever since, awaiting the arrival of the Golah Chiefs, Tom Gum and Dourabay. These dignitaries made their appearance late in the afternoon of Saturday last. The council assembled day before yesterday, and I engaged the assistance of several gentlemen to aid me in conducting the investigation of their numerous charges and complaints. The whole affair is exceedingly complicated, and as yet we have not been able to arrive at any settlement of their difficulties—I am happy, however, to inform you that there is every reason to hope that the meeting will result in an entire reconciliation of the parties, and the permanent restoration of harmony, and a good understanding among the tribes.

Gentlemen, I feel particular satisfaction in remarking that nothing has occurred during the past year, to disturb our amity with foreign powers. In the United States the cause of colonization seems to be gaining favor—and a growing interest in that country in favor of Liberia, is every where manifest. We have cause, however, still to regret that the United States Government, has not yet seen fit to acknowledge the Independence of this Republic. And though we are not insensible of the cause of this delay, still we had every reason to hope and expect, notwithstanding the peculiar institution of that country, it would have been among the first to extend to us the friendly hand, to welcome Liberia among the family of nations. I am happy to remark, however, that we have still grounds for hope that the United States Government will not much longer withhold this token of friendship. We have also good grounds for belief that she will even do more—that she will aid this infant State, pecuniarily, in her efforts to introduce into Africa the blessings of civilization and christianity.

It also affords me much plessure to observe that the kind feelings of Her Britannic Majesty's Government, towards Liberia, are unabated. We have recently had several proofs of the deep interest Her Majesty's Government, and the British people generally entertain for the future welfare of this infant State. And it is proper for me to mention here, that we are indebted to Her Majesty's Government for the hull and part of the machinary of Her Majesty's steam vessel "Lioness," presented to this Government by Commodore Fanshaw, &c. &c. in the name of Her Majesty. I have also the satisfaction of communicating to the Legislature, that I am informed in a dispatch from Viscount Lord Palmerston, &c. &c. "that Her Majesty's Government, in order to evince its great desire to encourage the growth of cotton in this Republic, has given orders that five of the best kinds of cleaning machines shall be prepared and sent to Liberia." These machines, however, have not yet been received.

You will, I am persuaded, gentlemen, learn with no less pleasure than I communicate it, that I have received from His Excellency, Chevalier Bunsen, His Prussian Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary, and Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of St. James—through whom I had the honor of making the application to His Prussian Majesty's Government—a dispatch containing a formal recognition of the independence of this Government, by His Prussian Majesty.

I have also assurances that two or three other European Governments will soon follow the example of Prussia, in the recognition of our independence.

I have had the honor of receiving from the Board of Trustees for Education in Liberia—chartered, as you are aware, by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, U. S—a communication, requesting that this Government will incorporate and establish the proposed college, and endow it with such lands or funds as the government may be able to afford. This communication will be laid before you, and I feel satisfied, gentlemen, that you will give it that attention which its importance demands I have particular satisfaction in being able to inform the Legislature that the Trustees have received very flattering encouragements, from the friends of our race, to persevere in their efforts to carry forward the great work of christianizing and civilizing Africa I am advised that on the receipt of the charter and information of the organization and officers names of the Board of Trustees in Liberia, the American Board will be prepared for correspondence and immediate action with them, in regard to the erection of suitable buildings, and the selection of proper instructors, &c. &c.

It is proper likewise for me to inform you that I have received by the hands of Rev. Mr. Christy, Agent of the Kentucky Colonization Society, a set of statute laws of the State of Kentucky, presented to this Republic by the Legislature of that State. It has also been notified to me that the Rev. Mr. Gurley, in our behalf, has made application to the Congress of the United States, for copies of the State papers of that Government; and we have reason to believe that his application will be favorably considered by the ensuing Session of Congress. These papers, should we obtain them, will be an important acquisition to our public library.

Hon S. A. Benson, of Bassa Cove, has been directed by the New Jersey Colonization Society to apply to this government for its concurrence in the establishing of a new settlement, under the auspices of said society, on some eligible site in the mountain region, in the rear of Grand Bassa. The principal object, I believe, of the Society is to procure a more healthy location for emigrants arriving from the United States; but as to their precise plans, I am not fully informed. I will, however, lay before you Mr. Benson's communication to me on the subject, and in the course of your deliberations you may be able to obtain further and more satisfactory information, in regard to the enterprise.

I am requested to communicate to the Legislature the wish of the American and New York Colonization Societies—as expressed in a set of resolutions, unanimously adopted by those societies—that the new settlement in the County of Grand Bassa, shall be so arranged as to extend from the north west limits of the present village of Bassa Cove, so as to include both settlements; and that the new Township be named "Buchanan," in honor of the late Gov. Buchanan, who, under the auspices of the New York and Pennsylvania Colonization Societies, established the settlement of Bassa Cove—and whose remains now lie buried there. This arrangement and change of name seems to be the wish of a large number of the friends of colonization in many parts of the United States.

And I understand that a petition extensively signed, requesting this favor, has been forwarded to a gentleman of Grand Bassa, to be presented to the Legislature. I beg to recommend this subject to your favorable consideration.

I will lay before you, gentlemen, a communication from George Wright Esqure. Liverpool, who wishes to obtain from this government, for a term of years, a special license for the making of Palm oil by machinery at the several principal places on our coast; and further to be allowed the right of introducing into this Republic a copper coin of the denomination of one, two, and three cents; under such restrictions and regulations as the government may deem proper for its protection. Provided the privilege be granted, he asks that both the machinery and coin shall be admitted into the Republic free of duty. He is very sanguine that such an arrangement will greatly promote both his, and the interest of this government. And is exceedingly anxious to commence the manufacture of Palm oil with as little delay as possible. I therefore ask an early expression of the Legislature on this subject.

Gentlemen, during the interval of the Legislature, due attention has been paid to the execution of the different objects which were specially provided for by the laws and resolutions of the last Session; and, as far as practicable, have been accomplished. The several reports of commissions &c, &c, will be laid before you. I may state here that the new court house in the County of Sinoe has been completed, and that county, to the extent of the appropriation, has been placed in a state of defence. I regret to state that the work on the jail, ordered to be erected in the county of Grand Bassa, has not progressed, as I had confidently anticipated—circumstances, however, over which the authorities there had no control, have impeded the work—and, therefore, no blame is to be attached to them. You will be furnished with the proceedings in respect to the establishment of the unfortunate settlement in that county. The bridges, five in number, ordered to be thrown across certain streams in the interior of this county, have been completed according to the provisions of the act authorising the work. I am also pleased to state, for the information of the Legislature, that the statue laws of the Republic directed to be compiled and printed, are in a forward state of completion, and will in the course of a few weeks, be ready for circulation.

Gentlemen, during you present Session there are other matters of grave importance that will claim you particular attention. And the first to which I would invite your consideration is, the navigation, Commerce and Revenue law of this Republic—against the operation of which, British merchants, engaged in trade to this coast, are still alledging complaints to Her Majesty's Government. They complain that the present provisions of the law, in many respects, are unnecessarily restrictive, and that instead of encouraging, tend materially to embarrass commercial intercourse with the citizens of this Republic: and that in one or two particulars the law in question intringes the stipulations of the Treaty subsisting between this Government and Great Britain.

But, gentlemen, while it may be readily admitted, that some modifications of the Navigation, Commerce, and Revenue law, might be adopted which would afford greater facilities to trade—it is also clear, and I am exceedingly sorry to say it, that many, if not all these complaints, have grown, more out commercial jealousy, and unkind feelings, on the part of these traders, towards Liberia, than in consequence of the operation of the law regulating Commerce and Revenue. At an early day of the session, I will lay before you copies of a correspondence had with this Government, by Her Britannic Majesty's Consul, in regard to these complaints.

I have also had the honor of receiving from Her Majesty's Consul, communications on other subjects connected with commerce, and relating to alledged claims of certain British merchants to plots of land within the territorial limits of this Government—to which, as directed by Viscount Lord Palmerston, Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, he ask the attention of this Government. These documents will also be laid before you.

These papers, gentlemen, set forth very clearly the nature and character of the several complaints of British merchants, and their demands—as also the suggestions of Her Majesty's Government in regard to a revision of certain parts of our Commerce and Revenue laws. And I deem it unnecessary to say more than to repeat, what I have already remarked; that in my opinion, it is very possible that some of the provisions of the present commercial regulations might be so amended as to afford greater facilities to commercial enterprise, without materially effecting the revenue or any other important interest of the government. And it cannot be doubted that the interests of Liberia require that her intercourse with other nations should be facilitated by every means in our power.

I, therefore, earnestly recommend, to the favorable consideration of the Legislature the various subjects and propositions contained in said documents. I am aware, gentlemen, that the question of our commercial regulations involves matters of grave importance; and it rests with the judgment of the Legislature to decide how far our present circumstances will authorise any modification in our present commercial system. I am satisfied, however, that you will carefully review the whole subject, as it has been presented to you, and will give it that attention which its weight and importance demand—and that you will, to the fullest possible extent, meet the wishes of Her Majesty's Government, and remove every reasonable ground of future complaint, by any of Her Majesty's subjects.

Gentlemen, another subject which will claim your attention, in the course of the session, is a review of our military establishment. This is called for by the events which have recently transpired in our midst. It certainly merits inquiry what imperfections in the existing system, further experience may have unfolded—and that imperfections do exist, no one will question. Surrounded as we are by savages, whose ruling passion is war, nothing is more certain to render our tranquility permanent than a well organized militia, and a constant preparedness for any emergency. Military displays, which in civilized countries may be justly ridiculed as useless, have among savages a most salutary effect in regard to their subordination. And as a further measure of public security, that is, to check every attempt to disturb the peace and tranquility of the aboriginal inhabitants of the Republic—I cannot omit to call your attention to the necessity of providing against the improper interference of foreign traders, with native Chiefs, in matters belonging wholly to this Government. It is a notorious fact, that difficulties and disputes, among certain native tribes within our jurisdiction, have been protracted by such unwarrantable conduct; and more than once nearly resulting, in open hostilities. Every consideration of public safety demands that stringent measures be at once adopted, to prevent such intermeddling in future.

There are other subjects, gentlemen, that will present themselves to your consideration during your present deliberations. I shall, therfore, content myself with a general reference to only one or two more—these are the public buildings in this county, especially the Light House and Jail, which are in a very dilapidated condition, and require immediate and extensive repairs—a census of the population of the Republic is extremely desirable—and some further regulations in regard to the Post Office Department may be necessary to meet the new postal arrangement, between Great Britian and this country; and such as will probably be established between the United States and this Republic.

Gentlemen, it will doubtless add to your concern, to be informed—that in looking forward to the future expense of the operations, which may be found inevitable, in consequence of the difficulties in Grand Bassa, and other necessary, plans of the Government, which will demand increased expenditures—the product of the present revenues is not likely to be adequate to the purposes of the government, the ensuing year—this, however, will be the better ascertained in the course of the Session, when it will rest with the judgment of the Legislature to provide for such contingency. The Secretary of the Treasury will lay before you the accounts of receipts and disbursments at the Treasury Department, for the year ending 30th. September last. The following is a concise statement of the accounts as rendered by the Secretary.

You will observe, gentlemen that the receipts of the past year have not been equal to the disbursements; nevertheless while the liabilites of the govt. at the close of the fiscal year, were $9,969—the assets were $14,627 leaving a belance in favor of the govt. of4657.—the committee appointed to examine the accounts of the Treasury Department for the years 1848 and 9, have completed their labors and their report will be laid before you.

Gentlemen of the Senate. I scarcely need remind you that, according to the Constitution the term of office, for which many of the officers of the government were appointed—expires with the present Session of the Legislature; and it is for you to confirm, or reject such nominations as may be presented to you, to fill the vacances thus occuring.

In the exercise of this power, I am satisfied you will be guided by an inflexible desire to the public good; and that you will not approve the appointment of any individual, in whose integrity and ability you have not the fullest confidence. It is due to the officers, generally, who have been associated with me in the various departments of the government during the last two years, for me to state that, with but one or two exceptions, they have discharged their several duties faithfully, and with much credit to the government and themselves.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and House of Representatives—it is possible in the course of the Session I may have other communications to lay before you that will deserve your serious attention—I therefore close this, with a full reliance, that under the blessing of Divine, Providence, you will unite you exertions for the welfare of our common country. I assure you I am not insensible of the arduous duties now before you. The making laws for a community, at all times deemed a most momentous and important object must now callforth your particular circumspection, and most serious deliberations, and I can but reassure you of the willingness with which my co-operation will be afforded—for, in truth, I affirm, I have nothing more at heart than the interest of Liberia, and the happiness of my fellow citizens.

J. J. ROBERTS.

Government House.
December 3rd 1851.

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Herald.

The future prosperity of any nation depends very much on the educational training of the rising generation, hence, there is no class of individuals in which the wise and good of every community feel more deeply interested than the young! and nothing in which they more heartily co-operate than in the promotion of their education, especially is this the case in Liberia, where education is so much needed, nothing delights the wise, and give here more than the prosperity of the means of education, for unless the young are educated we cannot hope for a perpetuity of our present system of government. The vast numbers who are now sent here from America in ignorance, and the vast numbers that may hereafter be thrown on these shores, render the general education of the young doubly necessary and important, education is the safe guard of any nation, and as some one has well said "If we retrench the wages of the school master we must increase that of the soildier."

"Education," says our Excellent President Roberts, is our safety valve, and must keep pace with emigration" In his recent message he say that the people of Liberia are now solving a political problem which has for sometime engaged the attention of the world, that is, the "capacity of the African race for self-government;" but how shall we solve this problem satisfactorily without educating our youth?

Therefore it appears to me Mr. Herald, that every account of the progress of education in this country, must be interesting to every true Liberian.

I had the pleasure of being present at the celebration of the fifth anniversary of Mr B V R. James' school, (a well known institution) held on Thursday evening the 27th ult:mo, at the Baptist Church. The exercises commenced by singing a hymn, which was followed by a very appropriate prayer by Rev. B. R. Wilson. After which the children began to recite. The peices, (among which were selected and original) were very interesting, and with a few exceptions very well recited. We were particularly pleased with a peice entitled "National Dominion," an original piece recited by W. H. Lynch We were also much delighted with the good sense and cheerful wit which many of the children manifested. It was altogether an interesting affair, and reflects credit on the school master no less than on the children.

We believe Mr Herald, that there are in this institution many promising youths, who if spared may be very useful men in Liberia—men taking prominent places in directing its political and commercial interests, men capable of asserting and defending its rights, men who shall prove to the world, that by divine assistance the colored man can stand on a level with the wise and good of all ages From this institution may also go forth many qualified and self-denying men to proclaim the "unsearchable riches of Christ," to unite in hastening on the day when Ethopia shall, stretch forth her hands unto God," to convert this moral wilderness into a "vineyard of the Lord."

We pray then that the blessing of Almighty God may continue to accompany this school. We bid our friend God-speed in his arduous labors; that while he waters others he may be watered also himself, may he be strengthened in body and encouraged in heart always, to abound in the work of the Lord, and may his efforts be crowned with success

For the Liberia Herald.

Bassa Cove, December 12th 1851.

Died in this place on the 14th—ultimore Mr. Thomas L. Correthas, after an illness of some twelve months, with the consumption, which as is known to be as delightful as it is fatal Brother Correthes emigrated, to Liberia in the year A. D 1836; soon after he was made by the grace of God a monument of his mercy, & became a member of the M. E. Church, Bassa Cove and served said Church, in various capacites. We visited Brother, C. many a times during his late illness, conversed with him on the subject of religion and the state of his mind and of his future hope beyond the grave, his answer was always God is the strength of my heart, and Christ also who has not died in vain, in whose blood my sins are all washed away so you see my brother God's will come soon and when he who is my only trust shall appear, I shall not be left behind—yea, I shall appear in his righteousness—saying.

There is my house and portion fair;
My treasure and my heart is there,
And my abiding home;
For me my elder brother stay,
And angels beckon me away;
And Jesus bid me come.

Brother C has Left a pious widow and five children to mourn his lost, which he told to me shortly before he died, was his only grief; tho Hon: S. A. Benson stuk time enough to lease his farm, and as he allways did, being a member of his class was attendance on him the day of his death, to whom he reclaimed his dear family Brother C. had filled many important stations for the government in Liberia, and now I believe he has gone to fill an everlasting station in glory Brother C's end was peace, his fears were gone, his love was home to the Lord.

Mr Herald please give this card a small space in your very interesting sheet, and you will much oblige the friend of the brother.

D. A MADISON.

For the "Liberia Herald"

Mr. Herald.

I perceive that "William Providence," has again sent you an article, on the subject of missionary labor and efficiency in Liberia. But as he produces no proofs to sustain the position of his former article, but merely re-affirms them, I shall only notice a few of his remarks. The first is this, "he knows full well that the work is gradual, and must be accomplished in the Lord's good time, &c.; but there must be a beginning, and he charitably hoped that it had."

Here he would convey the idea to the world, that the missionaries in Liberia have not even commenced to hold up the glorious light of the gospel—have not even begun the work of civilizing and christianizing the natives. If they have not, let me ask, how are these churches sustained, in which those native converts "crowd?"

If the missionaries have not begun the work of evangelization, whence the revivals?—Who are the instruments?—By whose preaching has the truth been brought to bear upon the minds of the many natives and colonists, who, in this town, as well as at the settlements up the river, have lately professed conversion? Does Wm. Providence affect to be ignorant of this? But let us notice the reason he assigns for the long delay of the commencement in the "work." He says, "Alas! Alas! they have stopped by the way, and are grasping after that which is contrary to the spirituality of their religion, money." Notice, here he says, "they have stopped by the way;" after having just insinuated that there has never even been a beginning, by saying "there must be a Legislature, &c" here he contradicts himself, "they have stopped by the way." To stop in any undertaking naturally supposes a beginning. It is possible had not one effected, from what did the missionaries stop? But let us see what is Mr Wm. Providence opinion is the cause of their stopping. "they are grasping after that which is contrary to the spirituality of their holy religion, money." This assertion will not bear investigation and arises not from the conviction of the fact, but from an envious disposition of the author. But notice his erroneous opinion of money, he calls it "that which is contrary to the spirituality of our holy religion." Strange idea indeed! I cannot agree with him here, unless he can shew me a text in the Bible, which prohibits a christian from holding money. I believe that money is of great use to the Church, and is essential to the propagation of the gospel. If the church were to throw all the money in its possession, into the sea, as being "contrary to the spirituality of religion" I guess the gospel would be confined to very narrow limits, and in a few years Liberia would present the same, if not a worse aspect to the world than when it was known only as the haunts of the savage. "Money contrary to the spirituality of religion." Strange notion indeed, when our Saviour himself charged his apostles when sending them to preach, saying, "he that hath a purse let him take it, and also his scrip." I would remind Wm. Providence, then, that it is the love of money" which is the "root of all evil." Mr. Herald, Wm. Providence is a very fine reasoner; notice what use he makes of my argument: "Edward you say, how could these good christian folks have a knowldge of their duty were it not for the doctrines which are held up to them by the missionaries &c. &c." He takes up the argument, you perceive, but does not produce any proof to the contrary, but evades the question, by saying, "Edward are on very good terms with himself, &c.

You you will perceive also, Mr. Herald, that Wm. P. has paid some attention to Grammar, hear him: "Edward, you certainly is in need of light in your pathway, for I conceive that you are altogether out of the old way that leads to those blessed regions, &c. &c." Surely Wm. Providence does not mean that he is in the "old way" when he will cavil at the servants of God,—the "ambassadors of Christ." Nor that man who is continually criminating his neighbour, is not like to be in the "old way which leads to those blessed regions." You will perceive Mr. Herald, that I have just glanced at the article, as I conceive that Wm. Providence would do much better, if instead of writing about that of which he knows nothing, he would pay more attention to English Grammar.

EDWARD.

Morovia, Dec, 16th, 1851.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, DECEMBER 31st: 1851.

Gathered from American Papers.—There is only one News-paper in Egypt,—a small monthly sheet, in the Arabic language, at four dollars a year. It is devoted to the powers that be, and every one in the employment of the Pacha, is obliged to subscribe to it.

There are 10 News-papers published in Austria; 14 in Africa; 24 in Spain; 20 in Portugal; 30 in Asia; 65 in Belgium; 85 in Denmark; 90 in Russia and Poland, 300 in Prussia; 320 in other German States; 500 in Great Britain and Ireland, and 1, 800 in the United States.

Arrival of Immigrants.—On Saturday, the 13th inst, the bark Morgan Dix, J. Coward, arrived from Baltimore, with 151 immigrants, sent out to Grand Bassa by the American Colonization Society. All well. The bark had a passage of 35 days. She left the same day for her port of destination; and we are informed that the immigrants and stores were landed in safety. We also learn that these people come out well supplied—they have a saw-mill, and many valuable agricultural implements;—and well prepared in every respect to make extensive and valuable improvements. We wish them success in all their attempts for the interest and welfare of Liberia. J. S. Smith, M. D. who had come up on a visit, left in the bark with them; and will have the conducting of them through the acclimating process.

The Legislature is at work; and earnestly engaged in considering the state of affairs in Grand Bassa. We have heard enough to warrant us in saying, that an armed force will be set on foot to reduce the rebellious Chiefs to a state of subordination. The sooner steps are taken for this purpose, the less, will fears be entertained as to further depredations by them. Up till now, they have remained in their barricades, preparing to defend themselves when attacked. Grando, the leader in the rebelion, has not succeeded in leaving the country; as he is too narrowly watched by his allies, who declare he shall remain and stand what may follow. They openly charge him with the hostile attitude they now present to the Government; and will no doubt, seize and deliver him up, if by doing so, they can hope to obtain the favor of the Authorities.

The Kings, Chiefs and Headmen, of the Vey, Golah and Dey Countries, assembled in this town in obedience to the call of the President and from all we gather, a perfect understanding exists among them, and that in future, there shall be perpetual peace and friendship between them.—The two former tribes especially, have, for a number of years, been engaged against each other in war: and their countries, in consequence, have been laid waste. The most shocking murders have been committed—towns laid waste, and the inhabitants barbarously butchered. To put an end to this inhuman state of things—and for the increase and encouragement of trade—and for a free and uninterrupted intercourse to any and every part of said countries; the President summoned these Chieftians to meet in congress; and to lay before him their disputes. We are happy to say that these Chieftians are now reconciled with each other; and they have pledged themselves to restore peace to the country. Should disputes arise between them hereafter, they are to refer them to the Liberian Authrities for adjustment.

The Legislature adjourned on Friday the 20th, instant.

The Military Forces sailed on the 30th, for Grand Bassa. We will give further particulars in our next number.

We take great pleasure in presenting to our readers, President Roberts' Inaugural address, and his Message to the Legislature. We feel satisfied that they will afford real pleasure to every citizen who may read them. They give a full and complete history of the condition and prospects of the country.

Our readers will, we hope, pardon us for the delay of our present number. It could not be helped. We have but very little assistance in the office; the printer boys having volunteered for the military expedition to Grand Bassa.

DREAMS.

A person well known to me dreamed he was alone in a certain church yard, amusing himself as he had often done, by reading the quaint epitaphs in the light of the setting sun. A new grave attracted his attention. At its head was a remarkable stone, on which he read the date of death and the name of the deceased: It was that of a dear friend, whose company he had that evening enjoyed. Such a dream is sufficiently unusual to impress his memory very strongly; but deeming himself too philosophic to be moved by such a circumstance, he cast off the impression, and thought but little of it until several months afterwards, when the death of his friend on the very date he had dreamed, started those who have written on this subject, such as Abercrombie on Morbid Physiology. If we consult the works of Dr. Abercrombie or Macnish, we find they relate numbers of these marvellous coincidences, and easily speak of them as if they were easily accounted for. Thus a young lady of Rossiure dreams one night that she saw her sister certain day. Circumstances happened just as she dreamt. Dr. Macnish mentions another case of a lady, three hundred miles off. Tortured by the fears that the dream represented the truth, although there had not been the slightest anticipation of any such an event. The Gaelic speaks from Inverness, were pouring out "The boat is sinking,——save them!" She was uneasy and a proposed boating party, at which her son-in-law was to be one; thus the dream was quite natural, so she gradually fell asleep again; but soon she wakes in terror, saying, "The boat is going down!" This of course arose from the former dream; therefore she composed herself a third time to sleep, but quickly starts up in agony, exclaiming, "They are gone—the boat is sunk!" Her husband, a major in the army, caught alarm, and excused himself from his engagement; but the rest of the party went, and were all drowned. Such cases of which multitudes might be collected, are among those most easily attributed to mere coincidence; but we will take another for the accuracy of which Dr. Abercrombie vouches. "Two sisters were sleeping together in a room communicating with that of their brother, when the eldest of them awoke in a state of great agitation, and, having roused the other, told her she had a frightful dream. "I dreamt," she said, "that Mary's watch stopped; and then, when I told you of the circumstance, you replied, much worse than that has happened, for——'s breath has stopped also," meaning their brother, who was very ill.—The following night the very same dream occurred, followed by similar agitation, which was composed, as on the previous occasion, by finding the brother in a sound sleep, and the watch going well. On the next morning one of the sisters was sitting by the brother, while the other was writing a note in an adjoining room.—When her note was ready to be sealed, she was proceeding to take out, for this purpose, the watch alluded to, which had been put by her in her writing desk; she was astonished to find it had stopped. At the same moment a scream was heard in the other room. The brother who had been seized with a sudden fit of suffocation, and said just before, "I breathed my last." [The Use of the Body in Relation to the Mind by Dr. Moor.

Sleep.—There is no better description given of the approach of sleep than that which we find in one of Leigh Hunt's papers in the Indicator:

"It is a delicious movement certainly that of being well nestled in bed and feeling that you shall drop gently to sleep.—The good is to come, not past, the limbs have been just tired enough to render the remaining in one posture delightful, the labor of the day is done. A gentle failure of the perception comes creeping over; the spirit of consciousness disengages itself more, and with slow and hushing degrees, like a mother detaching her hand from that of her sleeping child, the mind seems to have a balmy lid closing over it, the eye; 'tis more closing—'tis closed The mysterious spirits has gone to take its airy rounds.

DON'T RUN IN DEBT.

"Don't run in debt—never mind, never mind,
Home clothes are faded and torn;
Fix'em up, make them do; it is better by far
Than to have one heart weary and worn

We'll love you the more for the set of your hat,
Or your ruff, or the tie of your shoe.
The shape of your vest, or your pants, or cravat,
If they know you're in debt for the new!

There's no comfort, I tell you, in walking the street
In fine clothes, if you know you're in debt;
And feel that perchance you some tradesman may meet,
Who will sneer—tho' they're not paid for yet."

Good friends, let me beg of you, don't run in debt,
If the carpets and the sofas are sad—
They will fit your back better than any new set,
Unless they're paid for—with gold

If the house is too small, draw the closer together
Keep it warm with a hearty good will;
A big one unpaid for, in all kinds of weather,
Will send to your warm heart a chill.

Don't run in debt—now, dear girls, take a hint,
(If the fashions have crept in since last season,)
Old Nature sent in the very same tint,
And old Nature we think has some reason

But just say to your friend that you cannot afford
To spend time to keep up with the fashion;
That your purse is too light and your honor too bright
To be tarnished with such silly passion

Gents, don't run in debt—let your friends, if they can
Have fine houses, feathers, and flowers;
But unless they are paid for be more of a man
Than to envy their sunshiny hours.

If you've money to spare, I have nothing to say;
Spend your dollars and dimes as you please;
But mind you the man who his note has to pay,
Is the man who is never at ease.

Kind husband, don't run into debt any more;
'Twill fill your wife's cup full of sorrow,
To know that a neighbour may call at your door,
With a bill you must settle to-morrow.

O! take my advice—it is good, it is true!
(But, lest you may some of you doubt it)
I'll whisper a secret, now, seeing tis you)
I have tried it, and know all about it.

The chains of a debtor is heavy and cold,
Its links all corrosion and rust;
Gild o'er as you will, it is never of gold—
Then spurn it aside with disgust.

The man who's in debt is too often a slave,
Though his heart may be honest and true.
Can he hold up his head and look saucy and brave,
When a note he can't pay becomes due?

MARRIED.

In this town on the 4th inst, by the Rev. B. R. Wilson, Hon: E. J. Roye; to Miss Hannah C. Wright both of this town.

NAVAL.

December 21th Her B. M. Steamer, Firefly commander Seymore, from Sierra Leone; She sailed on the 27th inst.

December 20th Liberia Government schooner Lark sailed for Grand Bassa with a car of the armed force.

The U. S. ship "John Adams" Commander Barron, arrived in our port the day after President Roberts had left for Grand Bassa, with the militar force. An officer came on shore with the compliments of Captain Barron, to make known that Commodore Lavalleta, Commanding the U. S. Naval Forces on the West Coast of Africa, had sent the ship down to rendedany assistance that might be required by the Government. Vice President William Smith made known to Captain Barron, the departure of the President to Grand Bassa; and advised that the ship proceed there. The night same night the "John Adams" sailed for Grand Bassa.

The Government and People of Liberia, will not fail to remember, with the most lively sensibility the courtesy and kindness of Commodore Lavellett, in thus showing the deep interest he manifests for their welfare.

BURIED ALIVE.

From the Diary of C. Hodgson, Esq, deceased, formerly of Bristol, England.

The following story, taken from an European magazine, will be the more interesting to our readers, as it is said to be a true account, and unadulterated with a particle of fiction. It should serve as a fearful warning to those who 'hasten to bury their dead out of their sight.'

I had been subject to epileptic fits from my youth upwards which though they did not deprive me of animation in the sight of those about me completely annihilated my own consciousness. I used to be attacked at all times and seasons, but most commonly about the full of the moon. I generally had a warning of a peculiar nature, when these attacks were coming on, that it would be difficult to describe. It was a sensation, that, to be known must be experienced. My excellent wife Martha, (I mean my first wife, who has been dead now for at least forty years,) used to say that she always observed an unusual paleness over my complexion, otherwise ruddy, for a day or two before the fit came upon me. Bless her soul! she never let me be one moment out of her sight, from the instant she had a suspicion of my approaching malady. This benevolent caution on her part, was a great means of enabling her to subdue the violence of the fit when it came, for which purpose her experience had pointed out to her several useful applications. I married again after her decease, because I was oppressed beyond bearing my loneliness, which none but persons in such a situation—I mean a widower's—can tell. My second wife, whom I have also buried, was not so penetrating in the faculty of observation—She was a woman of admirable thrift, and to her economy it was, under God, I owe my preservation in the terrible event I am about to detail. Had I been buried in lead, it would have been all over with me.

Our family burying place in Bristol, is in——church, where there is a general vault, in which all persons who can fee the officials high nough, may be placed until their friends forget them—which for that matter in trading towns, is not a very long time, but this is only granted provided they can be buried in lead. I suppose they are turned out of their metal coffins in the end, as they are in London and other places, that the old lead may buy a carousal for the church wardens and sexton, and make room for new tenants to be served in the same manner.—But to my story.—To my excellent wife I owe my preservation. Willing to save as much money as possible at my funeral, she had my body, with all the usual and proper grief attendant upon the ceremony, put into a stout fir coffin, the weight of which was increased by a couple of hundred weights, placed one at my head, the other at my feet. Thus the thing passed off well, and money was saved to my heirs. I hereby cast no reflections upon my dear departed wife's regard for me. I was convinced, as I told her, that her motive was good; and well did it turn out for me that she was so thrifty and considerate. She was a true Bristol woman, and as the citizens there generally are, pretty clean and close fingered; but it is error on the right side. She was called Susannah, the daughter of an opulent and ancient councilman, and I got my freedom of the city by marrying her. She was plain in her person, and all Bristol women formerly were—but I wander again from my story.

I had made a most excellent dinner—of this I have a perfect recollection. Of more than this I can recollect nothing until coming out of my fits as I suppose—for I quickly imagined feeling the usual sensations, that I was recovering from one of them. I say that on coming to myself I was surprised to feel pinioned and in utter darkness. I had no space to stir if I would, as I soon found, while struggling to loose a sheet or some such thing in which I was scantily enveloped. My hand would not reach my head when I attempted to do so, by reason of my elbow touching the bottom, and my hand the top of the enclosure around me. It was the attempting to do this, and finding myself naked, except with the aforesaid covering, that struck me I had been entombed alive. The thought rushed suddenly upon me. My first sensations were those of simple surprise. I was like a child aroused out of a deep sleep, and not sufficiently awake to recognize its attendants.

When the truth flashed upon me in all its fearful energy. I can never forget the thrill of horror that ran through me. It was as if a bullet had penetrated my heart and all the blood in my body had gushed through the wound. Never; never can hell be more terrible than the sensations of that moment. I lay motionless for a time petrified with terror. Then a clammy dampness burst forth from every part of my body. My doom seemed inevitable; and so strong at length became this impression, so bereft of hope appeared my situation, that I ultimately recovered from it to plunge in the depth of a calm, resolute despair. As not the faintest ray of hope could penetrate the darkness around my soul, resignation to my fate followed.

I began to think of death coolly; and to calculate how long I might survive before famine closed the hour of my existence. I prayed that I might have fortitude to die without repining. Calmly as I then felt, I tried to remember how long man could exist without food. Thus the tranquility of my despair made me comparatively easy, if contrasted with the situation in which I felt my self afterward, when hope began to glimmer upon me. My days must in the end be numbered—I must die at last—I was only perishing a little sooner than I otherwise must have done. Even from this thought I derived consolation; and now I think life might have closed calmly upon me; if the pangs of hunger had been at all bearable; and I have been told that they are much more so than is commonly believed.

If my memory serves me correctly, this calm state of mind did not last long. Reason soon began to whisper to me that if I had been buried, and the earth closed around my coffin, I could not be able to respire, which I could now do with ease. I did not, of course, dream of the vault in which I was placed, but considered at first I had been buried in earth. The freedom of respiration gave me the idea that after all I was not carried forth for interment, but that I was about to be borne to the grave, and that there I should be suffocated inevitably. Such is the inconsistency of the human mind, that I, who had just now resigned myself to die by famine, imagined this momentary mode of death a thousand times more formidable.—The idea that I was not yet buried increased my anxiety to be heard from without. I called aloud and struck the sides and lid of the coffin to no purpose, till I was hoarse and fatigued, but all in vain. A stillly silence reigned around me amid the unbroken darkness.

I was now steeped in fearful agony. I shrieked with horror, and plunged my nails into my sides and wounded them. The coffin was soaked in my blood; and by tearing the wooden sides of my prison with the same maniacal feeling I lacerated my fingers and wore the nails to the quick, and soon became motionless from exhaustation. When I was myself once more, I called aloud my wife's name. I prayed, and I fear I blasphemed, for I know not what I said; and I thus continued until my strength left me, and nature once more sought replenishment in temporary insensibility.

At this time I had a vision of a most undefinable character, if it was one, and not a glance, as I am induced to think it was, between the portals of death into the world of spirits. It was all shapeless and formless. Images of men and women, often numberless, in a sort of shadowy outline, came before and around me. They seemed as if limbless from decay. Their featureless heads moved upon trunks hideously vital, in figures like bodies that I have seen drawn forth from burning dwellings, each being rather a hideous misshapen mass, than human resemblance. Thick darkness and silence succeeded, the darkness and silence of a too horrible reality. If, as I suspected, I slept about this time from weakness, it was but to awaken again to a more fearful consciousness of my dreadful situation.

Fresh but vain efforts to make myself heard were now reiterated as far as my strength would allow. I found with great difficulty I could turn on my side, and then over on my belly. I tried by lifting my back and by a violent strain, to burst open the coffin lid, but the screws resisted my utmost strength. I could not, beside, draw up my knees sufficiently high to afford a tenth part of the purchase I should otherwise have made to bear upon it. I had no help but to turn again to the position of the dead, and reluctantly gain a little repose from my agonizing exertions. I was conscious how weak my efforts had made me but I resolved to repeat them.—While thus at rest—if inactive torture can be denominated rest—I wept like a child when I thought of the sunshine and blue skies and fresh air which I should never more enjoy—how living beings throeged the streets and thousands round me were joyous or busy, while I was doomed to perish in torture—Why was my fate differently marked out to that of others? I had no monstrous crimes to repent of. Hundreds of criminal men were in the full revelry of life. I fancied I heard the toll of a bell. Breathless I listened. It was a clock striking the hour. The sound was new life to me. I am not inhumed at least, but perhaps am watched. Such were my thoughts. Interment will take place. My coffin will be moved I shall easily make myself be heard then. This was balm to me. I shouted anew, struck my prison board with all the power left me, and ceased only when exertion was no longer possible.

Men may fancy how they would find themselves under similar circumstances, and on the like trying occasions, but it is seldom a correct judgment can be previously formed on such matters. It was only at intervals that I was so fearfully maddened by my dreadful situation as to lose the power of rational reflection, or so overcome as to be debared the faculty of memory. Stretched in a position where my chances consisted only of a turn on my side upon hard boards, the soreness of my limbs was excrutintingly painful, When I drew my feet up a few inches, my knees pressed the cover, so that the slight shift of position brought no relief. My impatience of the restraint in which I was kept began at length to drive me well nigh into madness. I was fevered. My temples burned and throbbed, my tongue became dry, light flashed across my eyes, and my brain whirled round. I am sure that my existence was preserved solely by the diminished strength and subsequent feebleness which I experienced, and which, from its rendering me insensible to increasing exacerbation of my brain's heat, allowed nature to resume her wonted temperature. But, alas! this was only that I might revive to encounter once more irremediable horror. Who could depict the frenzy, the unspeakable anguish of my situation? I thought my eyes would start from my head Burning tears flowed from my cheeks. My heart was swollen almost to bursting. I became restless in feeling, without finding space for a fancied relief in a new change of position. In my mental anguish, at times, however, I forgot my motionless bodily suffering, my rack of immovable agony.

How many hours I lay in this state of active and passive torture, I cannot tell. My thirst, however, soon became intolerable—My mouth seemed full of hot ashes. I heard again the hollow sound of a clock bell, of no small magnitude; judging from its deep intonation. No cranny which I had hitherto observed in my prison, let in light—though I well knew there must be some fissure for fresh air, for the continuance of life so far. How else had I existed? It was night; perhaps, when I first came to myself in my prison of 'six dark board,' I groped in vain over every part of their wooden surface which I could reach. I could find no chink, could see no ray. Again I heard the hollow knell which tended to increase my fearful agony. O, what were my feelings!

For along time after this, I lay steeped in my sufferings—or at least for a long time as it seemed to me. My head was buried all over—my limbs were excessively sore—the skin rubbed off in many places with my struggling—my eyes aching with pain. I sought relief by turning on my right side—I had never before turned but on my left—when I found under me a hard substance which I had never before perceived. I grasped it with some difficulty, and soon found it was a knot from the coffin plank, which had been forced inwards, in all probability, since I was placed there. I saw also a dim light through a hole, about as large as a half-crown piece, just below where my chin came. I put my hand to it, and found it covered with cloth, which I easily imagined was the lining of my coffin. I soon contrived to force my finger through the cloth, though not without considerable difficulty. Faint enough was the light it revealed, but it was a noonday sun of joy to me. By an uneasy strain of my neck, I could see obliquely through the opening, but everything was confused in my brain. My sight was cloudy, heavy and thick. I could at first only distinguish there was light, but could see no object. My senses, however, seemed to sharpen as new hopes arose. I closed my eyes for a minute together, and opened them to resore their almost worn out powers of vision. At length I could distinguish that immediately opposite to me there was a small window crossed by massive iron bars, through which the light I saw streamed in upon me like joy in the soul of misery. I now cried with delight. I thought I was among men again, for the pitchy darkness around me was dispersed, I forgot for a moment by sufferings. Even the fearful question, how I should get free from my durance before famine destroyed me, was a long time absent from my mind, and did not recur until I could look through the fissure no longer, from the giddiness caused by a too earnest fixedness of gaze.

I soon concluded, from the massy stones on each side of the opening and the strength of the bars, that I was in a church vault; and this was confirmed when I came to distinguish the ends of two or three coffins which partly interposed between me and the light. I watched the window until the light began to grow dim, with feelings no language can describe, no tongue can tell.

As the gloom of night approached, my heart began to beat fainter, and my former agonies returned with tenfold weight, not withstanding which, I imagined I must have slept some. I was sensible of a noise like the grating of a heavy door upon its hinges, when I revived or awoke—I cannot say which; and I saw the light of a candle gleam across the fissure in my coffin. I called out 'For the love of your soul, release me! I am buried alive!'

The light vanished in a moment. Fear seemed to have palsied the hand that held it, for I heard a rough voice desiring the holder of it in return.

'If there be any one here he is soldered up. Tom, hand me the light. The dead never speak. Jim, the Snatcher, is not to be scared by a bit of rotten flesh.'

Again I called as loud as I could—'I am buried alive! Save me!'

'Tom, the axe!' cried the undaunted body snatcher. 'The voice comes from this box. The undertakers too great haste I suppose.'

In a few minutes I was sitting upright in my coffin.

[Here, after detailing his reception at home, and the surprise of his friends, Mr. Hodgson says, he had public thanks for his deliverance returned in his parish church, and that ever afterwards he cherished a strong regard for resurrection men, who never asked a guinea of him in vain.]

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, JANUARY, 22nd: 1852.

In our last, we noticed the departure of President Roberts with the troops, for Grand Bassa, for the punishment of Grando, the Fishman, and the Bassa Chiefs, who joined with him in his rebellion. We then, for want of time, did not state particulars.

On Monday the 29th, Dec. 200 men, called for from this county, mustered armed and equipped—the 75 volunteers before sent down, will make the number from here two hundred and seventy five; and it was determined to accept the services of 100 volunteers from Grand Bassa. The Vey, Dey and Golah Chiefs, insisted on sending large numbers of their armed warriors to assist the President in the campaign—they strongly contended that they should do so;—'they having' as they said, 'become a part and parcel of Liberia,' & felt themselves bound to bear a portion of its responsibilities. 'The President acknowledged it their duty to bear a portion of the expenses of government; and would accept their assistance as far as was consistent and just: and therefore, instead of receiving the 600 warriors they proposed to send, he accepted the services of 250 of them.

On Tuesday the 30th, Dec. the 1st. Regiment was put in motion by its commander Colonel Yates—and was marched to the Providence Baptist Church, where appropriate religious services were performed by the Rev. Beverly R. Wilson. From the church, they marched to the beach, to take shipping on board the Liberia Government schooner 'Lark,' and the schooner "George R. Mc Gill,"—all were on board by 2 o'clock, and by 8 o'clock the vessels were on their way, freighted with husbands, sons and brothers; eager to subdue the rebellious Chiefs, and restore to the country order and quietness. The prayers of thousands are daily offered up to the Great Governor of the Universe, for His protecting care and guardianship.

The native force went down by land.

Religious.

On Sunday, the 21st, December, the solemnization of the holy ordinance of baptism, by Elder John Day, of Boxley, Grand Bassa, took place in our town. Nine persons were immersed—three of whom were native Africans, living in our midst, and who were taught to respect holy things. The result is, their conversion to God. Scores of the aborigines of the country, taught in the families of our citizens, are members in full fellowship in our churches. The ceremonies on this occasion were deeply interesting and impressive; and the spectators were numerous.

There are other candidates waiting to be baptised; and we understand they will soon be the subjects of this holy ordinance. It is understood that Elder H. Teage will be the administrator on the occasion.

On the St. Paul's, last month, several individuals were baptised by Elder John H. Cheesman. The number we have not heard.

It is a subject of deep regret among the baptists living in the different settlements up the river, that they cannot obtain preachers to instruct the people. In fact, they say, they have no preachers. Will not their baptist brethren in the U. States give them some help? They are poor, and unable to support preachers.'

The annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, will hold their session at Millsburgh. It was to have commenced on the 8th, inst: but the non-arrival of its President, the Rev. Francis Burns, from Cape Palmas, will necessarily delay the meeting. As soon as he arrives, the Conference will be organized, and proceed with its business.

January 20th. Mr. Burns has arrived. To morrow the conference will commence its business at 10 o'clock.

We have received intelligence of the President and the troops—they arrived in the harbor 31st, Dec. & landed at "Buchanan" on the morning Jan. 1st. 1852, all well. The troops are encamped at Fishtown waiting the arrival of the native force by the beach; they were expected that evening. The volunteers from Monrovia, first sent down, were looking well and enjoying good health. The President had visited the town, escorted by the first company, to learn the precise state of affairs, and to greet the volunteers of that county—he had concluded to accept the services of about 100. The Bassa Chiefs had offered to the President some of their armed warriors,—they were accepted. Several of the Bassa Chiefs had been sending in to say that they had nothing to do with Grando, some too, who are known to have joined him in his attack. They say they had been misrepresented, and for not serving in earlier their expressions of attachment to the government, they were willing to pay—but hoped their towns might be spared. The President was determined to try to discriminate between the innocent and the guilty—and that the guilty only suffer. Bob Gray, our staunch old friend, assures the President that Joe West of New Cess, maintains his allegiance to the government, and it is probable that Wee had no hand in the attack upon the settlement of Bassa Cove.

It is understood, that Grando is at his town, which is well barricaded, and intends to fight. He is represented to have but a small force, and it is supposed he will take to his heels before the troops can reach him. It was the purpose of the President to surround him if possible, to effect which, a party would be sent during the night of Friday in the rear of his town, to cut off his retreat, and Saturday morning the whole force would move against him. As far as could be ascertained at the time Grando's will be the most actual resistance they would have. "These fellows, however, are exceedingly treacherous and it is possible that the Bassa Chiefs may hope to put us off our guard by their professions of friendship—thinking to take advantage of our confidence, and fall upon us unprepared. We, shall, however, keep a bright look out and be prepared for any emergency."

The President writes that, "Old Joe Harris has just come to see me, to beg for King Sotiby John, who he says has remained neutral—and he would like to excuse Zeo, who, according to what he says was forced into the war by threats from Grando. I suspect these fellows have agreed to pay Joe pretty well, if he succeed in saving their towns. We are here, and must teach all that participate with Grando, a lesson they will not soon forget. I wish to make this a winding up of all difficulties in Bassa: that we may not be troubled in future in this part of the Republic at least."

We regret that the illness of General Lewis would not permit him to accompany the military force. He was very anxious to follow his command, but the state of his health absolutely forbid his doing so. For the last six months, his health has been very feeble,—he is now, however, considerably better.

This is truly a time of "wars and rumors of wars; for marrying and given in marriage." Nearly every evening within the last two months, the marriage ceremony has been performed. We have been told of cases where the ceremony had been performed after the bridegrooms had entered their names as volunteers for the military expedition. We have no objection to our soldiers being men of families—they will be certain then to act well their part, when danger threatens to disturb the quietness of their firesides—and with strong arms will they struggle to defend their wives, their children, and the honor of their country. Every man, woman, and child should love their country—they should be ready at all times to sacrifice their personal feelings for its good. When these principles actuate the people, their country is secured.

We have received further intelligence from Grand Bassa, by the arrival of the sloop "Nathan Bangs." Under date 3rd, January, President Roberts writes "The arrival of the "John Adams," will be of great service to us. I shall get Captain Bowen to place her off Trade Town—the "Lark" off New Cess, and the "George R. Mc Gill" off Tobacconee, to attract attention. The native force from the Cape did not arrive here till last night, which will delay us from moving earlier tha Monday morning, as they are very much fatigued, and will need a day's rest, and I prefer to remain quiet during Sunday. Our Chaplain, Mr. Russell, holds services every morning, for which purpose, the whole line is formed at six in the morning."

"We have now in camp about 800 men, and will be joined by about 300 more Bassa people. It is my purpose to divide our force in two columns, and take separate routes through the country, to assemble at Wee's town. I wish to arrange so as to hem the enemy in, and prevent his escape. Some 200 or 400 fishmen showed themselves at the point yesterday, and Captain Cooper gave them a couple of shot from the "Lark," and he thinks he killed one. I think it doubtful myself."

"Our men are in good health and fine spirits—only three or four complained of pain in their stomachs, occasioned, perhaps by a change of water to which are now all right."

"The Lord, I am satisfied, will be with us and take care of us. I see that there will very little, if any fighting to do. The whole country is in consternation, and before time no one will make resistance against Grando, and his will be feeble, if any."

Mr. Richardson left Grand Bassa river, on the morning of the 5th:—he says, that morning the army commenced its march to Grando's town—at the same time, the U. S. ship "John Adams."—the "Lark" and the "George R. Mc Gill" got under weigh and stood for Tobacconee, where they anchored about the time he supposed the army reached Grando's town, a large fire was observed to be seen and the people, judging from its direction, knew that it was G's town. Mr. R. thinks the army can not number less than 1500 men as soldiers were coming in to night, for 2 days squads of native soldiers armed and equipped, were hurrying to join the President. He says the officers and men were in high spirit; and with the exception of three or four invalids were enjoying good health.

Letters have reached here from Bassa Cove, dated the 7th: from which we gather the following information. That eight large towns, had been taken and burnt—that nineteen prisoners had been taken, and three killed and that the army had met with no very serious opposition. The health of the army was good.

We are waiting in great anxiety to gain further intelligence—to hear if the leaders of the insurrection, Grando, Boyer and others, have been captured and justly punished.

Remarkable.—We are informed that of the company of 151 immigrants landed from the "Morgan Dix," at Grand Bassa, one hundred of them are men; the remainder are women and children. If this is true, and we have no reason to doubt it, it is certainly worthy of notice, and we believe without a parallel in the history of African Colonization. Of the company of 35 by the "Zeno," sent out by the New York Colonization Society, the larger proportion were males, but nearly, in all other companies, the proportion of females and children exceeded that of the males. Blame is to be attached to no one, if we do not receive the precise description of immigrants we would prefer.

Our wonder is, that a greater number of the applicants referred are not sent out. Upon the whole we have reason to be gratified at the rapid increase of so strong and industrious immigrants. Let them come.

The Methodist Episcopal Church Case—North versus South. The decision in favor of the South!—Many of our readers will, no doubt, like to hear the result of this interesting case. It was tried in the U. S. Circuit Court, November, 1850—before Hon. Judges Nelson and Betts. The New York Herald of Nov. 13th, gives the decision of the judges entire—the concluding paragraph of which, reads,—"Upon the whole, our conclusion is, that the complainants are entitled to their share of the proceeds of the Book Concern, and a decree will be so ordered accordingly. Whether the funds shall be administered by an application of the produce, pro rata or by an appointment of the capital, are questions reserved until the settlement of the decree. We had hoped that this unfortunate controversy would have been amicably adjusted by the parties, agreeably to the suggestions of each of the learned counsel, at the close of the argument, and in which the court cordially concurred. But, if the views we have taken of the case, and conclusions we have arrived at, shall tend, in the least degree, to heal the unhappy division, and restore brotherly affection and christian friendship among so highly useful and distinguished a body of Christians we shall not regret the labor we have bestowed in deciding it."

Brazilian Consul.

We have the gratification of noticing the arrival of a Brazilian Consul. This gentleman arrived in the U. S. ship "John Adams," and will, we presume remain on board until the return of the President to-morrow.

Letters from the army, which he visited at Bassa make very favorable mention of this gentleman—the urbanity of his manners won for him the esteem and respect of all who had the pleasure of an introduction to him.

Five days after the departure of the President with the troops an armed troop, numbering above 150, arrived on the northern side of the St. Paul's. They were sent from Boporo, by King Boatswain to assist the government in punishing the rebellious Chiefs in the Bassa Country. The Vice President informed them that their services were not required, and that they need not cross the river, we believe they have returned home.

The readiness with which the Vey, Golah, Dey and Bassa Chiefs, tendered their services to government on this occasion; indicates the great influence it exercises over them and their tribes.

We had information of the following appointments in the army, since it left. Hon. S. A. Benson, Aide-de-Camp to the Commander-in-Chief.

Lieut. H. W. Denis, late of State Fencibles, Brigade Commissary, Acting.
Lieut. [illegible] Stryker, " " " Brigade Quarter Master, Acting.
Lieut. J. H. Chavers, " " "
Adjutant First Regiment, Acting.
D. V. B. James, Assistant Surgeon.

The Alexander High School.

We take much pleasure in informing our readers, that this institution opened on the 12th inst. The Rev. A. D. Wilson is the principal and will, it is believed, exert himself to improve the minds of the youth, who may be placed under his instruction.

"Tuition in the school will be free, but the scholars will be expected to purchase such books as they will need, and which may be procured by applying to the principal."

We recommend to our citizens the propriety of giving every encouragement to this institution—its terms are most liberal, and the course of instruction intended to be pursued, will be the advancement of our youth in the higher branches of education.

Revolution in France.—We have received intelligence that a revolution broke out in Paris on the 12th, of December last. We have not hear how far the revolutionists succeeded, nor what their intentions are: but it is not unreasonable to conclude that a change of the form of government is aimed at. It is lamentable, that a people so enlightened as the French are acknowledged to be, should so frequently astonish the world by their opposition to law and order. Four years have not elapsed, since the streets of Paris overflowed with the blood of its citizens, and the monarchy changed into a Republic; and now we suppose the Republic will be changed into a monarchy. Can it be possible that the French people delight in butchering each other, and laying in waste their beautiful cities? The next steamer we hope will bring further intelligence,—in the interim we will indulge the hope that order prevails in that attractive city, and that confidence is again restored.

We, again, have the pleasure of noting the freindship and good feelings of H. B. Majesty's Government, to the Government of Liberia, in the presentation of "Five Roller Gins," constructed purposely by direction of Her B. Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. They were brought from Sierra Leone, by H. B. Majesty's steam sloop "Firefly," and conveyed to the Government by H. Majesty's Consul.

The French Republic

We have ave been favored through the kindness of Hon A. D. Williams of perusing the "London Times," of the 14th December,—and the "London Weekly Dispatch," of the 7th. From them we make extracts of the state of affairs in France. We regret that our time will not permit us to give a more detail d account of the revolution—but what we do give, will enable our readers to form some idea of the deplorable condition of that country. The "Times" and "Despatch" are strong in their reprobation of the conduct of President Louis Napoleon Bonaparte—it is to him they charge the present disorder in Paris. That the President violated the Constitution in dissolving the National Assembly, there can not be a doubt—and he is therefore, guilty of an act of high treason. The 68th. article of the Constitution reads thus:—"The President and his Ministers are each responsible for the acts of the Government, and any measure by which the President shall dissolve or prorogue the National Assembly, or reduce any obstacle to the exercise of its functions, is an act of high treason." By that very act the President forfeits his authority, and every citizen is bound to refuse obedience to his orders."

The National Assembly after being dissolved, attempted to meet, they were dispersed by the soldiery, a portion of them, however, succeeded in assembling in a retired place and hastily decreed the following.—"The Assembly,—after reading the 68 Article of the Constitution—therefore, since it is hindered by violence from accomplishing its mission decrees."

"Louis Napoleon Bonaparte is deprived of his functions as President of the Republic, and the citizens are called on to refuse him obedience."

"The Executive passes in its plenitude to the Assembly."

"The Judges of the High Court of Justice are called upon to meet immediately, upon pain of dismissal to proceed to judgment against the President and his accomplices."

It is ordained upon all functionaries that they obey the requisition made in the name of the Assembly under penalty of forfeiture and the punishment prescribed for high treason."

Proceedings of the Assembly

The steps, Article 68 of the Constitution, proceeds to see it quoted above. "Considering that Louis Napoleon Bonaparte has violated his oath and [illegible] and endeavored the public force to consummate his crime." The undersigned Members of the Assembly, after taking official cognizance of the violence offered by the President to its meeting. [illegible] the arrest of the person and several of its Members declare:—"That the 68th. Article of the Constitution [illegible] to every Citizen the duty [illegible]."

"The President is thus declared deprived of his authority, the High Court of Justice is summoned; every citizen is forbidden to obey the deposed power, [illegible] of punishment."

"The General Councils are convoked, and are to meet immediately; they will name a Commissioner from the members of their own body, who will assist the administration of the department, and will communicate with the Assembly in whatever place it shall please to meet."

"All agents, receivers of the public funds, who shall refuse to give up possession of the same to any person or persons, other than those authorized in the regular and lawful manner, shall be held responsible, both in person and property. Done the 2nd of December, 1851,"—and then follow the names of the signers.

It is certain that Bonaparte has the military under his control; and is prepared to execute any order he may issue. He has commissioned a new ministry, who is steadfast in carrying out all his plans. Several members of the Assembly were arrested and imprisoned; and a large number of the people—many have left the country. The people were being massacred in all parts of Paris.

PARIS, Tuesday, Dec 2. 4 P. M.

The President of the Republic was informed last night that a meeting was held at General Changarnier's house, attended by M. Thiers, M. Baze, and others of the chiefs of parties, at which it decided that the coup against the President should be made this very day—that is, that he should be arrested, the Assembly prorogued or dissolved, and the Republic abolished.

It was considered absolutely necessary to take steps immediately, and proclamations were at once prepared, among which was the following:—

"APPEAL TO THE PEOPLE.

"Frenchmen.—The present situation cannot last much longer. Each day the situation of the country becomes worse. The Assembly, which ought to be the firmest supporter of order, has become a theatre of plots. The patriotism of 300 of its Members could not arrest its fatal tendencies. In place of making laws for the general interest of the people it was forging arms for civil war. It attacked the power I hold directly from the people; it encouraged every evil passion; it endangered the repose of France. I have dissolved it, and I make the whole people judge between me and it. The Constitution, as you know, had been made with the object of weakening beforehand the powers you intrusted to me. Six millions of votes were a striking protest against it, and yet I have faithfully observed it. Provocations, calumnies, outrages, found me passive. But now that the fundamental part is no longer respected by those who incessantly invoke it, and the men who have already destroyed two monarchies wish to tie up my hands in order to overthrow the Republic, my duty is to baffle their perfidious projects, to maintain the Republic, and to save the country by appealing to the solemn judgments of the only Sovereign I recognize in France—the people.

"I, then, make a loyal appeal to the entire nation; and I say to you, if you wish to continue this state of disquietude and gêne that degrades you and endangers the future, choose another person in my place, for I no longer wish for a place which is powerless for good but which makes me responsible for acts that I cannot hinder, and chains me to the helm when I see the vessel rushing into the abyss. If, on the contrary, you have still confidence in me, give me the means of accomplishing the grand mission I hold from you. That mission consists in closing the era of revolution, in satisfying the legitimate wants of the people, and in protecting them against subverse passions. It consists especially to create institutions which survive men, and which are the foundation on which something durable is based. Persuaded that the instability of power, that the preponderance of a single Assembly, are the permanent causes of trouble and discord, I submit to your suffrages the fundamental basis of a constitution which the Assemblies will develop hereafter:—

"1. A responsible chief named for 10 years.

"2. The Ministers dependent on the Executive alone.

"3. A Council of State formed of the most distinguished men preparing the laws and maintaining the discussion before the legislative corps.

"4. A legislative corps, discussing and voting the laws, named by universal suffrage, without the scrutin de liste which falsifies the election.

"5. A second Assembly, formed of all the illustrious persons of the nation; a prepondering power, guardian of the fundamental pact, and of public liberty.

"This system, created by the First Consul in the beginning of the present century, has already given to France repose and prosperity. It guarantees them still. Such is my profound conviction. If you partake it, declare so by your suffrages. If, on the contrary, you prefer a Government without force, Monarchical or Republican, borrowed from some chimerical future, reply in the negative. Thus, then, for the first time since 1804 you will vote with complete knowledge of the fact, and knowing for whom and for what you vote.

"If I do not obtain the majority of the votes I shall summon a new Assembly, and lay down before it the mission I have received from you. But if you believe that the cause of which my name is the symbol, that is, France regenerated by the revolution of '89, and organized by the Emperor, is still yours, proclaim it to be so by ratifying the powers I demand of you. Then France and Europe will be preserved from anarchy, obstacles will be removed, rivalries will have disappeared, for all will respect, in the will of the people, the decree of Providence.

"LOUIS NAPOLEON BONAPARTE."

PROCLAMATION OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC TO THE ARMY

"Soldiers!—Be proud of your mission; you will save the country. I rely upon you, not to violate the laws, but to command respect for legitimate representative.

"You long suffered, like me, from the obstacles that prevented me doing you all the good I intended, and opposed the demonstrations of your sympathy in my favour. Those obstacles are removed. The Assembly sought to impair the authority which I derive from the entire nation; it has ceased to exist.

"I make a loyal appeal to the people and the Army, and I tell them—either give me the means of insuring your prosperity, or choose another in my place.

"In 1830, as well as in 1848, you were treated as a vanquished army. After having brandished your heroical disinterestedness, they disdained to consult your sympathies and wishes, and, nevertheless, you are the Elite of the nation. To-day, at this solemn moment, I wish the voice of the Army to be heard.

"Vote, then, freely as citizens; but, as soldiers, do not forget that passive obedience to the orders of the chief of the Government is the rigorous duty of the Army, from the General down to the soldier. It is for me, who am responsible for my actions before the people and posterity, to adopt the measures most conducive to the public welfare.

"As for you, maintain entire the rules of discipline and honour. By your imposing attitude assist the country in manifesting its will with calmness and reflection. Be ready to repress all attempt against the free exercise of the sovereignty of the people.

"Soldiers, I do not speak to you of the recollections attached to my name. They are engraved on your hearts. We are united by indissoluble ties. Your history is mine. There is between us in the past a community of glory and misfortunes. There shall be in the future a community of sentiments and resolutions for the repose and grandeur of France.

(Signed) "LOUIS NAPOLEON BONAPARTE."

"Palace of the Elysee, Dec. 2."

The Prefect of Police to the inhabitants of Paris:—

"Parisians.—The President of the Republic, by a courageous initiative, has baffled the machinations of parties, and put an end to the anguish of the country. It is in the name of the people, in its interest, and for the maintenance of the peace, that the event is accomplished.

"It is to the judgment of the people that Louis Napoleon Bonaparte submits his conduct.

"The greatness of the act makes you understand with what imposing and solemn silence the free exercise of the popular sovereignty ought to be manifested. To-day, as yesterday, let order be our watch words; let all good citizens, animated as I am by the love of the country, aid me in my unalterable resolution.

"Have confidence in him whom 6,000,000 of votes have raised to the first dignity of the country. When he summons the entire people to express their will the factions alone would place obstacles in the way. Any attempt at disorder shall be promptly and inflexibly repressed.

Since our last we have received further intelligence from the army. Our read is wet, however, notice that it differs somewhat in the particulars but does not materially affect the reality.

On the 8th from Tabacconee, we have the following direct intelligence:—"On monday morning half past 6 o'clock the whole line moved off in the direction of Softy Jack's town, which place we reached in 2 hours without opposition. Just as we entered the town the natives set fire to it, and ceased by the rear gate We succeeded in extinguishing the fire—saving enough house for comfortable quarters for our men. Soon after entering, heavy firing across from the woods the Congoes and Boatswain's people were sent on to dislodge them; which they did successfully, killing some five or six, and capturing 16. We remained at Softy Jack's during the night without interruption. At 6 o'clock in the morning, Tuesday, we were under arms; the second Regiment under command of Colonel Weaver, number about 300, was ordered to march round the Basa Country, and along and following the Town of Bromley, and to join the 1st Regiment at Wes's town tomorrow 9th inst.

"Soon after the 2nd Regiment moved off, the 1st was in motion to march through the Tabacconee country taking Grando's town in the route. After marching about 1 1-2 or 2 miles, the head of the column entered a swamp of large poplars, and was attacked by some force not very considerable. Here we deployed and we moved up as rapidly as possible. The swamp is about 150 yards across, and the most difficult pass I ever crossed. The people that first fired which appear to have been a detachment from the main body—fell back to the opposite side of the swamp where they erected a formidable stockade pretty well concealed from view. When within about 100 yards of it, he opened on us a murderous fire, which he kept up for 1 1-2 hours. Our men stood the fire well, and advanced steadily that frequently in to their waist in mud and water; when we got to 50 yards of the stockade Company No. 3 Captain Gabriel Moore, was ordered to file left, and flank the enemy. Captain Moore pushed bravely on keeping up a steady fire, which so well did the enemy as to cause him to retire. After re-forming and mustering our men, we found that we had 14 men wounded—none thank God dangerously. Captain Seymour,—received a shot, which struck the collar bone and glanced into the place it now is, but not dangerous, and he will return to day to Bassa. A Vey boy was wounded in the leg, and one Congo in the thigh; one of Boatswain's men was wounded in the thigh also—these we had to carry—the others were wounded in the arms, and two or three slightly on the side of the face.

"Some of our men had expended all their ammunition; and others got their cartridge boxes wet in crossing the swamp we had therefore to halt at the stockade, for an hour or so to distribute ammunition. This through, we continued our march. The enemy in the mean time had rallied, and mustered himself on an elevation, about a mile in advance of us. The place was well chosen—a pretty large hill in the middle of an old cassada farm and covered with Bromley bill's,—just as we emerged from the Forest, and when nearly the whole right wing was exposed the enemy opened on us; the men rushed forward and soon dislodged him. Here we had two of Boatswain's men wounded, one pretty badly. We halted upon the ground from which we had driven the enemy, and refreshed ourselves from our knapsacks, with a well earned breakfast. While we were thus engaged we saw the smoke of Grando's town ascending high into the before us. I could tell by this that we were to have no more fighting—which turned out to be the case. We, however, deemed quite prepared for any thing—the men in high spirit. We resumed the line of march without further opposition—it was then too late in the afternoon to go on the beach before night, we therefore encamped and made ourselves as comfortable as possible in the barracks. Grando's men went out and burned two or three small towns and collected a quantity of plunder. We have not gained any intelligence of the gun that was taken from the Cove. I forgot to mention that we had some six or eight hostages among us, Joh's town, and obtained some provision for the troops in effecting this. Varfuller lost one man, and had another wounded, not badly.

"We left Grando's late on Tuesday morning, and reached this place about 4 P. M.—As we approached the beach the Englishmen fired upon towns people and fled to New Cess. But of all traveling, yesterday's much beats every thing. Logs and swamps every two or three hundred yards, the first we came to was forty a mile wide, the men frequently sinking up to the hips, they had to sling their cartridge boxes around their necks; and one place was scarcely fordable. But here we are in our rude tents upon the beach; the Americans are employed in making cartridges, and the Congoes and Boatswain's people in scouring the country burning towns. The natives will remember this expedition for years and years to come. Our African troops, so far, have been wonderfully preserved by a kind Providence. We have had very few sick—not one dangerously among them; and, but few accidents. The wounded and few sick will be dispatched to Grand Bassa.

We hope to be able to move off from here early to-morrow morning; it is not yet decided whether we will proceed immediately to Wes's town from here or go first to New Cess, and thence to Joe West's town, and send a detachment from there to bring up the 2 d Regiment. I presume we shall not have much more difficulty till we reach Boyer's town—it is contemplated to make such disposition of our forces as to foil the anticipations, and save our men as much as possible."

When the troops were at Bassa, the President received a letter from King Joe West of New Cess—here is an extract from it.—It is dated Joe West's Town, 6th January. "Dear sir, yours came safe to hand, and I read with great pleasure, I am very glad that you have heard I have nothing to do with the war. I never have anything to do with it whatever, and I do. I would have joined Mr. Thos. R. Buttons, and Mr. Carroll—the natives have been to me to never when up to them, but I refused to do. You never, never, never hear the New Cess people war. When you come if the mane fish are at Pour River, it will be the Trade Town and Grando, people the reason they will fight you here, [illegible] that is us. If you should [illegible] do not call at my town but go to Boyer's town first. [illegible] Monrovia, this Trade Town people [illegible] And now, that I have held communication [illegible] &c. &c. Grando is no friend of mine he [illegible] much sons of my people and [illegible] country. I am an old man, and not [illegible] into grave—and do not feel [illegible] with a cause. Please write me by the bearer. King Jim, King Freeman and Prince Wee join with me in writing this letter—so [illegible] they have nothing to do with the war.

"I am your true friend
signed "Joe West."

Circumstances, we think, did not permit the President to avail Joe West's offer as requested—he took it in his route to Trade Town—The New Cess people have remained true to their word—[illegible] a coal from Grando and Sasy. Our next news will, we presume, come from Trade Town.

Our last date from the Army is January 17—The Trade Town march and road.—This morning it is reported that a canoe will leave this evening for Monrovia. We had a long march through the country since I last wrote you from Tabacconee. We met no resistance at the New Cess country. At 6 o'clock Tuesday A. M.—we commenced our march from Joe West's town, for Trade Town—Boyer's—which place we reached about 2 P. M.—We had heard of his hostile and belligerent preparations, he was making to receive us—and sure enough when within a mile of the Barrie he fired on our van with a volley of musketry [illegible] Davey—a Congo—was killed, and [illegible] Barrie's;—they opened from a the south side of marketts, and cannon charged with [illegible] were brought to a dead halt; the ground favorable and unfavorable for us—it was [illegible] and prevented us from advancing under the fire—but we escape [illegible] they overshot us—but we could not advance their fire—we remained in this [illegible] Lone—until [illegible] with a part of our force, and [illegible] as soon as the ground favored the [illegible] fire, and our men from [illegible] that hard fought battle—the [illegible] puted very inch of ground with us [illegible] to pass. In two hours from the time [illegible] we had quiet possession of the town—it was deserted. We had four killed, Lieut. Wm. E. Brown 1st Company; Jo. Smith, [illegible] twenty three wounded—Cols. M'Gill and Dr. Cole [illegible] in the knee—not very badly; Major Bouey [illegible] Wm. Hilbig, Houston from Kentucky, [illegible] The Governor all fresh wounds and not dangerous. President Roberts escaped with a ramrod [illegible]

"We have just arrived here and will soon embark for New Cess, and embark Monday morning for Bassa, we may look for us home the latter part of next week."

Every hour we are expecting to hear that the troops have arrived. They will receive a hearty welcome. They have undergone much exposure, and [illegible] They have glorious. We fear Grando and Boyer will again harass our [illegible] It is true they have received a severe lesson; but it must be remembered that these chiefs are the rebellion, higher on the head of the [illegible] Are they not incited on in their work [illegible] for its suppression? In time, the truth of these things will be brought to light. We do not charge one [illegible] the tone of these fellows, the natives, [illegible] from what it always has been—leads us to the belief that others have coincided them in their opposition to the government.

POETRY.

THE CHILD AT PRAYER.

BY REV. WM. SWAN,
(Formerly Missionary to Siberia.)

There is on earth a lovely sight
To which from heaven the angels bend—
A voice they hear with rapt delight,
A sound with which their harp-notes blend,
A scene o'er which, with viewless wing,
Their host are ceaseless hovering.

What may it be? Is it the saint—
Upon his head the hoary crown,
His heart and flesh about to faint,
The sun of life fast sinkin down,
Closing in peace his earthly days—
His prayer already turned to praise?

Is it the martyr at the stake,
Looking to heaven with a fearless eye—
Seeing that saviour for whose sake
He counts it glory thus to die,
And praying, with his latest breath
For those who triumph in his death?

Is it a parent's love? The meek
The pious mother, bent in prayer,
The tear of faith upon her cheek,
Beseeching God her child to spare—
Look on it with a smiling face,
And bless it with His richest grace?

No. 'Tis that child upon its knees
In its unnoticed hiding-place,
Where none on earth o'erhears or sees,
Lisping a prayer inspired by grace;
Lifting its little heart to heaven,
Praying to have its sins forgiven!

The dying Christian heart is calm,
And glorious is the martyrs death,
The mother's tear of faith is balm,
But sweeter that child's praying breath
And if a spot on earth is
'Tis where an infant [illegible]

QUEEN VICTORIA.

The English people, it must be confessed, are fond of respectable conduct; and therefore they admire the Queen, who, as a mother and a wife, is an ornament to her sex. There is not a more kind-hearted woman in the world, a better wife, nor a more affectionate mother. Her political tendencies are believed to be liberal, but she acts as if she belonged to no party, and her conduct as a ruler, is wholly based upon the advice of her Ministry, who are responsible by law for what they make her do. I am persuaded that in the revolutionary events of 1848, it was the personal character and popularity of Queen Victoria which preserved the country from a bold effort to establish a Republic.

The personal habits of the Queen and her family are extremely simple and plain. Breakfast is over by nine; then a couple of hours are devoted to the perusal of letters and the despatch of business, which consists of reading abstracts of the public documents which she has to sign. Between 12 and 2 the Queen and her family usually walk in the private grounds of the palace; if the weather do not permit out-of-door exercises, Prince Albert and she apply themselves to drawing and etching. Both have acquired some skill in the use of the graver, and have a small press put up in one of the rooms of Buckingham palace, at which they work with their own hands. A present of a set of royal etchings is considered a very special compliment and prized as such. I know that the business of Bentley's boudoir, at Woburn Abbey is hung round with royal etchings. Some of them are neatly done—most of them in good drawing. All of them are curiosities, as specimens of royal art and industry.

Between two and three the royal party lunch. This repast, which is in fact an early dinner, is a very private one. The Queen, Prince Albert, the Princess Royal and Prince of Wales, sit down to a single joint, (usually a roast shoulder of mutton,) and a few side dishes. There is very little wine partaken of at this meal. When it is ended, Prince Albert goes into the garden, (for the Queen allows no smoking within her walls,) and disposes of a couple of cigars. While the royal-luncheon is going on, the attendants at the palace, who are very numerous, take their dinner—a plain, substantial meal, at which the liveried servants are allowed ale. For those of a higher rank, the allowance is half a pint of wine to each. I happen to know that when any artists are at work, or in waiting at the palace at the hour of lunch, meat is served up to them, and half a pint of sherry, is brought up for each. This is very different from the waste which did prevail in the royal household, and Queen Adelaide was the first to put a check to it. She too got indignant at the female servants wearing silks and satins, and caused a menial revolt by ordering them to wear muslins and stuffs. The economy of the household now allows the Queen to save about half the money annually voted for its maintenance.

These savings are considerable, and being duly invested, are rapidly accumulating. Then, in addition to his £30 000 a year allowance as consort, as much more has been given to Prince Albert in various appointments (he has £16 a day as Field Marshal;) and as he does not spend £10.000 a year, his saving must be great. There is a fond hope that he and the Queen mean to appropriate this money to the future pension of their children, and not to ask the people to support them—N. Y. Times.

THE MOB.—The mob is a demon, fierce and ungovernable. It will not listen to reason; it will not be influenced by fear or pity, or self-preservation. It has no sense of justice. Its energy is exerted in frenzied fits; its forbearance is apathy or ignorance. It is a grevious error to suppose that this cruel, this worthless hydra, has any political feeling. In its triumph it breaks windows in its anger it breaks heads. Gratify it, and it creates a disturbance; disappoint it, and it grows furious; attempt to appease it, and it grows outrageous; meet it boldly, and it turns away. It is accessible to no feeling but one of personal suffering; it submits to no argument but that of the strong hand. The point of the bayonet convinces; the edge of the sabre speaks keenly; the noise of the musketry is listened to with respect; the roar of artillery is unanswerable. How deep, how grievous, how burdensome is the responsibility that lies on him who would rouse this fury from its den! It is astonishing, it is so little known, how much individual character is lost in the aggregate character of a multitude. Men may be rational, moderate, peaceful, loyal and sober, as, individuals; yet heap them by the thousand, and, in the very progress of congregation, loyalty, quietness, moderation, and even reason evaporate, and a multitude of rational beings is an unreasonable and intemperate being—a wild infuriated monster, which may be driven, but not led, except to mischief— which has an appetite for blood, and a savage joy in destruction, for mere gratification of destroying,—Democratic Recorder.

RISE FROM AN HUMBLE CONDITION.

In a speech delivered by the Hon. and Rev. the Dean of Ripon at the late soiree of the Mechanics Institute, Leeds, a few passages occur worthy of being widely circulated:

"I like to think with pleasure, and satisfaction and wonder, of the extraordinary advancements which, in the providence of God, particular individuals have made, who have just been able, to supply the operation of the minds according as they were able to exercise them, and thereby to place themselves in extraordinary positions, both in relation to their own prosperity and to the advantage of the country. It may be a very familiar subject, but it is one which I do like to think of, and I will just allude to it. There was a young man, who was the youngest of thirteen children, and his father a very poor man; and the best that his father could do for him was to apprentice him to a barber. In that humble and praiseworthy class of public life, that respectable individual demeaned himself honorably, as long as he chose to continue in it. He then bestowed his care and enterprise upon the beautiful hair of our heads, improving it to that degree, that it should be fit to make a wig of. In that he excelled. Then gentlemen, he betook himself to the improvement of a weed, which I have seen, and which is little more than like a weed— I mean the cotton plant of Carolina. He betook himself to improve the manufacture of cloth made out of that weed. He gained great success, adding merely to the acquirements which he possessed —which you may suppose were slender—the knowledge which he could pick up by associating with his fellow-men; he gained that success which enabled him to decide the wars of the linen and the cotton, so that the vestment should be made all of cotton. That barber's apprentice, gentlemen, that honorable improver of our hair, for the purpose of a wig, was Sir Richard Arkwright, afterwards high sheriff of his county, and who left his family half a million of money. Well, gentlemen, I only put this as one instance of a simple, plain man honestly following the call of Providence, using the mind according as God's providence gave him an opportunity of drawing forth its resources—throwing himself in the opening which was prepared for him, and thus gaining a prosperity exceeded by no man in this country, and I am sure that language is not equal to say the advantage which our nation has received from his invention, enabling him thus to show the benefit of the exercise of the mind, and talent, and energy, and desire for improvement in the humblest stations of life."—Southern Baptist

GREELEY'S NOTES

The English are eminent devotees of Method and Economy. I never saw the rule, "A place for everything, and everything in its place," so well observed as here. The reckless and the prodigal are found here as everywhere, also, but they are marked exceptions. Nine-tenths of those who have a competence know what income they have, and are careful not to spend more. A Duchess will say to a mere acquaintance, "I cannot afford" a proposed outlay—an avowal rarely and reluctantly made by an American, even in moderate circumstances. She means simply that other demands upon her income are such as to forbid the contemplated expenditure, though she could of course afford this if she did not deem those of prior consequence. No Englishman is ashamed to be economical, or to have it known that he is so. Whether his annual expenditure be fifty pounds or fifty thousand, he tries to get his money's worth. I have been admonished & instructed by the systematic economy which is practised even in great houses. You never see a lighted candle set down carelessly and left to burn an hour or two to no purpose, as is common with us; if you leave one burning some one speedily comes and quietly extinguishes the flame. Said a friend: "You never see any paper in the streets here as you do in New York, (swept out of the stores, &c:) the English throw nothing away.

We speak of the vast parks and lawns of the Aristocracy as so much land taken out of use and devoted to mere ostentation, but all that land is growing timber or furnishing pasturage—often both. The owner gratifies his taste or his pride by reserving it from cultivation, but he does not forget the main chance. So of his Fisheries and even Game Preserves. Of course, there are noblemen who would scorn to sell their venison or partridges; but game is abundant in the hotels and refectories—too much so for half of it to be obtaind by poaching. Few whose estates might yield them ten thousand a year are content with nine thousand.

The English are eminently a practical people. They have a living faith in the potency of the Horse-Guards, and in the maxim that "Safe bind is sure find." They have a sincere affection for roast beef. They are quite sure "the mob" will do no harm if it is vigilently watched and thoroughly overawed. Their obstreperous loyalty might seem incopsistent with this unideal character, but it is only seeming. When the portly and well-to-do Briton vociferates "God save the Queen!" with intense enthusiasm, he means "God save my estates, my rents, my shares, my consols, my expectation." The fervor of an Englishman's loyality is usual in a direct ratio with the extent of his material possessions.

The poor like the Queen personally, and like to gaze at royal pageantry; but they are not fanatically loyal. One who has seen Gen. Jackson or Harry Clay publicly enter New York or any other city, finds it hard to realize that the acclamations accorded on like ocrasions to Queen Victoria can really be deemed enthusiastic—Christian Chronicle

BREAD CAST UPON THE WATERS

The following anecdote is furnished by the biographer of the late Mrs Sarah Judson, of Burmah: "A middle aged man, of sober aspect and respectable appearance, came to the pastor of the Church (a Moulmain) to ask for baptism. He spoke the Burmese language imperfectly, and it was soon ascertained that he was a Peguan, from the vicinity of Bankok, in Siam.

"Why do you wish to be baptized?" inquired the pastor.

"I believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and I wish to enter his religion, and obey his commands."

"How do you know that this is one of his commands?"

"I have read about it in the book of truth."

"How did you first become acquainted with the religion of Jesus Christ.

"Before I came to this religion, a countryman of mine chanced to mention a wonderful little book, which a foreign teacher at Bankok had given him, and I had the curiosity to procure read it. I have never worshipped an idol since."

"Indeed, what book was it?"

"The Golden Balance."

The conversation for several moments ceased for the wheel of Time was thrown too suddenly back to admit of any concealment of emotion. The Golden Balance was one of the earliest efforts of Mrs. Judson, for translation into the Peguan tongue; and the stranger now sat beneath the very roof where she had toiled for his salvation. There had the fingers now moldering in a distant grave given wings to the precious seed, which floated away over vale and mountain river and woodland, to drop into the soil prepard for it by Holy Spirit.—She who would have rejoiced in it was not there, but by the labor of her hand and pen—by the labor of her lips, engraved on many a throbbing heart —by her prayers and by the fragrance that clings about her memory, she is living and laboring still."—Southern Baptist.

DECISIVE BATTLES.

The decisive battles of the world, those of which, to use Hallam's words, "a contrary event would have essentially varied the drama of the world in all its subsequent scenes," are numbered as fifteen by Professor Creasy, who fills the chair of Ancient and Modern History in the University of London. They are the grand subject of two volumes by him, just from Bently's press. These battles are:—

1. The battle of Marathon, fought 490 B. C., in which the Greeks under Themistocles defeated the Persians under Darius, thereby turning back a tide of Asiatic invasion, which else would have swept over Europe.

2. The battle of Syracuse, 413 B. C., in which the Athenian power was broken, and the West of Europe saved from Greek dominion.

3. The battle of Arbella, 331 B. C., in which Alexander, by the defeat of Darius, established his power in Asia, and by the introduction of European civilization produced an effect which as yet may be traced there.

4. The battle of Metaurus, fought 207 B. C., in which the Romans under Consul Nero, defeated the Carthagenians under Hasdrubal, and by which the supremacy of the great Republic was established.

5. The victory of the Arminius, A. D. 9 over the Roman legions under Varrus, which secured Gaul from Roman dominions.

6. The battle of Chalons, A. D. 451 in which Ætius defeated Attila, the Hun, the self-styled "Scourge of God," and saved Europe from entire devastation.

7. The battle of Tours, A. D 732, in which Charles Martel, by the defeat of the Saracens, averted the Mohammedan yoke from Europe.

8. The battle of Hastings, A. D. 1056, in which William of Normandy was victorious over the Anglo-Saxon Harold, and the result of which was the formation of the Anglo-Norman nation, which now is dominant in the world.

9. The battle of Orleans, A. D. 1429, in which the English were defeated and the independent existence of France secured.

10. The defeat of the Spanish Armada, A. D. 1588, which crushed the hopes of papacy in England.

11. The battle of Blenheim, A. D 1704 in which Marlborough, by the defeat of Tallard, broke the power and crushed the ambitious schemes of Louis XIV.

12. The defeat of Charles XII by Peter the Great at Pultowa, A. D. 1709 which secured the stability of the Muscovite Empire.

13. The battle of Saratoga, A. D. 1777, in which General Gates defeated Burgoyne, and which decided the fate of the American Revolutionists, by making France their ally, and other European powers friendly to them.

14. The battle of Valmy, A. D. 1792, in which the Continental Allies, under the Duke of Brunswick, were defeated by the French Revolutionary army.

15 The battle of Waterloo, A. D. 1815, in which the Duke of Wellington hopelessly defeated Napoleon, and saved Europe from his grasping ambition.—Southern Baptist.

READING.—The amusement of reading is among the greatest consolations of life; it is the nurse of virtue; the upholder in adversity; the prop of independence; the support of a just pride; the strengthener of elevated opinions: it is a shield against tyranny of all petty passions; it is the repeller of the fool's scoff, and the knave's poison.

SOLEMN THOUGHT.

We see not, in this life, the end of human actions. Their influence never dies. In ever-widening circles, it reaches beyond the grave. Death removes us from this to an eternal world; time determines what shall be our condition in that world. Every morning when we go forth, we lay the moulding hand on our destiny, and every evening when we have done, we have left a deathless impress upon our character. We touch not a wire that vibrates in eternity—not a voice but reports at the throne of God. Let youth, especially, think of these things, and let every one remember, that in this world, where character is in its formation state, it is a serious thing to think, to speak, to act.

DR. MURRAY IN ROME.

A correspondent of the New York Observer gives an account of the meeting of the Irish General Assembly, Rev. Dr. Murray, of New Jersey, has spoken:

Dr. Murray said he had just come from Rome; and he told them some very striking facts,—partly illustrating the mode in which "model Romanism" is conducted, as to liberty, religion and morality. He told a fact to show how, in the papal states, the property of a man becomes the property of the priests. A man in Rome had married a Spanish lady; he had a large family by her. By his will he left all his property to his wife and children. But, though during life, he had paid little attention to the priests, he sent for one, just before his death, to "fix" him for his journey into the next world. The priest confessed him, anointed him, gave him the wafer, and the man died,—leaving his property settled by his will, as above stated. A few days after the burial, the priest who had "fixed" him went to an ecclesiastical court, said the victim had committed a great sin, and that he wished a distribution of his property different from that he had made by will; and the entire property of that man, on the oath of that priest, was swept from his family into the coffers of the church. This is what they do in the Papal States.

ROMAN LIBERTY.

"During all the time I was in Rome," says Dr. M., "I did not see a single newspaper except those that came from England. The liberty of the press is not known there; and the liberty of speech just as little. I saw there a placard about Pietro Ercoli—a man 35 years of age—a merchant of good character, and with a large family, who had been brought before an Ecclesiastical court and condemned to the galleys for twenty years. For what, do you think, he was condemned? For stepping into a coffee room, and endeavoring to persuade a man who was smoking, not to use cigars. But why punish him so severely for bidding a man not smoke cigars?—Because the church gets a revenue from tobacco. The conduct of this man was represented as an interference with the revenues of the church; and because he had asked a man not to smoke a cigar, he was condemned to the galleys for twenty years. Such is political liberty under priestly rule."

MORALITY AND RELIGION AT THE FOUNTAIN HEAD.

It would seem that even attachment to the ceremonial of their religion is gone in Rome. "There is neither morality nor religion in Rome," says Dr. M. "I went into the Pantheon of which you have all heard; and the figure of which must be before all your eyes. It is a building, the foundation of which was laid during the reign of Paganism. It is the temple where all the heathen gods were worshipped, and at the present time it is the temple of Popish idolatry. It is a circular building, and here and there, and all around are altars, at which mass is said probably once a day,—one priest at this altar, another at another. I was at that temple looking round me, when I perceived a dirty looking priest, and a dirty looking lad—whose head seemed as if it had not been combed for a week—waiting upon him at an altar, and giving out the responses. That priest, that lad, myself, and my valet de place were the only persons present at the ceremony."

"I was in St. Peter's in the morning when mass was said. St. Peter's which is the most magnificent building of the kind in the world, ought to be dedicated to the arts, not to God. When one sees it, he cannot expect to see anything like it again, just as when one sees Mont Blanc, you do not wish to see another mountain. In that magnificent building, capable of holding some 20,000 or 30,000, there were not more than 300 present at mass. I have no doubt one half were strangers, and among all present, I do not believe there were ten Romans. I went among the churches of Rome, gorgeous beyond description. I went in at all hours of the day,—I may say, all hours of the night; as both day and night I went to see what I could see and hear what I could hear; and I am here able to say that I never saw an individual, man or woman, who wore a decent garb attending at the confessionals. I never saw a solitary woman bow the knee at the confessional except a beggar woman. I never saw a solitary man go on his knee to receive the wafer except a pauper. Men and women of character and rank keep away from these churches; and the churches themselves are given up to boys & beggars. It is amazing in the magnificent St. Peter's, to see boys in rags playing hide and seek; and beggars standinghere & there saying, 'give me a penny.' Go where you will, you see nothing like devotion; you hear nothing like preaching."

Dr. M. gave much striking description of the aspects under which religion shows itself, not only in Rome, but in Naples, and all over Italy,—adding after each, "And such would Ireland be if Protestanism were banished." But he added, "I dare not describe the immorality of priests and people."

THE SWEARER AND HIS DYING SON

During a protracted meeting in Kentucky, a gentleman of some note called upon his minister. He wished to connect himself to the church on the following Sabbath. He had been merciful to him, and he was now, as he hoped, a converted man. The case was this:

He once had a lovely boy, an only son. This child gave evidence of early piety. When perhaps not more than nine years of age, he was laid upon a sick and dying bed. He talked sweetly about Jesus, and much about heaven. On one occasion, when near his end, he called his father to his bedside, and, with great respect and affection, said—

"Papa, I wish to make one request of you before I die."

"What is it my darling?" said the weeping father, bending over his beloved and dying child. "O, my dear son, father is willing to do anything in the world for you. What do you wish me to do?"

"Papa," said the dying child, "dear papa, if you please, don't swear any more."

The father, as he narrated the affecting incident, wept—tears rolling down his cheeks.

"O! sir," said he to his minister, "I never had anything to come with such power to my soul before, as this language of my boy. Papa, dear papa, if you please, don't swear any more.' Sir, it was blessed to my soul."

The next day the man was seated at the table of the Lord; and may we not suppose that when he come to die, his cherub boy will hover over his dying bed, and be the first to welcome his happy spirit to glory and to God.

BAD THINGS.—An unfaithful servant, a smoky house, a stumbling horse, a scolding wife, an aching tooth, an empty purse, an undutiful child, an incessant talker, hogs that break through enclosures, a dull razor, musquitoes, a frog, and—a subscriber that won't pay for his paper.

☞Rev Dr Cumming of London, in a recent lecture, stated that he was informed by a missionary among the Jews that there was a kind of jewel writing known among them, which could be read by those skilled in its interpretation; and that upon the tiara of jewels, made by a Jew, which is worn by the Pope when in full pontificals, is written the inscription, "The mystery of iniquity."

UNCLE JOB'S ADVICE

"'Tisn't a good plan, I reckon, Sammy, to give money to them sorts of people though it shows your good heart, my son," exclaimed uncle Job, as cousin came back from the cold entry rubbing his hands and expressing his regret that he did not have more than four-pence to give a poor wretched looking man that has just gone from the door.

"But he seemed so forlorn, uncle."

"Dare say, dare say; but since my city visit, I've learned to be careful in the matters: not that I feel any more comfortable though," he continued, with a half sigh—"but Sammy, I guess I know who you've given that money to. Let me see, wasn't he a tall man, only stooping?"

"Yes," answered my cousin.

Dressed in pepper and salt—puty decent, only somewhat ragged?"

Yes."

"With a bell-crowned hat, and a walking stick?"

The very same."

"Then he'll march right down to the groggery, 'bout a mile off, and spend it all for rum. Sammy, would you b'lieve that man has run clear through a bigger fortin than I'ne got now? Yas—sartian he has. He and I was boys together, Sammy, and he was a bright younker. But I expect he didn't have no red peppers to drink of mornings, but took his cider without 'em—and in consequence he took the critter with moderation. Well, it beat all nater, how that boy prospered. Somehow, he had a farm left him here, and a few thousands there, and when I live in a leetle snug frame house, with your aunt Judy, arter was fust married, he had a most splendious dwelling, large as three of mine, and heap of fine furniture to fill it.

And all the time, mind you, Sammy, he was taking his drink, in small doses, but that's jest as bad. Well, things went on fust rate, and James B. was 'counted the riches man in L. He had a pretty woman for a wife, a pretty woman, though she didn't quite come up to your aunt, there (how sweetly aunt Judy blushed) but she wasn't nothin' but a clever creetur, clever as the days was long. His boy and girl too—about the sweetest little things ever I did see, (alway 'cepting little Minnan,) blue eyed young things, how nice they always did dress, and every thing they wanted they had But bless you, Sammy, 'fore any one thought of it, James B was a drunkard.

First thing we knew, this fine farms went to ruin, and then under mortgage. Pretty soon his handsome house was sold and all his furniter, under the hammer, and they went into a little tumble down place. Next thing his wife died and was buried; that was the end of her. His little ones grew up in ignorance, his son took to the sea, and was lost there, and his darter is at this minit one of the serving girls in our public house—poor thing, as ignorant and vain as a girl can well be. And the wretched father, old B., goes about begging money to get drunk on; but folks knows him pretty well here, and all he generally gets, is cold vittles.

Well, well, you needn't wonder, Sammy that I don't make cider—no, no; I'd rather give my best apples to the hogs, or sell 'em for nothin', and that's next to givin 'em away you know, eh! Sammy.

"No, no, boy, if you ever want to prosper, touch not, tast not, handle not the critter, and don't you look at it nuther.

MARRIAGE CUSTOMS OF THE ASSAMESE.

The marrage custom of the Assamese, a people of middle Asia, have many curious points of similarity to those of the patriarch described in the Pentatuch. Jacob served Leban as a servant or boudman many years to obtain in marriage Leah and Rachel, who were sisters; and he was not allowed to marry the younger before the elder. It is not uncommon, when a man is poor, to engage to live for several years as a laborer with the father of his intended wife. He is then called a Chapon'a, a kind of boundsman, and is entitled to food and clothing, but no wages; and at the end of his servitude, if the girl likes him, the marrige take place. The man is looked on in the family as a son-in-law, and is treated kindly If a girl's futher be wealthy, and without sons he will sometimes select, from equally respectable family, a husband for his daughter and bring him up in his own house. The youth so selected is likewise called a Chapon'a, and inherits the whole of his father-in-law's property. If a woman's husband dies, though she may be only 18 or 20 years of age, she can never marry again.

ADVICE TO YOUNG LADIES

The editress of the Literary Gazette, Mrs. L. Jane Pearson, in an article addressed to young ladies, upon the subject of marriage discourses as follows:

"Do not, as you value life and its comforts marry a man who is naturally cruel. If he will wantonly torture a poor dumb dog or cat, or even a snake fly from him as you would from the cholera. We would sooner see our daughter dying of the cholera, than married to a cruel hearted man. If his nature delights to torture, he will not spare his wife, or his helpless children. When we see a man practising cruelty on any poor, helpless creature, or beating a fractious horse unmercifully, we write over against his name—devil, and shun him accordingly.

"We once knew a man, a gentlemen, who during a ride for pleasure became so demoniacally enraged at his horse, which refused to go, that he sprang from his carriage, drew his knife, and cut out an eye of the poor brute. The lady who accompanied him fainted, suffered a long nervous illness, and never will recover from the horror the outrage gave her. And we knew the young lady who, knowing this of him, was fool hirdy enough to become his wife. And we knew how he tortured her. How he outraged all her feelings; how he delighted to destroy whatever she prized, or took pleasure in. How in his fits of passion he broke up her furniture, seized her by the shoulder and shook her till she could not crawl to bed; how he beat her; how he kept her poor babe black and blue with blows and pinches, untill the parents took her home, and sheltered her from his cruelty.

"If you have a suitor whom you feel inclined to favor, look narrowly into the temper and disposition of the man. Love may soften it for a while, or restrain, it or disguise it but, be assured the natural temper will remain, and the time will come when your presence will be no restraint upon him we have heard wives complain, 'I was so deceived in my husband, men are so deceitful,' &c But we believe in nine cases out of ten these woman deceived themselves. They suffer the romance of their own heart to adorn their lover with all the excellencies which their fancy attributed to a perfect manly character, and to draw a veil over all his vices and defects, which if it did not conceal them, greatly softened or disguised their features.

Men are not perfect—woman are not perfect; In all cases, there must exist a necessity to bear and forbear, but it does not therefore follow that you should marry a bad man. If you do so you deserve chastisement, but a life long misery is a terrible punishment. A bad man's wife must either live in continual torment of fear, apprehension, and the bittter disapointment of her fruitless efforts to please: or she must become callous, cold, insensible to pain, and consequently to pleasure. Will you take upon yourselves either of these bitter alternatives? We hope not."

"TO THIS FAVOR SHE MUST COME."

An aged woman, was passing along Lake St. yesterday afternoon. She was plainly clad; the cut was not the latest, nor the pattern the newest, nor the fabric the richest. True she did not wear a Bloomer hat, nor "pure white" shoes, and it must be confessed, she was not handsome, for rare are the human flowers in this wintry world that bloom over half a century.

Just behind her came two young women—ladies?—glittering in "changeable" silks, like new born butterflies, with Heaven's imprint yet damp upon them

They were young, and therefore lovely to look at. We are sorry, to say the aged woman, was the theme of their ill-timed jest, and their conduct was so indelicate and unbecoming, as to attract the attention of persons passing. True, the old lady did not walk gracefully. May be she had worn herself out in caring for just such creatures as they—we sincerely hope not. Perhaps, and not perhaps, she had greater grace of mind and heart than they were gifted with—knew more of the world, though less of DeLaines and Broche.

In fact, we could see those young women presiding in parlors with wonderous grace, flattered and admired, while in the street they revealed hearts, if not hearts, empty as last year's bird's nests. They play upon pianos doubtless—she upon spinning wheels—they are young—she is old, and yet we can tell them they will be fortunate if they reach their sixtieth anniversary, with as much that adorns her whom, Heaven made the angel of the Hearth, as that old woman. Had they been young men, they should been whipped, but as young ladies they are to be pitied.—Chicago Journal.

☞Von Raumer, Professor of History in the University of Berlin, in his Book on America, devotes a chapter to the State of Ohio, several pages of which relate to Cincinnati. He states that at Woodward College, I attended two lectures on spherical trigonometry, and the Œdipus of Sophocles, on a spot where wolves were howling fifty years ago. In a note, the Professor gives the following conversation, which he had with a lady of our city.

Lady.—"Has no fair American touched your heart?"

Prof.—"Age is no security against folly—I have been violently smitten."

Lady.—"May I ask who the favored one is?"

Prof.—"Her grandfather was born the 19th of April, 1781; her mother was a German. In all America there are not thirty—nay, scarcely three woman of such beauty, virtue, wisdom and wealth."

Lady.—"But you are already married; what will your wife say?"

Prof.—"She is used to such freaks, and wont say a word against it."

Lady.—"Have you made known your passion to its object?"

Prof.—"Certainly: and she has distinctly declared that she will not withold her consent, whenever I dare proclaim to the world my admiration and love:"

Lady.—"But who is this wonderful lady?"

Prof.—"She is the Republic of Ohio!"

MUSIC IN HEAVEN.

There is, perhaps, no power exerted over the senses equal to that which is felt under the influence of music. The mother appeals to it to soothe the fretfulness of infancy, when all other remedies are useless, and the unconscious child is lulled into calmness and repose. Even the wild animal has shown his susceptibility to its impression, and has stayed his thirst for blood, in order to drink in the streams of harmony. All nature seems to have caught the spirit which pervaded heaven, "When the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy." Its tones are heard in the soft whispers of the evening zephyr, in the dulcet murmurs of the crystal rivulet, and the sighing of the waving forest branches. The birds join the grateful praise, and sing to the opening day, or chant to the softer repose of the evening's hour. But in the human voice, which modulates the harmonies of sound to the expression of truthful and tender sentiments, there is manifested the nearest approximation to what we may conceive to be the music of heaven. What untold sweetness may have existed in the tones of perfect humanity, we may not conceive, but when we behold what power there is in the human voice subject to all the jarring and discord incident to humanity, to soothe the turbulent passion, and awake the soul to thoughts of sublimity and virtue, and to produce a state of the most exquisite delight, we can very justly infer what a height of inexpressible rapture there must be in the music of heaven, where all is harmony, perfect harmony.

On earth we see that power is exerted over the hearts of men by musical performance, just in proportion as perfection in harmony is manifested; until as we have recently seen, a single vocalist can move the masses as no other circumstance ever has done. Now this event has suggested our theme, and its contemplation has administered to us moments of the most exquisite delight, as we have tried to form some idea of the harmonies which fill the upper Sanctuary, where every voice will be richer, sweeter, and more skillful than Jenny Lind's ever can be, until she joins the great concert above. Oh, what a chorus that must be! Not one perfect voice, but thousands on thousands swelling in unfaltering, uninterrupted strain of praise,

> "When the bright seraphim, in burning row,
> And loud, uplifted angel-trumpets blow,
> And the cherubic host in thousand choirs,
> Touch their immortal harps of golden wires,
> With those just spirits that wear victorious palms
> Hymns devout and holy psalms,
> Sing everlasting."

The first intimation we have of the employment of the dwellers in the skies, they are "singing for joy," and they are last described as a "great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thundering, saying, "Alleluia, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth!" Now, there can be no doubt that we are here cultivating the heart for higher associations, forming tastes which are to be perfected in a higher state of being, when we can not only claim kindredship with the angels, but with Christ himself and should we not cultivate those gifts and powers in the use of which angels find their chief delight! How else can we be so fully prepared to enter into the enjoyment of their society and employment. In all ages, those who were preeminent for their piety and devotion to God, have devoted much of their time to this delightful exercise. It was recognized and incorporated into the first divinely arranged order of religious worship. In the Jewish temple service it was cherished with veneration and practiced with delight; so much so, that in the days of Solomon no less than four thousand practised singers were employed in the temple. Christ, as the Great Head of the Church, in a most impressive manner recognized the practice as an element in the scriptual worship, when he led in singing the hymn around the first sacramental table, and further, by enjoining us to sing and make melody in our hearts to the Lord. Doubtless, this was intended not only as a source of gratification here, and a means for cultivating the heart in tenderness and love, but to prepare us, in some measure, for the companionship of the holy associations of heaven, and their never ending delightful employment.

The music of Heaven! Who makes it? Mozart, Rossini? No, no, their strains, as exquisite as they are esteemed, will form no part of that perfect symphony. He who is the source of all sweetness and harmony, and the maker of the beautiful, the sublime, and the pure, will compose the anthems there sung, and teach each heart and carry it tunefully to appreciate, and tune all tongues sweetly to join in the divinely arranged harmony. In the blissful hope of finally participating in this heavenly employment, let us obey the divine injunction, and learn to "sing with the spirit and with the understanding." that when the hour for our departure shall come, we may be fitted to join the choir above, and realize the joys which those experience who are permitted to listen to the music of heaven. —Indian Advocate.

HAPPY HOMES.

Let it be our object to multiply the number of virtuous and happy homes. The domestic hearth is the seed plot of a noble and flourishing commonwealth. All laws are vicious, all tendencies are to be deprecated, which increase the difficulty of diffusing, through every rank, the refined and holy influence which are cherished by the domestic affections. Reckless speculations among capitalists, disturbing the steady and uniform course of employment, and its sure counterpart—improvidence and debauchery among workmen—are deadliest foes of the household virtues. In how small a compass lies all the elements of man's truest happiness, if society were only conducted in a rational and moderate spirit, and its members of every class could be restrained from vicious indulgence, and the pursuit of phantoms. A marriage contracted with thoughtfulness, and cemented by a pure and faithful love, when a fixed position is gained in the world, and a small fund has been accumulated—hard work and frugal habits at the commencement of domestic life, to meet in time the possible demands of a future family; a dwelling comfortably furnished, clean, bright, salubrious, and sweet; children well trained, and early sent to school; a small collection of good books on the shelves; a few blossoming plants in the window; some well-selected engravings on the walls; a piano, it may be, a violin, or flute, to accompany the family concert; home made happy in the evening by cheerful tasks and mutual improvement, exchanged at times for conversation of friend and neighbor of kindred taste and congenial manners;—these are conditions of existence within the reach of every one who will seek them—resources of the purest happiness lost to thousands, because a wrong direction is given to their tastes and energies, and they roam abroad in pursuit of interest and enjoyment, which they might create in rich abundance at home. This is no romantic, visionary picture. It is a sober, accessible possibility, such as even now, under the pressure of many adverse circumstances, is realized in the homes of not a few working men, who have learned the art of extracting competence from narrow means, and maintaining genuine respectability in an humble station.—Taylor's "Christian Aspects of Faith and Duty."

INHUMANITY REBUKED.

"There's something good in human nature after all."

Bulwer

The Blair County (Pa.) Whig says, a few years ago, while passing over the Pennsylvania State improvements, the writer was a witness of one of those scenes of genuine true heartedness which makes the heart thrill with an unutterable blessing, and fills the mind with the involuntary consciousness that there is "something of the angel still" in our common nature.

At a point this side of the mountains, where occurred the trans-shipment of passengers from the West was moored a canal boat, waiting the arrival of the train ere starting on its way "through" to the East. The Captain of the boat, a tall, rough, sun embrowned man, stood by his craft superintending the labors of his men, when the cars rolled up, and a few moments after a party of about half a dozen gentlemen came out, and deliberately walking up to the captain, addressed him something after this wise—"Sir, we wish to go on East—but our further progress to-day will depend on you. In the cars we have just left is a sick man, whose presence is disagreeable. We have been appointed a comittee by the passengers, to ask that you will deny this man a passage in your boat. If he goes, we remain—what say you?"

"Gentlemen," replied the Captain, "I have heard the passengers through their committee. Has the sick man a representative?" To this unexpected interrogatory there was no answer, when without a moment's pause, the captain crossed over to the car and entering, beheld in one corner, a poor, emaciated, worn out creature, whose life was nearly eaten up by that canker worm, consumption. The man's head was bowed in his hands, and he was weeping. The captain advanced and spoke to him kindly. "Oh sir!" said the shivering invalid, looking up, his face now lit with trembling expectation "Are you the captain—and will you take me? God help me! The passengers look upon me as a breathing pestilence and are so unkind. You see, sir, I am dying—but, oh! if I am spared to reach my mother, I shall die happy. She lives in Burlington, sir and my journey is more than half performed. I am a poor printer, and the only child of her in whose arms I wish to die?"

"You shall go!" replied the captain, "if I lose every passenger for the trip!"

By this time the whole of the passengers were grouped around the boat, with their baggage piled upon the path, and they themselves awaiting the decision of the captain before engaging their passage. A moment and that decision was made, as they beheld him coming from the cars, with the sick man cradled in his stout arms. Pushing directly through the throng with his dying burden, he ordered a matrass to be spread, on the choicest spot of the boat, where he laid the invalid with all the care of a parent. That done, the captain directed the boat to be prepared for starting.

But a new feeling seemed to possess the astonished passengers—that of shame and contrition at their inhumanity. With one common impulse they walked aboard the boat, and in few hours after, another committee was sent to the captain, entreating his presence among the passengers in the cabin.

He went, and from their midst arose an aged, whitehaired man, who, with tear-drops starting in his eyes, told that rough, sun embrowned man that they felt humbled before him, and that they asked his forgiveness. The fountain of true sympathy was broken up in the heart of nature, and its waters swelled up, choking the utterance and filling the eyes of all present. On the instant a purse was made up for the sick man with a "God-speed!" on his way home, to die in the arms of his mother.

The true hearted captain of that boat was General Samuel D. Karns, and that above incident is worth remembering.

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr Herald:

I beg your indulgence for a few remarks, as I see that "Edward" is out again. He, in his last reply, reminds one of an old saying, which is literally true; a drowning man will catch at a straw. Notice him, if you please, how he effects himself ignorant of what I said in regard to the missionaries in Liberia. He says I wish to convey the idea to the world, that the missionaries had not even commenced to hold up the light of the glorious gospel, &c &c. To show the falsity of that assertion I need only to refer your readers to the last article of mine; there they will see that I complain of their stopping by the way, &c. &c. and that they had not commenced, and in consequence the needful work is neglected. Now "Edward," with all your affected ignorance, this is the idea I wish to convey. He seems to find a great deal of fault with my Grammar, &c. &c.; well I find some fault of it too; however, I think that there is too much truth mixed with the bad Grammar, for you friend Edward;—it is that which makes you so sick at your stomach;—so says an overwhelming majority of Liberians. But he has taken some notice of the recent revivals up the river—what is the good of that? —for I am sure it will not add a star to his crown, for if you will only twig him a little, he will confess that he never was up the river since here he has been, if so, how can he tell what is going on up there, so as to publish in the way he has done? It is useless for me to trouble you any longer at present, as I have written so fully on the subject before.

Yours &c.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, JANUARY, 28th 1852.

The troops returned to Monrovia on the 22nd inst: —nothing of moment had occurred since our last issue, excepting the death of Paul P Oliver who died of the wounds received at Trade Town. The wounded were fast recovering. We were prepared to find the men worn down with fatigue and exposure; but it is gratifying to record, that they seemed to enjoy excellent health. Notwithstanding their appearance—they indeed had great need to betake themselves to terra firma. The delay of a day at Grand Bassa and a short of two days at sea, had considerably refreshed them, and their appearance upon the whole was good. It is not to be a matter of regret that circumstances should have made it necessary to set on foot such an expedition. The outlay of money for such an operation, can be scarcely spared, to say nothing of the danger of life, and exposure of the men, necessarily consequent upon all such undertakings. Such a course, at times cannot be avoided. We know of no instance within our recollection where a severe chastisement was more loudly call for than the one which has just passed by. Our citizens had been inhumanly murdered while pursuing their usual avocations—nothing had transpired to give the government the least idea of the hostile intentions of the natives. No proper occasion had been overlooked, without impressing on the minds of the natives, the advantages they were likely to derive from the adoption of our customs, and a strict obedience to their stipulations with the government. An end had been put to the frequent strifes between the different chieftains; through the influence of the government; brought about mainly, by the incorporation of themselves and tribes with this government. For the abolition of these petty wars, which were of very frequent occurrence; and for the most trivial disputes, they heartily thanke the government and people of Liberia. They can now, live peaceably in their towns without fearing the nightly ambuscade of a neighboring chieftain. When the rebellion broke out in Grand Bassa, the different tribes were at peace with each other. No aggravated quarrel existed among them; and hence Grando the Fishermen, found a great difficulty in persuading some of them to engage with him in waring with our settlements. Grando, every one must know is a native of Pickeeny ees—he was only a sojourner in that country, but his long residence there, had made him many friends. The result of his, and his allies rebellion our readers are acquainted with.

Though we discourage wars; we feel confident that the last campaign will have a most happy effect. Frequently have the natives in that country been chastised by us, but in most instances the chiefs were waring with each other—there then could be no consolidation of interest among them. But in the last instance, the contrary was the case. And no doubt, they thought, with their united strength, they could exterminate the settlements in Grand Bassa. They have, however been sadly disappointed. In every engagement they had with our troops, they were severely handled—their forces compelled to seek safety in flight—their towns burned—many of them made prisoners—many killed—their effects destroyed;—and they wandering about the country, without knowing if there is any hope of their being pardoned. We feel confident that another outbreak will not for a long time, if ever, take place in that country. The punishment which the chiefs brought upon themselves, will never be forgotten; and the fact of the settlements continually receiving immigrants, and thereby becoming yearly more and more strong, will effectually have a tendency to keep them in fear and make them contented with being under wholesome laws.

Religious.—The Conference of the M. E. Church adjourned on Tuesday the 26th inst. We will publish the proceedings of the conference, if any of the officials, will furnish us with a condensed copy of its minutes.

Paying Off.—We learn that the volunteers of the military expedition, will be paid off, on Tuesday the 3rd, February.

Little Bassa.

Some years have passed by, since the territory of Little Bassa was purchased by this government. In all cases where lands have been purchased from the native chiefs, no restrictions have been laid upon them, excepting two, which in all cases, have been strongly urged and insisted upon—and these are, an entire abolition of the slave trade;—a prohibition against wars; and that in all disputes where the chiefs themselves cannot amicably settle—they were to be refered to the government of Liberia. Such is the agreement between this government and Bah-Gay and Zovle, Chiefs of the Little Bassa Country. These Chieftians have been at variance for a length of time, and at one time the aspect of things seemed to threaten an outbreak between them. The President sent, and had the subject of their quarrel examined into—the result was that the difference was settled—at least it was supposed to be. Very soon after however it was ascertained that a very marked dissatisfaction, existed between these two princes—what caused the dissatisfaction it was difficult to determine. Matters were being going on between them in this way for a long while. When the President left here with the troops for Grand Bassa, these gentlemen supposing that the government had enough to do in fighting Grando and the Grand Bassa Chiefs and that it had no time to spare to look after them—commenced to fight each other. Soon, they were astonished at receiving a peremptory message to cease hostilities, and hold themselves in readiness to proceed to Monrovia to render an account, for the violation of their agreement—the message further said, that if they did not end their war at once, a portion of the army then, at Grand Bassa, would be sent to compell them to it. Not another gun was fired after the delivery of the message.

Bah-Gay and Zovle were before the President on Friday and made their defence—one charged the other with begining the war, and to speak the truth, it is not well understood who was the aggressor—but from many circumstances put together, it seems that the blame should be laid to Zovle, and such was the opinion of the President and his Council. They were fined in a pretty large sum, and dismissed with a warning to live in peace hereafter. Zovle had to pay the largest fine.

We have since learned that Bah-Gay received an appointment from the President constituting him the Chief in the Little Bassa Country: and in future, he will be held responsible for any disorders which may take place in that country.

Our Apology—Our readers will please remember that we have been without force in our office, and in consequence, our paper is behind its time. The war being now over, we hope, in a few days, to have our hands at work, when we will loose no time in making up our numbers. We hope our friends will be as indulgent with us now as they have hitherto been. We will try to please them, if they are in the least reasonable, Official Reception—The Chevalier Niteroi, Charge de Affairs of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Brazil to this Republic, was presented on the 27th. inst, by Hon: H. Teage Secretary of State, to His Excellency the President. The Chevalier delivered his credentials, and was duly accredited to this Government as the Representative of His Imperial Majesty. The particulars of the ceremony in our next.

Impertinence.—Our Grand Bassa Correspondent informs us, and, there can be no doubt as to the correctness of the information, that T. C. Odgers, master of the British bark "Venus" of London, is still meddling in the domestic affairs of this government. This man, forgetful of the duties for which his masters sent him to the coast, invited Boyer of Trade Town on board his vessel, to criticise, we presume, the measures of government—at any rate, he has had the impudence of addressing a letter—in style and language very objectionable—to the government, stating Boyer's willingness to submit, in future, to his stipulations with the Government. The Government knew full well of the submission of Boyer, and hoped to be spared any further interference in matters of the government from officious and intriguing foreignors—and that in future they would confine themselves to their legitimate pursuits, the purchase of palm oil. But the insolence of these boasting traders is becoming unbearable. We have frequently intimated in our paper, our knowledge of some of them, especially in instigating the natives to acts of insubordination; and, indeed, the massacre of our citizens, at Bassa Cove, can be clearly traced to one of them at least. At the very time that Odgers had Boyer on board his vessel, offering himself as negotiator for him, he knew that Boyer had Grando, the leader of the massacre under his protection. It seems to be the determination of certain of these low bred traders to exasperate the feelings of our citizens, and drive them to extremities hoping by these means to involve this government in controversy with, and then, by false representations draw upon it the ill-will of the British Government. If such be their determination, and what else can be conjectured!—It is high time that the government take immediate and effective measures to put an end to the machinations of these men.—Self-preservation is an innate principle—it is strongly imprinted in the heart of every human being: and when the government fails to protect itself, its honor, the lives and property of its citizens, it also fails to accomplish the objects for which it is established, and is therefore at an end; & the hope of Africa & of our race must perish with it. The people of Liberia, driven from the land of their birth by oppression on account of the color of their skin; sought an asylum in this, the land of their forefathers—where they hoped to be free from the trials and troubles which they were subject to in other lands. But even in this far off land, after suffering every privation—many of the most appallin character—they are followed by the lowest dregs of civilized society—these men are ungovernable and unprincipled, and have the most perfect abhorrence to law and order—frequently complaining to their government, and what they report we are sorry to say, seems, to gain credit, and is calculated to injure the people of Liberia in the estimation of that nation. If it was as well known in England, as it is in Africa, how little dependence is to be placed on what these men may say—we would not be so frequently called upon to notice their meanness on the coast. If ever a people have striven to gain & retain the good will of foreign nations, the people of Liberia, have,—their utmost exertions have been especially used to please and encourage every thing in the shape of a human being, that boasts of being an Englishman, and, with some honorable exceptions, they return the civilities of the government and people of Liberia, by abuse and villification; and in one instance at least, by instigating the natives to insubordination and war.

The immigrants by the "Morgan Dix," landed at Grand Bassa, are, we are informed, going on finely through the acclimating process. Dr. Smith is unremiting in his attentions to them, and it is said that they have lost none of that elasticity of spirits which characterised them on their landing. They are certainly an interesting company, and we hope that the citizens will continue to extend to them such kind treatment as may assist to raise them rapidly from their sick couches.

Already preparations are to be seen for the reception of a saw-mill, a more important improvement, at this time, could hardly be undertaken. The demand for every discription of lumber, increases with a rapidity that is truly astonishing. From every part of Liberia, the cry is, "buildings remain unfinished for want of lumber." A doubt cannot be entertained, but that the proprietors of the mill, will, if they enter into the lumber business with energy, realize, in a few years, a handsome competence.

The spot selected for the mill, is near the grave of the late Governor Buchanan, for whose memory, the people of Liberia, retain the highest respect. At first, we were not pleased at the prospect of the quietness of that place being interrupted by the bustle and confusion, which it was likely the operation of a saw-mill would create;—but on reflection, we have thought differently. The working of a saw-mill in Liberia, will be a new thing—it will indeed be an important and deeply interesting improvement; and will be, the most conspicuous item in the schedule which may be drawn up, of the improvements in Liberia, in the year 1852. Those who were in Liberia when Governor Buchanan had the administration of affairs, may remember how anxious he was to get a saw-mill in operation on the St. Paul's—how he importuned the General Agent of the A. C. S. to send one out. If now, he was with us, or any-where in the land of the living, and heard of the prospect of a saw mill being in operation, in the settlement which he exerted himself so laboriously to establish; it would rejoice his noble spirit, and he would hail it, as the commencement of a new era in the history of Grand Bassa. Let none imagine that the sacredness of the spot which contains the remains of our departed friend will ever be polluted. A part from other influences, there appears to be some thing so sublimely grand and serene in the noble trees which overshadow his resting-place, that all who approaches it, involuntarily, stop to look and admire. It is a truly fitting resting-place for the noble philanthropist, statesman and christian magistrate.

We said, that the immigrants still retain the noble feelings which possessed them on their first landing—they speak confidently of their prospects; and will, as soon as their medical adviser will permit it, commence establishing themselves at Fish-town alias "Buchanan." They are highly delighted with that beautiful place; and well they may be, for in our opinion, it is one of the most beautiful locations we have seen; and we are strong in the belief that it will, in a few years, present greater attractions for commercial operations than any other port in Liberia.

We take from the "London Weekly Dispatch" of the 7th. of December, the following American news.

Mr. Webster has determined to withdraw from the Department of State on the 1st. of January. Two reasons are given for this course. First,—the fact he is about to be nominated for the Presidency, by a State Convention of his friends in Massachusetts. Second—that his health is feeble, and he, therefore, requires prolonged relaxation.

THE Spanish difficulty is said to be over. The Spanish vessel of war that may bring over the Consul for New Orleans, will be saluted in form. Any loss sustained by the Consul will be remunerated; but losses by Spanish residents must be settled by the city or county, as in cases of similar American claims at common law. The prisoners in Spain are to be liberated, also Mr. Thrasher, the American editor confined at Havana.

President Fillmore is to give a grand diplomatic dinner to Louis Kossuth, to which the Chevalier Hulseman, the Austrian Minister, will be invited.

ALL Mexico is in a very disordered condition—particularly near the Gulf Coast.

CENTRAL America continues to be in a revolutionary state.

THE city of New York had been the scene of a heart-rending calamity. In the ninth ward school house, a false alarm of fire had been raised. The school, which is a very large one, numbers 1,800 children, and they made a rush to the doors. Unfortunately the banisters of the stairs gave away, and the scholars were precipitated downwards upwards of 50 of them being instantly killed, and 76 injured.

The Great Exhibition.

An English Paper says, that another fortnight have been granted by the Royal Commissioners to the foreign exhibitors, to clear out the remainder of their goods; and the building will be thrown open gratuitously to the public on the 1st. January 1852.

☞Sam Slick says, writing from England, "After all, they haint got no Injin corn here; they cant raise it, nor punkinpies, nor quinces, nor pea-nuts, nor silk-worms, nor nothin. Then as to their farmin'—Lord! only look at five great elephant-lookin beast in the plough with the great lummokin' fellow to hold the handle, and another to carry the whip, and a boy to lead, whose boots have more iron on em than the horses hoofs have, all crawlin' as if they was a goin to a funeral. What sort of a way is that to do work? It makes me mad to look at em. If there is any airthly clumsy fashion of doin'a thing, that's the way they are always sure to git here. They are a benighted, obstinate, bullheaded people, the English, that's a fact, and always was."

"IT IS ALL MY OWN."—A man of wealth living a stranger to religion and its ordinances, was walking and holding this soliloquy—"What a happy man I am! I have fortune, an affectionate wife, and everything to make me comfortable; and what is more, I am indebted to no one for it; I have made it myself. I am independent of every one; it is all my own. Many persons are under obligations here and there, but I am not.—It is all my own." At that instant a sudden shower drove him to the nearest church. He went in, and just at that moment, the minister rose and read his text—"Ye are not your own; ye are bought with a price." "What," said he to himself, "this is a strange doctrine. But it does not apply to me; I am my own, and all I have is my own." The course of the sermon exposed his obligations to God, and issued in totally revolutionizing his views and feelings.

NOTICE

The undersigned wishes to take this method to give notice of his intention to leave this County, and requests that all persons having claims against him would present them for settlement before the first of April ensueing, and all persons indebted to him will come forward and make payment before the above named period.

BEVERLY R. WILSON,

January 29th, 1852.

FIFTEEN YOUNG MEN.—At a respectable boarding house in New York, a number of years ago were fifteen young men. Six of them uniformly appeared at breakfast table on Sabbath morning shaved, dressed and prepared, as to their apparel, for attendance on public worship. They also actually attended, both forenoon and afternoon. All became highly respected and useful citizens. The other nine were ordinarily absent from the breakfast table on Sabbath morning. At noon they appeared at the dinner table, shaved and dressed in a decent manner. In the afternoon they went out, but not ordinarily to church; nor were they usually seen in any place of worship. One of them is now living, and in a reputable employment; the other eight became openly vicious. All failed in business, and are now dead. Several of them came to an untimely and awfully tragic end.

Many a man may say, as did a worthy and opulent citizen, "The keeping of the Sabbath saved me." It will, if duly observed, save all. In the language of its author, "They shall ride upon the high places of the earth."

PROBABLE DESTRUCTION OF MODERN ROME.—Many authors have asserted as their interpretation of some parts of the Apocalyse, that Rome will be destroyed by fire from heaven, or swallowed up by earthquakes or overwhelmed with destruction by volcanoes, as the visible punishment of the Almighty for its Popery and its crimes. I am unwilling, having had so many books on the interpretation of the prophecy, to deduce any argument of this kind from the prophecies. Which are unfulfilled, but I behold every where—in Rome, near Rome, and through the whole region from Rome to Naples—the most astounding proofs, not merely of the possibility, but the probability, that the whole region of central Italy will one day be destroyed by such a catastrophe. The soil of Rome is tufa, with a volcanic subterranean action still going on. At Naples the boiling sulphur is to be seen bubbling near the surface of the earth.—When I drew a stick along the ground, the sulphurous smoke followed the indentation; and it would never surprise me to hear of the utter destruction of the southern peninsula of Italy. The entire country and district is volcanic. It is saturated with beds of sulphur & the seeds of destruction. It seems as certainly prepared for the flames as the wood and coal on the hearth are prepared for the taper which shall kindle the fire to consume them. I again read the remarks of Dr. Cumming; Rome, he believes, is to be overthrown by judgments not to be converted by the agency of the Gospel, nor to be exhausted by political assaults. It is literally to be consumed by fire. Whether he is correct in regarding such an event as the fulfilment of the prophecies and the demonstration of the anger of the Creator against the incorrigible assumption of an erring and influential Church, I know not; but the divine hand alone seems to me to hold the element of fire in check by a miracle as great as that which protected the cities of the plain, till the righteous Lot had made his escape to the mountain.—Townsend's Tour in Italy in 1850.

POETRY.

A WEEK'S WORK.

SUNDAY—church doors enter in,
Rest from toil, repent of sin;
Strive a heavenly rest to win.

MONDAY—to your calling go;
Serve the Lord; love friend and foe;
To the tempter, answer, no.

TUESDAY—do what good you can;
Live in peace with God and man;
Remember, life is but a span.

WEDNESDAY—give away and earn;
Teach some truth, some good thing learn,
Joyfully good for ill return.

THURSDAY—build your house upon
Christ, the mighty Corner stone;
Whom God helps, his work is done.

FRIDAY—for the truth be strong;
Own your fault, if in the wrong;
Put a bridle on your tongue

SATURDAY—thank God and sing;
Tribute to his treasury bring;
Be prepared for Terror's king.

Thus—your hopes on Jesus cast—
Thus let all your weeks be past:
And you shall be saved at last—The Sun.

THE MISSIONARY

BY BELL.

He leaves again his pleasant home,
His summer's cool retreat,
To wander on the hills and dales,
Or through the city's sweet.

No crowds, entranced, hang on his tongue,
Or on his steps attend;
A faithful few alone an ear,
A willing ear can lend.

His footfall parts the grass that grows
Around the house of God;
Where they who once had loved to be
In Zion's porch trod.

He stands alone where once had knelt
The aged and the young;
And many a prayer to God, that mocks
The efforts of his tongue.

And God will hear—no more, no more
A desolate and wild
Shall be those scattered, frightened sheep—
Each is our Father's child

And will return; and though alone—
To mortal eyes—in prayer,
'Tis not alone his voice is heard
In glad rejoicing there.—Christian Chronicle.

AN ANTEDILUVIAN ROMANCE.

Mortals saw, without surprise,
In the mid air, angelic eyes.

LOVES OF THE ANGELS.

In those far away times, when the Mammoth shook the ground with mighty tread, and ere the solitary dove flattered over the wastes of waters, vainly seeking rest and finding none, there dwelt upon the earth a fair woman, with two beautiful young daughters, whose names were Adah and Naamah. Their home nestled in the bosom of a fertile valley, where bright fountains leaped and sparkled in the undimmed sunshine—where floods of delicious roses wafted faint orders on the balmy air,—where cedars frowned in towering grandeur, and the dark funeral cypress scarce revealed the azure skies between. White tents glanced on the distanced plains; flocks, and herds pastured there; and the moon arose in calm radiance from behind the green swelling hills—those hills from whence celestial melodies were softly heard to float—from whence favored mortals often heard strange wild echoes, as of voices whispering to each other—beheld shining meteors dart—traced them dissolving away in the silvery light bounding the clear horizon or with mute awe watched their downward shooting to the transparent lake hidden amid mountain solitudes; deep, mysterious waters, on whose pure bosom repose innumerable lotus-lilies, dim and dream like flowers, over which angels loved to hover and disport in the holy moonlight. Gems of night; blessed and beautiful lotus-lilies!

In those days, noble young damsels brought water from the pellucid fountains, and rested pleasantly in the refreshing shade beneath spreading boughs, and thither came Adah and Naamah to fill their vases. Wreaths of fresh green leaves encircled their brows; light snowy drapery, looped up, revealed the rounded alabaster limbs and delicate feet, protected by richly embroidered sandals.

They were twin sisters, alike, yet dissimilar. Adah, seen alone, would have been pronounced one of earth's love-liest daughters; but Naamah, a wandering angel, with paradise airs yet breathing round her the tender halo of a subdued melancholy, as if she lamented absence from her starry home.

"What meaneth that ancient woman?" whispered Adah to her sister, as they rested their water vases on the emerald turf. "What meaneth she? I over heard her to day, in converse with our mother, beneath the cedar dome, bewailing the doomed one, and methought thy name sweet Naamah, was murmured. Our mother smiled; and I flung myself into her dear arms, and asked the meaning of those words I had thus unwittingly given ear to. The woman of a hundred summers raised her head as if in prayer; our mother knelt beside her, and I cared not to press my questioning."

"Would I were like thee, my sister Adah!" responded Naamah, with a sigh—"would I were like thee, with earthly affections garnered within my throbbing heart? Thou alone knowest—yet but in part—how I have ever, felt estranged from worldly sympathies. Hearken, Adah! and I will now confess that I divine the fate, and know the tale, thou in thy innocent simplicity dreamed not of. The woman of a hundred summers bewailed the doomed one, ye say! High and glorious doom!—oh, that it may be mine! Snatches of whispered communings, murmurings, wild melodies, and prophetic teachings, have revealed the mystery to me—wondrous and enthralling! Thou seest our mother, how beautiful she still is—how holy, pure, and noble; thou hast often marked the peculiar tenderness which floateth as a transparent veil around her. Her mother was far more beautiful; and they say, Adah—(thou knowest I have not vanity)—that I bear perfect resemblance to our ancestress."

"Dearest Naamah," exclaimed Adah, embracing her sister, "what human words may paint thy loveliness? Only let us cease not to remember whose hand fashioneth the clay. But continue thy speech, for I am impatient to hear thy revealment."

Naamah sighed, as if overwhelmed with the immensity of the theme; and in a low voice obeyed her companion.

"A shining meteor—otherwise, a paradise angel—wandering over the silent earth and starry night, folded his glittering wings, and rested beside our beloved waters in the mountain solitudes. On the banks of the moonlit lake also roved our ancestress—pure and beautiful as the lotus-lilies. The angel encountered this fair daughter men loved, wooed, and would have won, but that she was previously betrothed. Her marriage was hastened by her terrified sire, to avert the curse ever said to rest on angel love for mortal woman! But, alas! Adah, an angel's kiss had been imprinted on that woman's lips—an angel's sparkling fires had flung around her and within her soul their unspeakable, pervading essence. Invisibly, the disappointed love born celestial one hovered about her path through life, received her parting spirit, and bore it to heaven's gate—not ever watched our mother and watches over us Adah—our guardian spirit! Changeless are the sons of paradise—ever blooming ever young; years with us, but days with them—nay, moments of eternity! On me, Adah—On me, this angel's regards will once again be fixed. I am doomed to be his bride! Night after night, when thou art sleeping, I wander away to the mountain solitudes, beside the lonely lake.

"I feel the fanning wings of invisible spirits. I hear their dulcet songs of bliss, and I know that angel eyes are gazing; and I weary—oh! I weary for my spirit love to come and claim me as his own! For never, (mark me, Adah, my sister,) never shall mortal man call me bride!

Time glided on. Adah was married to one of the young nobles of the Lebanon; but in her distant happy home, her affectionate heart yearned towards her twin—sister, still Naamah wandered in search of her angel love; earthly suitors were dismissed; she turned coldly and disdainfully from them all.

It was on a night of singular beauty even in that favored clime, that Naamah, pale and languid, rested on the banks of the haunted lake, like a lanting moonbeam, white and pure; her rich voice poured forth strains of melody, such as cannot be imagined now, on this changed earth!

Suddenly there stood by her side a youth, apparently travel worn and fatigued with a long journeying; his voice was deep and thrilling; his demeanor was high, courteous, and noble; while the halo of grand and pre-eminent intellectual beauty shone in his dark eyes, and illuminated his thoughtful countenance.

"Long loved—long sought for—found at last!" he exclaimed, casting himself on his knees before the agitated Naamah, and pouring forth those ardent words she had so long pined to hear.

Could she doubt that her angel lover had thus sought her side at length, not in brightness and glory, indeed, but in plain earthly guise—in pity to her weak mortal senses?

Could she not discover the ineffable perfection—immortal essence? Could they be hidden from her? Ah! no; Naamah had not a doubt; and to her mothers dwelling she led the graceful youth, where the stranger and way-farer were sure to find a ready welcome.

The woman of a hundred summers exchanged mysterious glances with the tender mother, who silently watched the enamored pair.

When on the same spot where he had at first found her, at the same hour, the wanderer demanded of Naamah, in the trembling voice of true love, if she would leave her mother's side and her own people to follow him, what replied she?—"Long loved—long sought for found at last—I am thine"

To a distant brilliant home the beautiful Naamah was conducted by her husband. And where the precious gems of earth were sparkling—where all the untold glories of the ancient world shone around her, seated on a glorious throne; costly incense burning—peerless flowers strewed beneath her feet, and paradise opening before her in the dark eyes of whose light she lived in. Naamah learnt that to mortal love she had devoted her existence—plighted her faith That the wandering spirit of the haunted lake, who had sought her by the lotus-lilies, was the brother of Adah's husband—Adah who had dwelt on her sister's loveliness, until, as the youthful prince listened to her description, he yearned to behold it for himself, and set forth on his adventurous expedition almost tempted to believe that he had discovered an angel beside the solitary mountain-lake when personating one.

An earthly throne Naamah gained—a mortal heart found devotion; but there was whisperers on the Lebanon to hint that she revered her early dreams, and cherished with somewhat of saddened memory, the illusions of the past.

ARE THE STARS INHABITED

For one moment, let me glance at the nature of one question; of all the most interesting; that which concerns the probable existence of life through the spaces whose contents we have reached. The problem is, perhaps, equivalent to this: Are we, without passing into extravagance, entitled to assume that forces, which enter so essentially into the constitution of our earth, are not confined within its conditions? Take, in illustration, the vast power of gravity. Before science raised the veil from the distant, we knew it only in the fact of the fall of a stone, or in the roundness of a drop of water; now we have followed it through the complex motion of the moon, and through the order of the entire system. It pursues the comets through the abysses; it governs the orbits of the double and triple stars; it guides the sun in his path through the skies. Save, and even those stupendous evolutions of firmament, during which the stars congregate into dazzling clusters, or arrange themselves in galaxies. Boundless the sphere of his force; & shall an energy yet nobler, more subtile, probably with a much more profound, be fancied so weak so feeble so dependent on circumstances, that only in our world, or some one like it, it is free to work out its wonderful product? Look at its history in that very earth. In the chalk cliffs, caverns unseen by the sun, in marshes that to man are desolation and death, life yet teems and rejoices; its forms growing in adaptation to their conditions Long years ago, the old Trilobite swarmed in our oceans, and the large eyed Ichthyosaur dashed through their waters. These are gone; but plastic nature, ever forming with ceaseless activity, has, by the most mysterious of her actions wrought up new forms to their parts among her vast scene Through space, as through time, she is doubtless working; and, with all their joys and sorrows, evolving far nightier results than dead, inorganic worlds. I see in the blush of the morning, which beams on all these globes, and there too awakens the glad creatures from their repose. I see it in the downfall of evening, that speaks of refreshment from toil; but also of the living time of activities not fitted for the sun. I see it in their progress of the earth and in its course, through much conflict, towards perfection; for its rocks and stones tell not only of change, but of struggles of its creatures to become linked to something higher. Yes! ye worlds, wonderous and innumerable, that shine aloft and shower around us your many mystic influences, ye, too, are the abodes of sentience suited to your conditions; aye, and of intelligence, different, far different from ours, and in state of approach to the divinity of all possible gradulation; but of which every constituent, every creature of whatever kind, is pressing outward, like the bud in spring and stretching with longings that are unutterable towards the infinite and the eternal—Professor Nichol.

A FACT WORTH NOTING

Many years ago, when Louisville was a petty village, consisting of a few houses and two stores, it was a great resort for gamblers and persons of dissipated habits. At this period a Colonel C., a wealthy, but a very wicked man, carried on a very extensive mercantile business. On a certain occasion he sent a confidential clerk to the East to lay in a supply of goods, furnishing him with the requisite amount of cash. An unexpected fall in prices left the clerk $300 in hand after all his purchases were made. He did not wish to take it back with him, and was somewhat at a loss to know how to invest it. He was a religious young man, and it occurred to him that Bibles were more wanted than anything else in Louisville, and he finally resolved to invest it in Bibles, and accordingly sent home three hundred dollars' worth. Colonel C. thought the transaction rather unpromising, as it was an article never called for at his store. Cards he could sell in abundance, but not Bibles. At length, after sleeping, an idea struck him. Gamblers would have cards at any price and on any terms. Accordingly he made his arrangements, he put up a Bible to every pack of cards, charging $1.50 for the former, and 50 cents for the latter, telling each applicant that no one could get cards without a Bible. In due time the Bibles were all disposed of; but as the gamblers wanted only the cards, they usually presented the Bible to the first boy or girl they met in the street. In this way hundreds of Bibles were distributed in Louisville, and many houses were supplied with the word of God that never contained one before.

This is the first and only instance, perhaps, in which gamblers were made the instruments of circulating the Bible. Great good, we were informed, resulted from this singular proceeding. Louisville is greatly changed since that, not only in size and wealth, but in moral and religious character.—Exchange Paper.

PRAYERLESS MINISTERS.

In spite of all that we have enumerated; in spite of personal ability, official order, pulpit accomplishments, grave and decorous public devotion, force of utterance, animated feeling, scriptural topics moral worth, in spite of these and of other excellencies, there is one evil in the habits of these men, which, hidden as it is from the human eye, is real and deadly, and eats, "as doth a canker," into all they utter and all they do. They "do not prosper," and their flocks are "scattered," for they have become "brutish," and "have not sought" the Lord." Thus, then, is the direful test passed upon every one of us; they are not men of frequent and earnest private devotion. They have great gifts, but they do not pray. They are in the pulpit, according to outward order, but they do not pray. They are good, and perhaps, even great preachers, but they do not pray. They are fervent, pungent, persuasive, convincing, but they do not pray. They may be zealous and even successful leaders in the movements of public activity, the first and foremost in popular excitement, eloquent in their appeals, and bright in their lives, working zealously by various modes and in various places, but they do not pray. They are men of energetic purpose, conscience, and piety, but they do not pray. All this one thing—"I exercise myself unto prayer," their not seeking upon God," their not "seeking it of" nor "stirring up themselves to take hold of" Him, this, like the want of love in the Christian character, "stains the glory" of every thing else; it renders worthless their genius, talents, and acquisitions; obstructs their own spiritual prosperity; impedes their usefulness and blasts their success. Though a minister were an apostle, and did not pray, his "speech and his preaching" would not be "with the demonstration of the Spirit and of power." "Though he had the gift of prophecy, and understood all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though he had faith that could remove mountains," and did not pray, "he would be nothing" "Though he gave all his goods to feed the poor, and his body to be burnt," and did not pray, "it would profit him nothing" "Though he spake with the tongues of men and of angels," and did not pray, he would be but "as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal" He might be "like unto one that hath a pleasant voice and a lovely song, and that plays well upon an instrument," but the music of the lip and the hand only, will never charm away the evil spirit from Saul; nor can it have in it that Divine and life-giving harmony which "of stones can raise up children unto Abraham."—The Closet and the Church, by Rev. T. Binney

A cunning lawyer meeting a waggish friend mounted on a white horse, determined to quiz him.

'Good morning, daddy—what makes your horse look so pale this morning?"

'Ah, my dear friend replied, the old man of thee had looked through a hither as long thee would look pale, too.'

Opinion, and the desire of having fame, spurs on the ingenious mind, and makes the greatest difficulties delightful.

There is a time when thou mayest say nothing and a time when thou mayest say something; but there never will be a time when thou shouldst say all things.

If some persons were to bestow one-half of their fortune in learning how to spend the other half, it would be money extremely well laid out.—Eliza Cook.

LIFE IN THE DESERT:

OR

HOW A PANTHER FELL IN LOVE WITH A FRENCH SOLDIER

During the enterprising expedition into upper Egypt, by General Bessaix, a provincial soldier fell into the power of a tribe of Arabs, called Maugrabins, and was thence carried into the desert, beyond the cataract of the Nile. In order to place a safe distance between themselves and the French army, the Maugrabins made a forced march, and did not stop till night closed in. They encamped around a fountain surrounded by palm trees. Not supposing their prisoner would attempt to escape, they contented themselves with merely binding his hands; and after having fed their horses, and made their supper upon dates, they all of them slept soundly. As soon as the French prisoner was convinced of this fact, he began to gnaw the cords that bound him, and soon he regained the liberty of his hands. He seized a carbine, and took the precaution to provide himself with some dry dates and a little bag of grain, armed with a scimetar, started off, in the direction of the French army.

In his eagerness to arrive at a place of safety, he urged the already weary horse until the generous animal fell down dead, and left his rider alone in the midst of the desert. For a long time the Frenchman walked on with the perseverance of a runaway slave, but was at last obliged to stop. The day was finished; notwithstanding the beauty and freshness of oriental nights, he did not feel strength enough to pursue his journey. Having reached a little cluster of palms, which had gladdened his heart at a distance, he laid his head upon a stone and slept, without taking any precaution for his defence.

He was awakened by the pitiless rays of the sun, which fell upon him with intolerable fervor; for in his weariness he had reposed on the side opposite to the morning shadows of the majestic plains. The prospect around him filled him with despair. In every direction nothing met his eye but a wide ocean of sand, sparkling and dancing like a dagger in the sunshine. The pure brilliancy of the sky left the imagination nothing to desire. Not a cloud obscured its splendor, not a zephyr moved the surface of the desert. The earth and the heavens seemed on fire. There was a mild and awful majesty in the universal stillness! God, in all his infinity, seemed present to the soul!

The desolate wanderer thought of the fountains and roses of his own native provinces, and wept aloud. He clasped the palms, as if it had been a living friend. He shouted to relieve the forgetfulness of utter solitude. The wide wilderness sent back a sharp sound from the distance, but no echo was awakened. The echo was in his head.

With melancholy steps he walked around the eminence on which the palm trees grew. To his great joy, he discovered on the opposite side a sort of natural grotto, formed by piles of granite. Hope was awakened in his breast. The palm wood furnished him with dates for food, and human beings might come that way before they were exhausted. Perhaps another party of Maugrabins, whose wandering life began to have some charms for his imagination—or he might hear the noise of approaching cannon—for Napoleon Bonaparte was then passing over Egypt. The Frenchman experienced a sudden transition from the deepest despair to the wildest joy. He occupied himself during the day with cutting down some palm trees to defend the mouth of the grotto against wild beasts, which would come in the night time to drink at the rivulet flowing at the foot of the palms. Notwithstanding the eagerness produced by fear of being devoured in his sleep, he could not finish his fortification, during the day. Towards evening the mighty tree he was cutting fell to the ground with a crash that resounded through the desert, as if solitude had uttered a deep groan.

But like an heir, who soon ceases to mourn over a rich parent, he immediately began to strip off the broad beautiful leaves to form his couch for the night. Fatigued by his exertion and the extreme warmth of the climate, he soon fell into a profound slumber. In the middle of the night his sleep was suddenly disturbed by an extraordinary noise. He raised himself and and listened—and amid the deep silence he heard the loud breathing of some powerful animal. The sound fell upon his heart like ice. The hair started upon his head, and he strained his eyes to the uttermost to perceive the object of his terror. He caught the glimpse of two faint yellow lights at a distance from him; he thought it might be an optical delusion, produced by his own earnest gaze; but, as the rays of the moon entered the chinks of the cave, he distinctly saw an enormous animal lying about two feet from him. There was not sufficient light to distinguish what species of animal it was; it might be a lion, a tiger, a crocodile; but the strong odor that filled the cave left no doubt of the presence of some large and terrible creature.

When the moon rose so as to shine directly upon the opening in the grotto, its beams lighted the beautiful spotted hide of a huge panther! The lion of Egypt slept with her head upon her paws, with the comfortable dignity of a great house dog. Her eyes, which opened from time to time, were now closed. Her face was turned towards the Frenchman. A thousand confused thoughts passed through the soldier's bosom. His first idea was to shoot his enemy through the head; but he saw there was not room enough for that; the ball would inevitably have passed her. He dared not make the slightest movement, lest he should awaken her; nothing broke the deep silence, but the breath of the panther and the beating of his heart. Twice he put his hand upon his scimeter, but the difficulty of penetrating her hard rough skin made him relinquish the project. To attempt her destruction, and fail in the attempt, would be instant death. At all events, he resolved to wait for daylight. Day came at last, and showed the jaws of the sleeping panther covered with blood.

"She has eaten lately," said the Frenchman, to himself. "She will not awaken in hunger."

She was in truth a beautiful monster. The fur on her throat and legs was of a dazzling whiteness; a circle of a little dark spots, like velvet, formed pretty bracelets round her paws—her large muscular tail was beautiful white, terminated by black rings; and the soft smooth fur on her body was of a glowing yellow, like unwrought gold, richly shaded with dark brown spots in the form of roses.

This powerful but tranquil hostess reposed in as graceful an attitude as a puss sleeping on a footstool. Her head stretched on nervous outstretched paws, from which her long white smellers spread out like silver threads. Had she been in a cage, the Frenchman would certainly have admired the perfect symmetry of her dark form, and the rich contrast of colors that gave such an imperial brilliancy to her robe; but, alone, and in her power, it was a different thing. At the mouth of the cannon he had felt his courage rising with increasing danger, but it was sinking now. The cold sweat poured from his forehead as he saw the sleeping panther. Considering himself a dead man, he waited his fate as courageously as he could. When the sun rose, the panther suddenly opened her eyes, stretched out her paws, and gasped, showing a frightful row of teeth, and a great tongue as hard and as rough as a file. She then shook herself, and began to wash her bloody paws, passing them from time to time over her ears, like a kitten. "Very well done," thought the soldier, who felt his gaiety and courage returning—"she does her toilet handsomely." He seized a little dagger which he had taken from one of the Arabs—"Come let us wish each other good morning," thought he. At this moment the panther turned her head towards him suddenly, and fixed a surprised and earnest gaze upon him.

The fixedness of her bright metalic eyes, and their almost insupportable brilliancy, made the soldier tremble, especially when the mighty beast moved towards him. With great boldness and presence of mind he looked her directly in the eye, having often heard that great power may be obtained over animals in that manner. When she came up to him, he gently scratched her head and smoothed her fur. Her eyes gradually softened, she began to wag her tail, and at last she purred like a petted cat; but so deep and strong were her notes of joy, that they resounded through the cave like the rolling of a church organ.

The Frenchman redoubled his caresses, and when he thought her veracity was sufficiently turned, he attempted to leave the grotto. The panther made no opposition to his going out; but she came bounding after him lifting up her back and rubbing against him like an affectionate kitten. "She requires a great deal of attention," said the Frenchman, smiling. He tried to feel her ears and throat; and perceiving that she was pleased with it, he began to tickle the back of her head with the point of his dagger, hoping to find a favorable opportunity to stab her; but the hardness of the bones made him tremble lest he should not succeed.

The beautiful Sultana of the desert seemed to tempt the courage of her prisoner by raising her head, stretching out her neck, and rubbing against him. The soldier suddenly thought that, to kill her with one blow, he must strike her in the throat. He raised his blade for that purpose—but at that moment she crouched down at his feet, and looking up in his face with a mixture of affection and native fierceness. The poor Frenchman leaned against the tree, eating some dates, and casting his eye anxiously around the desert, to see if no one was coming to free him from his terrible companion, whose strange friendship is so little to be trusted. He offered to feed her with some nuts, and dates, but she looked upon them with supreme contempt. However, as if sensible of his kind intentions, she licked his shoes and purred.

"Will she be so when she get hungary?" thought the Frenchman.

The idea made him tremble. He looked at the size of the panther. She was three feet high and four long, without including her tail, which was nearly three feet more in length, and as round as a great cudgel.

Her head was as big as a lion's, and her face was distinguished by a peculiar expression of cunning. The cold cruelty of the panther reigned there; but there was likewise something strangely like the countenance of an artful woman, in the gaiety and fondness of the present moment.

During the whole day, if he attempted to walk away, the panther watched him, as a dog does his master, and never suffered him to be far out of sight. He discovered the remains of his horse, which had been dragged near the mouth of the cavern, and he easily understood why she had respected his slumbers.

Taking courage from the past, he began to hope he could get along very comfortably with his new companion. He laid himself beside her, in order to conciliate her good opinion. He patted her neck, and she began to wag her tail & purr. He took hold of her paws, felt her ears, rolled her over the grass. She suffered him to do all this; and when he played with her paws, she carefully drew in her claws, lest she should hurt him. The Frenchman again put his hand upon his weapon, with a view of plunging it into her throat, but he was still held by the fear that the animal would kill him in her anger. Besides, he really began to have an unwillingness to kill her. In the lonely desert, she seemed to him like a friend. His admiration of her beauty, gentleness, graceful activity, became mixed with less and less of terror. He actually named her Mignonne, in remembrance of a lady whom he had loved in his youth, and who was abominably jealous of him. By the end of the day, he had become so familiar with his dangerous situation, that he was almost in love with its exciting perils. He had even taught the panther her name. She looked up in his face when he called "Mignonne."

When the sun went down, she uttered a deep and melancholy cry.

"She is well educated" exclaimed the soldier. "She has learnt to say her prayers."

He rejoiced to see the panther stretch herself out in a drowsy attitude.

"That is right, my pretty blonde," said he. "You had better go to sleep first."

He trusted to his own activity to escape during her slumber. He waited patiently; and when she seemed sound asleep, he walked vigorously toward the Nile. But he had not gone a quarter of a league over the sand, when he heard the panther bounding after him, uttering at intervals a long, sharp cry.

"Of a truth," said he, "her friendship is very flattering; it must be her first love." Before she came up, the Frenchman fell into one of those dangerous traps of loose sand, from which it is impossible to extricate one's self. The panther seized him by the collar, and with incredible strength brought him to the other side of the ditch at a single bound.

"My dear Mignonne!" exclaimed the soldier, caressing her with enthusiasm, our friendship is for life or death."

He retraced his steps. Now, that he had a creature that loved him, to whom he could talk, it seemed as the desert were peopled. Having made a signal flag of his shirt, he concluded to wait patiantly for human succor. It was his intention to have watched during the night, but sleep overpowered him. When he awoke, Mignonne was gone. He ascended the eminence to look for her, and soon perceived her at a distance, clearing the desert with long, high bounds.

When receiving his caresses, she purred aloud, and fixed her eyes upon him with even more fondness than usual. The soldier patted her on the neck, and talked to her as he would to a domestic animal: "Ah, ah, Miss! you have been eating some of the Maugrabin. Ain't you ashamed? Never mind; there are worse animals than you are. But please don't take a fancy to grind up a Frenchman. If you do, you won't have me to love you any more."

This singular animal was so fond of caresses and play, that if her companion sat many minutes without noticing her, she would put her paw in his lap to attract attention. Several days passed thus.

The panther was always successful in her excursion for food, and always returned full of affection and joy. She became used to all the inflections of the soldier's voice, and understood the expressions of his face. Sometimes he amused his weary hours by counting the spots on her golden fur, and observing how beautifully they were shaded; she showed no displeasure even when he held her by the tail to count the splendid white rings, that glittered in the sun shone like precious stones. It was a pleasure to look upon the graceful out lines of her form, and the majestic carriage of her head. She delighted him most when in a frolic. Her extreme gracefulness and agility, as she glided along jumped, bounded, and rolled over and over, was truly surprising. When she was darting up the rocky eminence at her swiftest speed, she would stop suddenly and beautifully, as the Frenchman called "Mignonne."

One day a very large bird sailed through the air over their heads. In the desert, anything that has life is intensely interesting. The Frenchman quitted the panther to watch the flight of the bird, as he slowly and heavily fanned the air. In a few minutes Sultana began to growl. "She is certainly jealous," thought the soldier, as he looked at her fierce and glittering eyes. They gazed intelligently at each other, and the proud coquette leaped as she felt his hand upon her head; her eyes flashed like lightning and she shut them hard.

"The creature must have a soul," exclaimed the Frenchman.

This account was given me by the soldier himself, while I was admiring the docility of the powerful animal in the menagerie at Paris.

"I did not know," continued the narrator, "what I had done to displease Mignonne so much, or whether the creature was in mere sport, but she turned and snapped her teeth at me, and seized hold of my leg. She did it without violence, but thinking she was about to devour me, I plunged my dagger into her neck. The poor creature rolled over, uttering a cry that froze my heart. She made no attempt to avenge my blow, but looked mildly upon me in her dying agony. I would have given all the world to have recalled her to life. It was as if I had ordered a friend. Some French soldiers who discovered my signal, found me some hours after, weeping by the side of her dead body."

"Ah, well" said he, after a mournful silence, "I have been in the wars of Germany, Spain, Russia, and France, but I never saw anything that produced such sensations as the desert. Ah, how beautiful it was!"

"What feeling did it excite?" asked I.

"Feelings that are not to be spoken," said the soldier, solemnly. "I do not always regret the groves of palm trees and my panther; but at times their remembrance makes me sad. In the desert there is everything, and there is

"What do you mean by that?"

"Well," he said, impatiently. After a pause he added, "God is there without man!"

HOME.

"Home joys, are passing lovely;
No stranger heart can tell."

Home rests on the endearing name of home—consecrated by domestic love—that gushing fount of human happiness. Without this, home would be like a temple stripped of its garlands; where a mother welcomes with fond affection; a brother's kind sympathies comfort in the hour of distress, and assist in every trial; there a pious father first taught the infant lips to lisp the name of Jesus; and there a loved sister drew the companion of early years.

Truly, if there is aught that is lovely here below, it is home—sweet home! It is like the oases of the desert. The passing of our days may be painful; our path may be checkered by sorrow and care; unkindness and frowns may wither the joyousness of the heart, efface the happy smiles from the brow, and bedew life's way with tears, yet when the memory hovers over the past, there is no place in which it delights to linger as the loved scene of childhood's home! It is the polar star of existence. What cheers the mariner, far away from his native land in a foreign port, or tossed upon the boundless billows, as he paces the deck at midnight alone—what thoughts fill his breast? He is thinking of the loved ones far away at his own happy cottage; in his mind's eye he sees the smiling group seated around a cheerful fireside. In imagination he hears them uniting their voices in singing the sweet songs which he loves. He is anticipating the hour when he shall return to his native land, to greet those absent ones so dear to his heart.

Why rests that deep shade of sadness upon the stranger's brow, as he seats himself amid the family circle? He is surrounded by all the luxuries that wealth can afford; happy faces gather round him, and strive in vain to win a smile! Ah! he is thinking of his own sweet home; home, of the loved ones assembled within his own cheerful cot.

Why those tears which steal down the cheeks of that young and lovely girl, as she mingles in social circle? Ah! she is an orphan; she, too, had a happy home; its loved ones are now sleeping in the cold and silent tomb. The gentle mother who watched over her infancy, and hushed her to sleep with a lullaby, which a mother only can sing, who in girlhood days taught her of the Saviour, and tuned her youthful voice to sing praises to his name, has gone to the mansions of joy above, and is mingling her songs, and tuning her golden harp, with bright angels in heaven. Poor one! She is now left to tread the golden path of life, a lonely, homeless wanderer.

Thus it is in this changing world. The objects most dear are snatched away. We are deprived of the friends whom we most love, and our cherished home is rendered desolate. "Passing away," is engraved on all things earthly. But there is a home that knows no change, where separation never takes place, where the sorrowing ones of this world may obtain relief for all their griefs, and where the sighs and tears of earth are exchanged for songs of unending joy. This home is found in heaven.

In the shadowy past, there is one sweet reminiscense which the storms of life can never wither; it is the recollections of home. In the visioned future, there is one bright star whose lustre never fades; it is the hope of home—of a heavenly home.—Musical Visitor

THE FLIGHT OF TIME.

The flight of time is mystic and wonderful. It has often been compared to the daily round of the sun—that is, so far as it may be contrasted with the life of man. The rising of the orb of day, with beauty, in silence, and with power, may be compared to the morning of life—the period when the heart pictures what the fancy draws—the period when our hopes are strong, and all our paths are pleasantness and peace." The meridian splendor of the noon day sun may be linked unto the meridan of man's life. All his faculties are in full bloom; all his powers of mind and body fully developed. There is one more comparison still. The evening of man's life can be most aptly compared to the setting sun. Like a warrior taking his rest—like a traveller who has borne the heat and burden of the day, his life goes out quietly and noiseless, even as the setting of the powerful king of day."—Southern Baptist

RAISING OF DROWNED PERSONS

Why fire cannon or guns to raise a drowned body to the surface?

This question is often repeated. There is a rational answer to be given to it. This practice is not merely ridiculous like that of throwing a cat or bread, or some heavy, into the water to cause a dead body to float, and thus become visible. What then is the answer?

The living human body is a very little lighter than water. If a person stands perpendicular in the water with his arms by his side, he will sink so as to leave the upper part of his head and his nose out of water. Though mere flesh is heavier than water, the cavities of the body, as lungs, stomach, &c., being filled with air, the body as a whole is then lighter, and thus floats. In drowning, these cavities are filled with water, and most of the air expelled from them. Hence the body is now heavier than water and sinks to the bottom. Perhaps also there is a slight contraction of the fleshy parts by which the effect is aided. Certain it is, the drowned body goes to the bottom, because it is heavier than water.

When the water is cold, no chemical change takes place in the drowned body, or so little, that it will lie at the bottom through a winter, and not float till spring. This fact often occurs when drowning happens late in the autumn or in winter.

With sufficient warmth, chemical changes take place in the body, and gasses are developed; the body swells, and becomes light enough to float. The strength of the muscles and integuments prevent the rapid enlargement of the body. Any force which shall operate on the body makes the parts give way and the enlargement more rapid.

An easy force to be applied, is the firing of cannon or heavy guns; near the water and the body, or directly upon the surface of the water, so that the impulse on and through the water to the body may cause the gases to expand it, so that it shall be lighter than water, and thus rise. There is adequate reason for the practice so common.

It is obvious that the explosion of cannon produce the desired effect, immediately upon the drowning, nor until the circumstances have taken place, already mentioned, and have prepared the body to be more rapidly enlarged by the influence of the explosion. Hence it is that the firing of cannon the third or fourth day, produces the desired result, when it failed on the first and second, or until several days have elapsed.—Rock American

A FEW WORDS ABOUT JURIES.—A large number of reflecting citizens are far from being satisfied about the practical working of our present jury system and its tendencies. A friend of ours, a merchant and a gentleman of superior intelligence and sound judgment, who recently was upon the jury for the term of the Circuit Court, declared the other day in our hearing that he would far rather dispense with a jury in any litigation in which he might be involved, and have his case decided by the Court, than leave it to the verdict of a jury, as juries are generally constituted. He referred to commercial cases. Another gentleman had recently the misfortune to be upon the jury during the term of a criminal Court, and although he did not speak so severely of criminal juries, he said enough to satisfy us that the institution is not properly valued among us. We could give some illustrations of the evil, which we think would bring the reader to the same mind as our friends respectively, whose sentiments we have echoed. From this we shall refrain, however, our object being to work a reformation of practice under the institution, and not to abolish the institution itself. One instance we deem it right to mention; we believe it to be but one of many, and it shows the kind of error which juries are prone to go out.

Rent was sued for by a legal gentleman. The justice of the claim was so apparent to eleven of the jurors that their decision was promptly made. The twelfth demurred, and when pressed for his reason, he gave it with all frankness—the plaintiff was a lawyer, all lawyers were grasping, unjust men; and he would not be a party to putting money into a lawyer's pocket. This, in effect, was his argument for refusing to concur in the verdict his fellow jurors desired to render without further loss of time. In vain he was reasoned with. He admitted, that the evidence seemed all clear enough for the plaintiff, &c., but could not be made to comprehend that it was his duty to give his verdict according to the evidence before him. In other words, he thought that it was part of his duty to insist upon the introduction of his own views of the plaintiff's profession as part of the merits of the case. The jury were discharged without agreeing. Subsequently this juryman conversed with the plaintiff, ascertained of motives and reasons for suing for his claim, and the prejudice thus removed, the non-concurring member of the jury acknowledged that he had erred. There was not the shadow of reason to believe that on his part there was any intention or dereliction of duty as imposed by the oath he had taken. His fault was obstinacy combined with an inability to discriminate between his views as a man and his duty as a juror. Numerous instances will occur to the memory of the reader in which, beyond all reasonable dispute, the verdict of the jury in criminal cases has been influenced by sympathy for the criminal more than was consistent with the sacred obligation to give a verdict according to the testimony.

What has contributed to this imperfect and injurious operation of the jury system? The answer might well be.—Many things. We do not now enumerate them all, nor is it necessary. Our own belief is that the growing practice of making frivolous and unreasonable objections to the qualifications of jurors has had much to do with the admitted deterioration in the quality of juries. It seems to us impossible that the spectators in Court, among whom are those already empannelled and others liable hereafter to serve, can listen to the foolish objections, and the transparent sophistries by which the forming of a jury is so often impeded, without having their respect for the institution diminished, and their belief in its solemn responsibilities and obligations frittered away. In this respect our judiciary are not free from blame. Some of them have practically taught that reading the newspaper reports of a case, and forming a private opinion from such data, are disqualifications for the sworn duties of a juror.

This absurd dogma we conceive, has been "a heavy blow and sad discouragement" to the popular estimation of the solemnity, sanctity and obligatory character of the juror's oath. It has operated in this way. The juror is asked whether he has read such reports and whether he has formed any opinion. To both questions he replies in the affirmative, adding probably, especially if questioned, that he is still prepared to hear the sworn testimony of the witnesses on both sides, and to alter his opinion if the evidence warrants it. And if this sentiment is not expressed, its possession ought to be conceded to the juror. The fact, however, is otherwise. The court has ruled that such a man is disqualified; by which it in effect proclaims that, in its judgment, the imposition of a sacred oath upon a fellow citizen will not even have sufficient influence upon his mind to induce candor, and dispose him to admit a conviction resulting from a stubborn array of facts elicited on oath. The language in effect is, "Stand down, sir; you had no business to read." [which of itself is a most absurd and incongruous decision,] "and having read and formed an opinion you are disqualified; we do not consider a sacred oath a sufficient, powerful obligation to make a man change his opinion, even though he sees cause."

This is the practical teaching of such a decision, and of many of the decisions in which jurors are disqualified. They are so many declarations of want of confidence in the obligations of an oath. Their injurious effect upon the public mind cannot be doubted. They tend to depreciate the value and as sacredness of an oath in popular esteem. They teach that both court and counsel, and of course those who instruct counsel, are reluctant to trust to the oath that the juror solemnly take. The sentiment, from being so often repeated, is rooted in the minds of those who form juries, and they almost insensibly receive the same unworthy views of the sanctity of the solemn obligations they before God assume.

Here indeed is the radical evil, and it is a growing one. Its remedy is in the hands of the judiciary. They must first display greater confidence in the virtue of a solemn oath, and compel counsel so to do. Next, they must admit no opportunity of correcting the now vitiated public sentiment with respect to the duties of jurors, and the high responsibility that rests upon them. They, in scarcely a lower degree than our legislators and judges, are conservators of laws. Certain great principles must be kept prominently before the minds of juries, who must be accustomed to observe them;—as that their verdict must in all cases be given upon the evidence alone; that in criminal trials no sympathy with the circumstances or wrongs of the person on trial must be allowed to impair the force of direct testimony: that mitigating circumstances are to be considered, not in connection with the question of guilt or innocence, but with the measure of punishment; and that the law is to be held supreme as, through a jury, a competent vindicator of all wrongs.

With reference to a certain class of cases, of which there is naturally a strong tendency on the part of honorable minded jurors to allow their sympathies to mislead them, the following sentiments, recently uttered by a distinguished judge, are eminently deserving of consideration.

It is my duty for me to state to you, most solemnly, that these facts, attending them to be fully proved in all their atrocity, might not, cannot, in the absence of insanity, consistently with your duty which you owe both to the state, in resisting the legal guilt of innocence of the delinquent. The moment society is organized, the power of the slaves to redress personal grievances should cease. Private wars have been, and from the very imperfection of human laws always must be, even in the best governments and wisest laws, a mode of wrongs for which the law fails to give adequate redress, and which never can be redressed but violence. A daughter is swerved from the paths of virtue; and infamy and reproach are brought upon a family; a husband and a father, are lured into the haunts of vice and intemperance, rendered bankrupt in property and reputation, his wife abandoned and children an outcast; wrongs like these are around us, almost unnoticed, from their very familiarity. The law affords no adequate redress, and yet has it ever been heard that the injured wife or ruined husband, or ruined children, may redress their wrongs by violence or force? Let this plea, gentlemen, be once admitted, and we cease to be a government of law, and become a government of force. In every government, either law or force must govern. If force prevails, the law ceases. Let this be once admitted as the principle on which justice is to be administered, and you loose at once the restraints of society: you proclaim the government of force, and the scenes which have occurred in the streets of San Francisco may be again seen in the squares of this city.

WHAT IS MESMERISM?

Blackwood, for July, has an elaborate article on "What is Mesmerism?" The conclusion is thus expressed:

"The true explanation of mesmerism is to be found, as we have said, in the weakness or infatuation of human nature itself. No other causes are at all necessary to account for the mesmeric prostration. There is far more craziness, both physical and moral, in man than he usually give himself credit for. The reservoir of human folly may be in a great measure recent, but it is always full; and all that silliness whether of mind or body, at any time wants, is to get its cue. In soft and weak natures, where the nervous system is subject to certain seizures, in which the will is utterly powerless, and the whole mental and

"In those persons of a better organized structure who yield themselves up to the mesmeric degradation, the physical cause are less operative; but the moral causes are still more influential. In all cases the prostration is self-induced. But in the subject of whom we have spoken, it is mainly induced by physical depravity, although moral frailties concur to bring about the condition. In persons of superior type, the condition is mainly due to moral causes, although physical imbecility has some share in facilitating the result. These people have much vanity, much curiosity, and much credulity, together with a weak imagination, that is, an imagination which is easily excited by circumstances which would produce no effect upon people of stronger imaginative powers. Their vanity shows itself in the desire to astonish others, and get themselves talked about. They think it very creditable to be susceptible subjects. It is a point in their favor! Their credulity and curiosity take the form of a powerful wish to be astonished themselves. Why should they be excluded from a land of wonders which others are permitted to enter? The first step is now taken. They are ready for the sacrifice, which various motives concur to render agreeable. They resign themselves passively, mind and body, into the hands of the manipulator; and by his passes and grimaces they are cowed pleasurably, bullied delightfully. Into so much of the condition which their inclinations are bent upon attaining, as justifies them, they think, in laying claim to the whole condition—without bringing them under the imputation of being downright impostors—Downright impostors they unquestionably are not. We believe that their condition is frequently, though to a very limited extent, real. We must also consider that in a matter of this kind, which is so deeply imbued with the ridiculous, a mesmeric patient may, and doubtless often does, justify to his conscience a considerable deviation from the truth, on the ground of waggery or hoaxing. Why should an audience, which has the patience to put up with such spectacles, not be fooled to the top of its bent?

"How, then, is the miserable nonsense to be disposed of? It can only be put a stop to by the force of public opinion, guided, of course, by reason and truth."—Southern Baptist.

THE TRUE GENTLEMAN

The distinguished Governor Morris, of Morrisania, near the city of New York, who was a gentleman by birth, education, and the best of breeding, on being asked for his definition of a gentleman, replied, in the words of the Psalmist:

Tis he who every thought and deed
By rule of virtue moves,
Whose generous tongue disdains to speak
The thing his heart disproves.

Who never did a slander forge,
His neighbor's fame to wound;
Nor lent a ready ear to false report,
By malice whispered round

Whose voice, in all its pomp and power,
Can treat with just neglect;
And piety, though clothed in rags,
Religiously respect.

Who to his plighted word is and trust
As ever firmly true;
And though he promise to his loss
He makes his promise good.

Whose soul in usury disdains
His treasure to employ,
Whom no rewards can ever bribe
The guiltless to destroy.

THE INDIAN'S REPROOF.

A Shoshone warrior possessed a beautiful mare; no horse in the prairie could outspeed her, and in the buffalo or bear hunt she would enjoy the sport as much as her master, and run alongside the huge beast with great courage and spirit. Many propositions were made to the warrior to sell or exchange the animal, but he would not hear of it. The dumb brute was his friend, his sole companion; they had both shared the dangers of battle and the privations of prairie travelling, why should he part with her? The fame of that mare extended so far that in a trip he made to San Francisco several Mexicans offered him large sums of money, nothing however, could shake him in his resolution. In those countries, though horses will often be purchased at the low price of one dollar, it often happens that a steed well known as a good hunter or rapid pacer will bring sums equal to those paid in England for a fine race horse.

One of the Mexicans, a wild young man, resolved to obtain the mare, whether or not. One evening when the Indian was returning from some neighboring plantation the Mexican lay down in some bushes at a short distance from the road, and moaned as if in the greatest pain. The good and kind-hearted Indian, having reached the spot, heard his cries of distress, dismounted from his mare, and offered any assistance. It was nearly dark, and although he knew the sufferer to be a pale face, yet he could not distinguish his features. The Mexican begged for a drop of water, and the Indian dashed into a neighboring thicket to procure it for him. As soon as the Indian was sufficiently distant, the Mexican vaulted upon the mare, and apostrophized the Indian:

"You fool of a red skin, not cunning enough for a Mexican; you refused me gold, now I have the mare for nothing, and I will make the trappers laugh when I tell them how easily I have outwitted a Shoshone."

The Indian looked at the Mexican a few moments in silence, for his heart was big, and the shameful treachery wounded him to the very core. At last he spoke:

"Pale-face," said he, "for the sake of others, I may not kill thee. Keep the mare, since thou are dishonest enough to steal the only property of a poor man; keep her, but never say a word how thou comest by her, lest a brother Shoshone, having learned distrust, should not hearken to the voice of grief and woe." Away ran with her! he will never see her again, or in his eyes hope that desire of vengeance may make a bad man of me."

The Mexican was wild, inconsiderate and not over-scrupulous, but not without feeling; he dismounted from the horse and putting the bridle into the hand of the Shoshone—"Brother," said he, "I have done wrong; pardon me! From an Indian I learn virtue; and for the future when I waste or commit any deed of injustice, I will think of thee."

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr Herald:

I do not delight in acrimonious discussion, but I am constrained again to solicit a space in your paper, for a few remarks in reply to the last article of Wm. Providence.

I perceive that in order to palliate his incorrect language, which appeared in his former article, and to screen it from the contempt of a ridiculing public, he attempts to cover it by what he calls "too much truth mixed with it." Perhaps it was mixed," so mixed" as that no truth was perceptible in the whole article.

But he refers your readers to his precious article. Well, let us refer to it and notice what he calls "truth"—hear him. "Alas! they have stopped by the way, and are grasping after that which is contrary to the spirituality of their religion; money." By "they" in the first part of this sentence, he means the missionaries. Now this assertion obviously conveys the idea that the missionaries in Liberia are not now engaged in the work of "holding up the glorious light of salvation." "They have stopped" says Wm. Providence.

Mr. Herald, is this "truth?" If this is true, then why the gathering together of the multitude in their respective places of worship every Sabbath? Why the ringing of the church bells so frequently? If the assertion be true, then I pity the state of things in Liberia.

But the latter part of the sentence, "they are grasping after that which is contrary to the spirituality of religion; money." The falsity and absurdity of this position, is at once so apparent, that I forbear saying any thing on it. I will say, however, that Wm. Providence reminds me very forcibly of the Fox in the fable, who made several vigorous attempts to pluck a bunch of grapes that hung from the lofty vine but without success: at last, finding himself tired and worn out, and all his attempts to reach the object of his desire vain; Reynard exclaimed, "the grapes are sour."

You will perceive Mr. Herald, that he feigns himself aware of the grammatical inaccuracies in his previous article, but he does not appear to carry his knowledge into practice; for a similar blunder occurs in his last. Alas! for Her Majesty's English.

Wm P's. last article is very short. He however offers an excuse for being so short. What is it? It is that he had written so fully on the subject before. "On what subject? Does he mean that he has "fully" pointed the duty of missionaries in Liberia? What burning zeal! How red hot! We presume that his heart would counteract the influence of refrigeration at the poles. Already he has produced ignition without coming in contact with combustible matter. He has "written fully on the subject." He has "fully" endeavored to expose the feelings of good men; how charitable! He has "fully" counted the the spots on the sun, but to what purpose? Only to return dazzled, for none of its brilliancy has been diminished, neither has its light been rendered less appreciable.

Yours, &c.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, FEBRUARY, 4th: 1852.

Agriculture, is a subject we like to speak about—we can never be wearied with it: and now, when it is apparent to all, that it is rapidly attracting attention, and claiming a portion of the capitol hitherto employed in traffic, our reference to it, will be more frequent, and we hope, calculated to encourage monied men to give it more consideration than they have hithe to done. The cultivation of coffee should demand the attention of every one. If the growing of this article was a doubtful undertaking, there might be some excuse for its scarcity among us: but the contrary is decidedly the case. Its cultivation has been fairly tried, and the result far exceeded the expectation of the most sanguine.

It is with much pleasure that we notice the unwearied attention given to the cultivation of the coffee plant be several gentlemen on the St. Paul's—they spare neither labor or expense in their undertaking—and they are certain of a rich return for all the expense they may be at in making their farms. We hope soon to hear that others are following these enterprizing citizens.

Grand Bassa has gone far ahead of every other part of Liberia in the cultivation of coffee, and indeed; in other productions for exportation—considerable quantities of coffee, arrow-root, ginger, and pepper, were shipped from that place last years and we understand the probability is that larger quantities will be exported this year.

We would also advise a more extended cultivation of the sugar-cane—it is pleasing to record, that this article has claimed considerable attention among the agriculturists on the St Paul's. We know that they have manufactured in some quantity, sugar and syrup of a good quality:—and that they are now preparing to manufacture their large farms of cane. Our friends in Grand Bassa are behind hand in the sugar business—they must keep their eyes open, or this county will take the lead in coffee in a few years.

We have received late advices from the leeward settlements. Sinoe continues to improve. Greenville, its capitol, presents quite a busy appearance. Several new buildings have been finished within the last few months, some of them of very respectable size; and several others are being built. Agriculture is claiming a good share of attention. The health of the people was good.

Grand Bassa has recovered from the late war, and the people are employed in their usual avocations. The immigrants have not suffered greatly from the fever. Very soon they hope to go to work.

We learn that Grando is in confinement at Trade Town. It is known, that previous to his town being destroyed by our army, he sent the most valuable of his effects to Boyer for safe keeping. After the army returned home he visted Boyer, in the hope of finding a safe assylum, and taking possession of his property. Boyer had already appropriated the property as his own—and concluded to imprison Grando, as soon as an opportunity offered. He will hold Grando in close confinement, and if it will gain for him the least favor he will not hesitate a moment, to deliver his friend and ally over to the government for condign punishment. Such is the character of Boyer of Trade Town. He would sacrifice his greatest friend and benefactor, if in doing so, he would be benefited. We have on other occasions, spoken freely of the character of this Chieftian, and it is not our purpose now to say any thing more about it; and we conclude this article by stating, that there is scarcely a chieftain in Grand Bassa and New Cesters, but rejoices in the severe chastisement which Boyer has received.

Taking it Easy.—In the late military expedition, there was a number of King Boatswain's warriors, under a petty chieftian named Varveller, while in the Grand Bassa country, on returning from one of their pinnderin excursions, one of their number was missing. Varveller was questioned—he said the man was "in the bush." An hour or two elapsed, and the man not appearing, Varfuller was again questioned, his reply tho, not very well understood, but from the indifference manifested, it was supposed that the missing man would soon return to camp. When the time arrived for every man to answer to his name as called from the roll, it was ascertained that the missing man was not in camp. Varveller was again questioned, and sternly commanded to account for the man—he said the man "was lost in the bush, gun shot catch him." "Why did you not bring him to the camp?" He die, he come for war, what's matter—man come for war, he die, no palaver." This is what we call, taking it easy.

Delaware Colonization Society. A letter was placed in our hands a few days ago, by J. C. Minor Esq. the Post Master, addressed to Wm. Janye, "Monrovia." No such person living in Liberia Mr. Minor had authority to open the letter, when he ascertained the writer's name to be P. F Chatham; and the subject, the formation of the Delaware Colonization Society. Mr. Chatham will be thankful to receive information from Liberia on all subjects interesting to the friends of Liberia &c. On the night of 22d Sept., 851, this society was organized, its object is "to co-operate with other similar societies, in advancing the cause of African Colonization to furnish the means by which that part of the colored people of these states, (U States) who will voluntarily immigrate to the Republic, may be assisted in going and in becoming permanently settled there. We believe that, this cause is to restore to that bereaved mother, Africa, her expatriated children, by whom alone, her extensive territories, rich in the luxuries of the earth, shall be reclaimed, her inhabitants civilized and christianized and her "deserts be made to bloom and blossom as the rose." The meeting was well attended by the citizens of Wilmington as well as by the colored people. Addresses were delivered by Rev. Mr. Danforth agent of the Am. Col. Soc., and by Rev. Dr. Hodgson, a Methodist clergyman. A constitution was adopted, under it, officers were chosen, among whom are Hon. Willard Hall, Pres., Rt. Rev. Alfred and Henry Hicks Esqs, V. P's, James Canby Treas., D. M. Bates Sec., and board of eleven directors. The fee for membership is any sum not less than 1,00 It is estimated that many hundreds if not thousands of dollars can and will be raised in this city for the promotion of the cause. It was also resolved that, "six copies of the Liberia Herald" be taken to be distributed through the colored population of the city.

Our Liberia readers will no doubt, be pleased to learn that the cause of African Colonization continues to gain advocates—and from all we have heard, African Colonization, will ere long, become the most popular subject among the people of the United States. We will do what we can in the way of information; and by the first opportunity the "Liberia Herald" will be sent, as directed. Mr. Chatham's address is Dr. B. F. Chatham, No. 118 King Street—Wilmington city State of Delaware.

It is much easier to create than to calm unjust apprehension or dangerous enthusiasm. The meanest and most detestable tool of fear may produce excitement, and stimulate mobs, which the united efforts of wisdom and prudence may fail to extinguish and suppress.

Courtship.—A lover should be treated with the same gentleness as a new glove. The young lady should pull him on with the utmost tenderness at first, only making the smallest advance at a time, till she gradually gains upon him, and twists him ultimately round her little finger; whereas the young lady who is hasty and in too great a hurry, will never get a lover to take her hand, but be left with nothing but her fingers ends.

Ambition is like a wild horse, which prances uneasily until it has thrown off its rider.

The silent eye is often a more powerful conqueror than the noisy tongue.

The best part of beauty is that which a picture cannot express.

The most ignorant have sufficient knowledge to detect the faults of others; the most clearsighted are blind to their own.

POETRY.

Blessed are they that Mourn.

BY W. C. BRYANT

Oh! deem not they are blest alone
Whose lives a peaceful tenor keep;
The power who pities man has shown
A blessing for the eyes that weep.

The light of smiles shall fill again
The lid that overflows with tears;
And weary hours of woe and pain
Are promises of happy years.

There is a day of sunny rest
For every dark and troubled night;
And grief may hide, an evening guest,
But joy shall come with early light.

And thou, who o'er thy friend's low bier
Beddest the bitter drops like rain,
Hope that a happier, brighter shore
Will give him to thy arms again.

Nor let the good man's trust depart,
Though life its common gift deny
Though pierced and broken be his heart,
And spurned of men he goes to die.

For God has marked each sorrowing day,
And numbered every secret tear,
And heaven's long age of bliss shall pay
For all its children suffer here.

From the Christian Chronicle.

The Star, Pearl, and Flower.

BY RICHARD S. JAMES.

There is a star whose welcome light
Illumes our barque, when tempest driven,
And through life's dark and dreary night
It intimates a dawning heaven.

There is a pearl of priceless worth,
To worldly seekers never given,
The Christian seeks it while on earth,
To deck his diadem in heaven.

There is a flower that sweetly blooms
When cherished hopes of earth are riven,
And gladdens with its rich perfumes,
The dying saint's approach to heaven.

O, may the Star of Bethlehem shine
Upon my barque, by tempests driven;
The priceless pearl of truth be mine;
And mine the blooming hopes of heaven.

THE SCHOOL AND THE SCHOLAR.—The school is like the earth in spring-time: it requires merely to be sown. But on that sowing depends, perhaps, the harvest of centuries. The one single word that falls upon the mind of the child may determine its course for life-time, may determine so seeming far higher, whose consequences are felt through ages; for the progress of thought is endless—it reckons its posterity to the thousandth generation, to the end of days. Therefore the child is a holy thing, for it bears God's unbroken seal on its reward—if not to-day, hereafter—if not for you, for a coming race. Ye are laborers in God's kingdom. But God's kingdom has no fairer symbol upon earth than a child with its innocence— than a youth with his open countenance. Of such are the kingdom of Heaven

FRIENDSHIP.—Cold, indeed would the world be, and solitary, indeed, our position, if it were not for the sweet delights of friendship. Man must love; he must link himself to some being, for his own happiness depends upon it; otherwise he grows sordid and selfish and tastes not the real joys of life. It is true that we have misapplied the word friendship, for; upon a slight acquaintance with a stranger, we designate him "our friend," thus misapplying the idea and deceiving ourselves, as we have not as yet proved him as a friend. We create woe by our own acts of indiscretion, & then assign to others the cause. True friendship is built upon the higher powers of nature; there exist, between two hands thus joined together in honest friendship an indissoluble attachment that neither time, place, nor circumstances can destroy. How noble is that friendship that seeks the elevation of its object, and how poor indeed that heart be that never expanded beneath the rays of that genial sun, that never let an act of pure disinterestedness mitigate its cold and icy soul. Friendship hath greatness in it, and great is he who hath so curbed the workings of his selfish nature as to become a friend to his fellow-man, and who hath battled gloriously against the obloquy and contempt of the world as to be worthy of the laurel wreath. But, alas! how seldom do we find true friendship in this world.

MY FRIEND

The purse-proud one, who struts along,
With insolence upon his tongue,
With hau'ur glancing in his eye,
And sneers, to mock the passer-by—
Whose moral power and worth are told
In so much land, or so much gold:
Fare as I may, unto life's end,
The purse-proud ne'er shall call me friend.

The selfish one, within whose heart
Rises a narrow rill, apart,
From that vast universal tide
Upon whose bosom, clear and wide,
Float down to the eternal sea
The interests of humanity:
Fare as I may, unto life's end,
The selfish ne'er shall call me friend.

The zealous bigot, in whose hand
Is clutched an ever-burning brand,
Whose lips anathemas deal out
To all who differ—all who doubt—
Who'd lead blindfold, or whip and goad
Mankind into his narrow road;
Fare as I may, unto life's end,
The bigot ne'er shall call me friend,

The slanderer, whose every breath
Scatters the poison-seeds of death,
Blight the fair flowers of truth and fame,
Turns virtue, innocence, to shame—
Wrings from the heart hot tears and sighs,
And fills the world with hate and lies:
Fare as I may, unto life's end,
The slanderer ne'er shall call me friend.

The thankless wretch, whose heart of stone
No grateful impulse e'er hath known—
Who will each cup of kindness drain,
Take from his Maker sun and rain,
Yet slightingly esteem, or spurn
The offices he should return:
Fare as I may, unto life's end,
The thankless ne'er shall call me friend.

The sycophant, who'll lavish praise
In fortune's bright and golden days—
Who'll bend obsequiously to wealth,
Do good in public—ill by stealth—
Whose words, should time his gifts recal,
Soon turn to bitterness and gall:
Fare as I may, unto life's end,
The flatterer ne'er shall call me friend,

The man who whether rich or poor,
Armed with all virtue, is secure
Against the slings and shafts of fate,
Is nobly good, and humbly great—
Who strives and does the best he can
To serve his God and fellow man:
Fare as I may, unto life's end,
Such one shall ever call me friend.

THE INFLUENCE OF WOMEN.—The cultivation of the sentiments, and of the social virtues, is solely dependant upon woman. We do not speak of her as the companion and soother of man, so much as of her position as the mother of man. In the former capacity, she is weak and gentle, clinging to man for protection, and seeking shelter in his heart and beneath his arm. Ignorant, brutal man has taken advantage of this weakness, and has made her a slave to the perpetuation, to his own ignorant brutality. But, viewed as the mother of man, how her position alters! She is then the source of all human power and dignity. If she is weak, one who will act be strong is nurtured in her lap. If she is proscribed to the possession of noble sentiments, and a sphere of household action, she can yet transfuse her sentiments into one who will bear them abroad to the world. What is the man of action but the delegate of thoughtful woman? Where is barbarity most inveterate and debasing, but where woman is most debased? One trembles to contemplate the situation into which society has been wrested through the illegitimate assumptions of man as the representative of brute force. He has denuded woman of her responsibility as an agent of progress and has destroyed her moral grandeur, with her liberty and equality. Sent to be a companion and guide, she has been made a nonentity. Constituted with a mind equal to man's in every respect, perhaps superior in the gentler attributes she has been hitherto treated as if the doctrine of the Mussulman were true. Young men seldom attempt to engage in serious or instructive conversation in promiscuous assemblies; they seem to have studied inane twaddle and frivolous disgusting repartee, that they might insult the intellect and perpetuate the subjugation of woman.

COTTAGE HOMES.—"The Cottage Homes of England, how beautiful they stand!" So begins one of the popular songs of the day. It is to be feared that the picture is not after nature." A clean, snug cottage, tightly thatched, or slated, white-washed, well-furnished, is, indeed, a beautiful object, even in a picture. But how few are there of this sort! Are they not, in town and in country, the exceptions to the rule? "The Cottage Homes of England," for the most part, are not beautiful, not comfortable, not wholesome. They are badly built, the ground about them is mostly undrained, they are very cold in winter, and they breed rheumatism, typhus, and many other diseases. They are not roomy enough. In many cases, they consist of only one apartment, which serves for kitchen, washhouse, parlour, dining-room, and sleeping-room. Sometimes there is a little back-room, which admits of greater decency in the domestic arrangements. But, for the most part, the cottage homes of England are as we have described them. They are not so bad, it is true, as the cottage homes of Ireland, where a little mud and turf, roofed over, forms the Irish dwelling. But still they are capable of vast improvement, which, the sooner effected, the better for the "bold peasantry, their country's pride." Now the home is the soil in which the young human being grows, where it receives its first impressions of existence, and where the disposition to be happy, or the reverse, is first developed. Let the home be a comfortable and happy one, and its influence directed by a virtuous father and mother, and what may you not hope for from the children cultured and nurtured there? But, from the untidy, dirty, comfortless homes of a people, there can issue little other than bitterness of spirit, misery, and crime, which go on reproducing each other in constant succession.

AFRICA.

WHAT a wonderful continent is this rounded, smooth-shored Africa, known from the earliest dawn of time, yet so unknown; the granary of nations, yet sterile and fruitless as the sea; swarming with life, yet dazzling the eyes with its vast tract of glittering sand! North America, first seen but the other day, has been probed from end to end; its gallant and restive Phillips, Tecumsehs, and Montezumas, have been bridled and broken by the white man; but Africa has seen no Cortez, or even a De Soto or La Salle "wring favor from fate." Some solitary Mungo Park, or faithful Lander, or persevering Burckhardt, alone has tried to read the secret of the mother of civilization, the gray haired Africa.

If we seek a land of romance and mystery, what quarter of the globe compares with that which holds the pyramids: the giant Theban temples, under one roof of which clusters a modern village; the solemn-hewn mountain-cliff of a Sphinx; the ruins of Carthage; the Nile, with its hidden sources; the Niger, with its unknown outlet; the heaven-bearing Atlas; the dimly-seen mountains of the moon!

There, reader, the slave rose romantically to be the ruler of millions; there Moses, floating in his cradle, is saved by a king's daughter, and, like the hero of some earlier character, breaks the bonds of his people, and founds a new and mighty nation. There was the home of Dido of Hannibal, the scene of Scipio's triumphs and Jugurtha's crimes; there lived Tertullian, Athanasius, and Augustine; the romance of the Moors dwelt there; the last breath of Louis of France was drawn there.

Africa is the home of the leviathan, the behemoth, the unicorn, the giraffe, the slight antelope, the earth-shaking elephant, the unconquerable lion, the all-conquering buffalo. It is the home, too, of the mysterious colored races, yet lying dormant in the germ, destined perhaps to rule this earth when our proud Anglo-Saxon blood is as corrupt as that of the descendants of Homer and Pericles.

The past, present, and future of Africa are alike wrapped in mystery. Who can tell us of the childhood of dark-browed Egypt, square shouldered and energetic? Carthage, the England of the old world's rulers, has not even romancing Livy, still less an unwearied Niebuhr, to explain her rise and unfangle the mysteries of her constitution. Of all the vast interior, what do we know more than the Punic merchants, who, like us, dealt there, taking slaves, ivory, and gold?

And what can we hope to see hereafter in those immense, unknown lands? God has enabled the European to drive the North American, step by step, toward extinction, and has given a great continent the full development and trial of whatever permanent power the Caucasian race possesses. But Africa He has preserved—for what? or future contest? For an imported foreign civilization to be entered through Liberia and Cape Colonies? France and Britain are watching each other now along those burning sands, as they once watched by the icy rocks of Canada and Acadia: is it to end in the same subjection of the aboriginal owners to one or both of these? Or does the dark race, in all its varieties, possess a capacity for understanding and living out the deep meaning of the world's rules, Christianity, as the offspring of the followers of Odin never did, and never can, understand and act it?

If the old Egyptian Sesostris had paused to contemplate the illiterate wanderers of Greece, to whom Cadmus was just striving to make known the letters of Phœnicia, would not Plato and Aristotle have seemed as impossible to him as the existence in Africa of a higher Christianity than has yet been seen, seems to us? Would not the present position of the Teutonic race have appeared equally incredible to the Parthenon, the loungers in the gardens of the Academy?—Foreign Review.

THE LOST TRAVELLER.

AMONG the numerous victims, distinguished travellers, whose lives have been sacrificed to the perils of African discovery, the world has almost forgotten that of the unfortunate Jacques Compagnon, who, under the auspices of the Duke of Choiseul, left Senegal in 1758 to explore the country to the north and east of Senegambia, penetrating as far as the wooded desert of Simboni, where he was heard from in 1760, and then disappeared, never, it was supposed, to be heard from again. After ninety years of mystery and oblivion, however the veil has been removed, and the secret of his fate has been disclosed by M. de Gayga, a Hungarian explorer in Africa, from whom a letter has been received by the Imperial Society of Vienna, disclosing the discoveries which seem to place the fact beyond question, besides giving it a very interesting aspect. M. de Gayga, writes from the country of the Kommenis, a semi-civilized tribe, who have some religious notions, possessing a certain analogy with the Christian tradition, a regular language, an alphabet and a mode of writing, all or most of which they appear, from their own account, to have derived from a stranger, a European, who died among them in 1775, and whose memory was revered as that of a sage or good genius. That this stranger was Jacques Compagnon was proved by a number of circumstances, not the least conclusive of which was several personal relics, regarded by the people as sacred, one being a quadrant, with his name engraved upon it in full. It would seem, from such accounts and traditions as M. de Gayga was able to gather, that Compagnon was detained by the Kommenis, and being reconciled at last to his captivity, devoted himself to instructing them in the useful arts. His tomb consisting of "a little stone monument of a conical form, covered with an inscription in hieroglyphical characters," was pointed out to the Hungarian visitor in one of their principal villages.—Cong Journal

We learn by the Atlantic, that in Ireland the excitement against the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill is rising to a dangerous pitch. A great meeting of Romanists was to have been held in Dublin on the 19th ult., the call for which was signed by thirty-three of their pseudo archbishops and bishops, many peers, members of parliament, &c. In affixing their names to the requisition, a number of the prelates assumed their territorial titles, and the Rev. Paul Cullen styles himself "Archbishop, Primate of all Ireland;" thus openly challenging the law officers of the crown to enforce the Papal Aggression Act. What the issue will be, remains to be seen. Some of their priesthood are looking to France for aid, and putting forth all manner of treasonable and blood-thirsty appeals to their countrymen. "There is," says a Dr. Cahill, "not one Frenchman, or one French woman, or one French child, who would not dance with frantic joy at the glorious idea of having an opportunity of burying their eager swords, and plunging their crimsoned French steel in the inmost heart of every man bearing the hated name of English-man." The Guardian says, "The extraordinary insolence of the Romish priesthood, and their organs in Ireland, is fast rousing, not only the intolerance, but the legitimate national feeling of the English."—True Union.

A PEEP UNDER THE SHEEP'S CLOTHING—A gentleman informs us that in the course of conversation a few days since with a Roman Catholic, the latter confidently gave it as his opinion that, being gradually joined by the majority of the church of England professors, the Roman Catholic faith would ultimate become the established religion. The gentleman reasoned with him upon the improbability of his hopes being ever realized, as there were enough of evangelical clergy and laity to prevent the possibility of such an event, even if all the High church were to join the Romish party. His antagonist disputing this, the gentleman by way of a clincher, added, "even if the whole Anglican Church were to join you, which, however, I have not the least apprehension of, the Dissenters are too strong ever to allow of such a thing as you hope for." The Romish politician tapped him familiary on the shoulder as he answered—"Put by the Church of England, and leave us to deal with the Dissenters: we'd very soon make the vagabonds preach to another tune than 'No Popery.'" It is as well that the "vagabonds" should know what the holy Romans have in contemplation for them.—Bristol Times ☞Flowers furnish gorgeous imaginary and beautiful thoughts. They constitute the most touching and delicate language which affection could devise. They speak directly to the heart. No marvel is it then that woman loves them. They bear such touching similitude to her own history—repaying with grateful fragrance and beauty the hand which cherishes them, and dying beneath the blighting influence of this world's coldness and neglect.

RANDOM THOUGHTS.

PROCRASTINATION.

Amid the many difficulties that surround our steps when endeavoring to pursue, with serious intention, a distinct purpose or aim, nothing rises with perhaps greater frequency as an obstacle, or is more baffling in its effect, than the consciousness of tardiness in the outset of an undertaking. The first step has often been declared the one of greatest difficulty, and we will usually find, if that step be duly taken at the proper season, the enterprise, of whatever nature it may be, may be considered fairly entered upon with the chances of completion strongly in its favor. It is true the utility and necessity for a strictly systematic course of endeavor, a kind of parcelling out, measure by measure, of thought and deed, squaring mental exertion by compass and rule, as it were, is frequently and forcibly descanted upon, though it may furnish abundant exercise to the controlling powers of man, and give to his mind a machine-like power of appliance, yet must ever differ widely from the force and strength of a direct, cheerful, voluntary inspiration, coming one knows not whence, and inciting to the utmost exertion of present power. For every purpose, for every sugestion of the human mind, there appears to exist a corresponding apportionment of time as the most fitting moment for commencement of an undertaking; for if we allow that period to pass by, we find no other opportunity presents precisely similar adaptation. No purposed step based upon retrogression can be secure, for the mind, like time itself, rolls ever onward, evolving new impulses and ideas, linked, indeed, with those preceding, but of changed or modified character. In vain we may attempt the recall of the past moment of inspiration, we can only recur to its reflected image in the glass of memory—but shadowy and imperfect is the form conveyed—possessing no more the invigorating incentive given to our exertion by the consciousness of the actual present. "Now is the time," possesses a potent spell, that it were well we should make the maxim of our life. How incalculable are the loss of those moments of youthful impulse when frittered away in the void of indefiniteness, when the procrastinating spirit sees as busy in suggestion, bringing, by the aid of fancy's wing, a golden harvest of wisdom and beauty to the perceptions, while the corporate part of man, its tardy colleague, remains silent, giving no voice or aid to its high impulses, coldly receiving its glowing suggestions only with the whispered promise of future action.

Few can estimate the enervating influence of continued revery upon the mental condition, the vagueness of perception, the want of fibre in the frame of thought, and the listlessness of action ever consequent upon indulgence of this pernicious habit, together with the unavoidable habit of tardiness of undertaking, that places a man in a position of one seeking to overtake his shadow, who finds, in proportion to his increasing efforts, the shade preceeding hastes but faster on.

The unfortunate individual whose habit, either natural or acquired, ever delays to its "more convenient season," is justly an object of our commiseration; for either must he deplore most earnestly his position of perpetual strife, or, callous to all aim, become content to yield a passive assent to the hurrying tides that pass beyond, leaving him as a stranded shell upon the shore, whose ceaseless murmurings only speak existence by its lingering echoes of the past. To such the hours flow entangled, and the active, refreshing, waking period of dawn is lost in noontide's fiercer rays—ere morning's labors are but half accomplished while noon again exacts in twilight's gentle calm, and nature claims its hours of silence and of rest from toil, by encroaching on the right and portion of the busy day. The seasons, too, forever in advance, proclaim the harvest time is come ere yet spring's seedlings disappear, and winter's storms will mock at summer's mild defiences, bidding his minion frost deal most ungently with the unprepared.

The healthful exercise of contemplation, by which the mind is strengthened and improved is sometimes unproperly confounded with that of revery; but watchfulness of the effects upon the character, arising from the indulgence of either, will soon convince the observer of their relative difference, one leading the individual to prompt and judicious action, the other to indefinite aim, to listless effort, and to that most fatal of mental infirmities, procrastination.—Ch. Adv & Journal

THE DESTINY OF AFRICA

FROM AN ORATION BY HON. J. W. MILLER, UNITED STATES SENATOR FOR NEW JERSEY.

During the last year, there has been organized and established upon the western coast of Africa a republican Government, modeled after our own Constitution. The free citizens of this new Republic * * * * * * restored to their native land by the philanthropy of their friends.

Africa! the forsaken and the accursed! the land of gloomy forests and barren deserts; her inhabitants the most degraded of mankind; her commerce with the civilized world confined to a traffic in the flesh and blood of her enslaved children—on this dark continent, and over this degraded people, is now established a Government, whose benignant sway is founded upon liberty law, and religion. The Republic of Liberia is the child of America's philanthropy—begotten, not in the lust of dominion nor in the pride of empire, but in the humble and Christian spirit of charity, which loosens the captive's bonds, rescues the hopeless and forsaken, and points out a highway of deliverance to an oppressed nation.

While we glory in the extent of our conquests, and "sing far-sounding pæans" to heroes who, on the land and over the sea, have borne our victorious flag from clime to clime, from ocean to ocean, let us not overlook this more quiet and peaceful, yet grand and more blessed achievement of the Colonization Society. To have been the grand battle-field of the Revolution, and to have suggested the first idea of a national and constitutional union, may seem enough of glory for one small State; but there is yet a wreath of olive to add to the laurel which encircles the brow of New Jersey. Here, within ten miles of the spot on which we are assembled, stands the humble mansion of him to whose pure and penetrating mind the idea first presented itself of erecting upon the African shore a refuge for the slave, a safety-valve for his master.

We should look upon this event, not only in reference to the influence of such a Government over Africa, but also in regard to its effect upon ourselves. Not alone will it shed its blessings upon the continent on which it is established, but it will also reflect light and hope to the only dark spot in our own free institutions. That peculiar institution—to call it by no harsher name—which exists in this country by State authority, and not forbidden by the Constitution, is and has ever been, surrounded by dangers and difficulties, which have filled the hearts of our wisest and best statesmen with forebodings of evil. With the slave, under the legal control of his master, it is neither our duty nor our right to interfere; but there is an impact of slavery to which we may look without exciting the jealousy or disturbing the peace of any one. I refer to that portion of the African race in this country which has been or may be emancipated from bondage. Born upon the soil and subject to our laws, yet denied all the privileges of citizenship, degraded without crime, and associated for centuries with servility, his emancipation only advances him to a position where he can more clearly see and more keenly feel his degradation. When and how this unfortunate race was to be exalted to the enjoyment of those civil and political rights which we accord to all men, whether by violence or by law, was one of those fearful mysteries which clouded the future peace of this country. That cloud is dissipated; and Liberia, namesake of Freedom, shines over the sea as a beacon of hope to guide her children to the harbor of refuge prepared for them in their own native land. That dark and bloody stream, which for a century has flowed from Africa to America's shore, bringing shame, slavery, and crime, now cleared and purified, flows back again to Africa, bearing upon its bright waters civilization, liberty, and religion.

At the last session of Congress, it was proposed by the friends of African Colonization, that our Government should aid in the establishment of a line of steamers to Liberia, for the joint purpose of increasing the commerce with and immigrating to that country. I trust that another session will not pass without this liberal and noble measure receiving the approbation of the nation.

How mysterious are the ways of Providence! bringing good out of evil, liberty out of slavery, religion out of barbarism! Behold the same people who, in years gone by, employed the power and wealth of commerce in crowding the sea with pestilential slave ships, now using their increased commercial advantages and improved means of navigation in sending back to the land of their fathers the descendants of those kidnapped slaves, upon the broad, clear deck of an American steamer, and under the protection of our nations flag. What child of America would not feel prouder of his country for a deed such as this? Where is the Christian whose heart would not swell with gratitude to God for such a work of justice and humanity?—Christian Statesman.

DISEASE OF THE HEART.

BY T. J. NICHOLS M. D.

THERE are fashions in diseases as well as in medicines. When doctors are at a loss to account to their patients for their bad feelings, they resort to some mysterious, hidden, inward cause, to remove which they give some equally hidden, mysterious, and inward medicine. The nervous system answered for a time, and everybody was nervous.

"Doctor, what is it ails me?" the lady would ask.

"Madam, it's the nerves—your nervous system is out of order," was the grave reply.

"Well, there! I thought something was the matter with my nerves; but, Doctor can you cure them?"

The doctor smiles gravely, as doctors do; as if they had a profound pity for the ignorance that could ask such a question: and, without giving any other answer, he calls for a piece of white paper, deals out a few powders of morphine, and goes his way rejoicing, leaving behind him a greatful impression of super-human wisdom.

The nerves, in time, were worn out—then came the spine. It was wonderful to see the number of persons that had affections of the spine. Doctors who had not thought of a diseased spine for years, found curvatures, softenings, inflammations, and ulcerations, in every one they examined; and when the question came, "Doctor, what does ail me?" the ready answer was, "Madam, I'm afraid your spine is affected." Then came leechings, cuppings, dry cuppings, setons, blisters, moxa, and the cautery, potential and actual.

Spines have had their day. There are some old-fashioned doctors who still adhere to them as old men continue to wear the costumes of their younger days; and some indulge in a spinal disease occasionally, just for variety.

The organ now in vogue is the heart. Its diseases are obscure, mysterious, terrible. Whoever dies suddenly, of the wrong medicine, or an overdose, or from any unknown cause, dies of disease of the heart. The heart is the anchor to the windward. "He will get well, madam," the doctor says to the mother who hangs over her darling child, "unless there is disease of the heart," and he shakes his head dubiously. If the patient dies, the doctor says, "You know I told you what I apprehended. Where there is disease of so vital an organ as the heart, our medicines are of little avail." All over this city nervous people are frightened into fidgets about disease of the heart. The sudden deaths in the papers are by disease of the heart. People are feeling their pulses, watching every palpitation, and doing all they can to derange the circulation, because the doctors have chosen to make the heart the present scape goat.

The heart may be diseased; but there is no organ of the body better protected, or less liable to any organic affection. It is a mass of muscle and cartilage, simple in its construction and action. It is not exposed, like the stomach, to have a hundred improper things stuffed into it. Nature has given it every possible protection, and it is generally the purest and healthiest organ in the body.

The heart is subject, in certain conditions of general disease, to hybertrophy, or thickening, of its muscular tissue, entire or partial; to dilation, or enlargement without thickening or to both combined. In rare cases, the valves may be altered in form or structure. In old age there is sometimes ossification, or the deposition of bony matter, and rarely there is softening of the walls of the heart, and even bursting or breaking. A broken heart is a real thing, but it is also a very rare one. Probably there are not more than five or six cases of broken heart on record; but if you were to believe the novelists, every third woman dies of a broken heart, and if you were to believe the doctors just now, all the cases of death they cannot otherwise account for, are caused by the disease of this organ.

Organic diseases of the heart is the result of long continued abuse and general disorder. Functional disturbance is common in almost every state of disease, and long continued functional disorder may lead in time to organic disease; and where this exists, it is as a result and not as the cause of general disease.

In nine cases in ten, the flutterings, palpitations, intermittent pulse, difficulty of breathing, feeling of suffocation, &c., often attributed to disease of the heart, are mere nervous derangements, sympathetic with a dyspeptic stomach, disordered bowels, or diseases of the uterine system. Cure the stomach, regulate the bowels, and the heart is found in the right place, beating like a trip hammer, and pulsating with all the regularity of an eight day clock. The heart must sympathize, by its system of organic nerves, with every disorder of the body, as it does with every emotion of the mind. Joy, grief, love, jealousy, all affect the action of the heart, and an excess of these emotions may produce fatal convulsions of the organ, or suspend its action for a time, or for ever—but this is not what the doctors mean by the disease of the heart, now their fashionable bugbear.

Functional disorders of the heart is as easily cured as those of any other organ; and even organic lessons are not necessarily fatal. Men have lived after a dagger or a musket ball has gone through the heart, if they did not enter its cavities. Be sure that nature has not left such an important organ without the wisest protection and all possible means of recuperation.

And how are the diseases and disorders of the heart to be cured? The first thing to do in this, as in all cases, is to find out the cause of disease and remove it. The work is more than half done. If the heart is aching with mental anxiety, that anxiety must be removed or new passions must be awakened. The physician who cannot "minister to a mind diseased," does but half know his business. Often the soul needs its special bath, its douche, and it's proper exercise and diet, as well as the body. A dose of cheerfulness will revive the action of the heart when it is beating ever so languidly, and hope is its proper stimulant.

The drugs usually given for disordered circulation are those which have the most deadly influence on the heart's action. The drugs which poison the blood must modify its action upon the nerves of the heart. A healthy heart must have pure blood to act upon, as well as for its own nourishment, and pure blood comes from pure nutrition, a free oxydation and active depuration. Diet, air, exercise, and cleanliness, with cheerfulness and hope—these are the medicines of the heart.—N. Y. Sun

DANGERS OF FASHIONABLE LIFE.

At the age of fifteen, Elmira Gladden was deeply troubled in spirit, on account of her condition as a sinner against God. Her mother was a professor of religion, but was of a rather timid and retiring disposition, conversed but little with her daughter concerning her soul's interests, and exercised but little direct salutary influence over her mind. She was rather a weak-minded woman, whose conceptions of right, in little matters, were somewhat obscure, and who was deficient in that firmness of principle and decision of character, which are so important to the right training of children. Elmira's father was a prosperous man of the world, who attended church regularly upon the Sabbath, but gave little heed to the precepts of piety during the week.

During a revival of religion where several of her young associates were awakened and converted, Elmira's mind was impressed with a sense of the necessity of personal piety to her own safety and happiness. She had been from childhood a pupil in the Sabbath school, was, of course, familiar as the study of the Scriptures could make her with the theory of the way of salvation, and in a few weeks rejoiced in the hope of pardon through the atonement of Jesus Christ.

After several conversations with her and with her parents, Elmira was advised by her pastor, in accordance with her own often expressed desires, to unite herself with the church. The minister faithfully represented to her the warfare in which as a Christian she must engage; the temptations and snares which she must expect to meet. He could but be satisfied with the replies she made to his questions, and Elmira was received into the fellowship of the church. She expressed great delight in the service of God's house, and manifested a warm zeal in all that pertained to the interests of Zion. She exhorted her young friends to flee from the wrath to come, and gave most pleasing indications that there had been a genuine and thorough work of grace in the soul.

A year passed away, and the period of parties and amusements came with the opening winter. Elmira, now passed her sixteenth year, had left school, and numbered among her friends, some of the gay and thoughtless, and fashionable of the neighborhood. She was invited to attend mixed parties, where religion was an excluded theme, and where fashionable frivolities and sports occupied the hours. She came from them without a heart for prayer. Soon it was proposed that she should attend a dancing school. She hesitated, and her mother timidly expressed her doubts of its propriety. But she was beset by gidly associates, her scruples ridiculed, the objections of the mother were answered by mothers careless of their daughters' piety, who urged that it was necessary in order to polished manners and a graceful carriage—the father gave his consent, and presented Elmira with a beautiful set of jewels, and she became a regular attendant of the dancing school.

Her grieved pastor exerted all his influence to stay this current of temptation or to draw her from it, but the fashions of the world were too strong for his appeals. Gradually, she absented herself from the prayer meetings and lectures, manifested less and less interest in her Bible class and benevolent works, and at last tearfully confessed that she had almost given up reading the Word of God, or attempting secret communion with her Saviour. She confessed that she was doing wrong, but indeed, said she, "you cannot tell how strong the temptations are to which I am exposed." In due time came the invitation to a ball, which with the consent of the mother, and the smiling approbation of the father was accepted. The fascinating manners, and beautiful appearance of the daughter charmed the heart of the unfaithful mother, who doated upon Elmira as her idol.

The church was now compelled to notice these violations of covenant obligations, and after making every effort which pious solicitude required, to reclaim the wanderers, at last submitted to the painful necessity of declaring the exclusion of the mother and daughter from the fellowship of the church. For a little season both seemed to be relieved from restraints that had become irksome to them; and the home which had seemed to be pervaded by the sweet calm spirit of piety became a house of fashionable gayety and mirth. The church was altogether forsaken, and the whole family were absorbed in worldly pursuits and amusements.

Before she was eighteen, Elmira was married to one of the gay frequenters of her parties, whose only attractions were a fashionable dress and deportment, and a considerable estate derived by inheritance. Before she was twenty, that estate was nearly squandered by dissipation and gambling; her young husband sought for gratification in any place rather than home, his affections were entirely alienated from her, and wandered after others, and she now became serious enough. But it was not the seriousness of piety. She was a pining, broken-hearted girl. In an hour of compunction and bitter sorrow she sent for her former pastor.

He found her sick. Her mother and a servant were with her. The companions of her gayety were not those who minister in sick chambers, and soothe the hours of solitude and pain with their sympathies and kindness. They lived to amuse themselves, and there is no amusement in visiting the sick.

Death had pressed his cold hand upon her brow, and the pastor saw with inexpressible grief, that she was surely marked for an early grave. He conversed with her earnestly, desiring to lead her back to the Saviour from whom she had so wilfully departed. He spoke of the infinite compassion and love of Jesus, and Elmira wept, bitterly wept.—"Ah!" said she, "I have wilfully wandered from him, and deliberately chosen the world as my portion, and its pleasures as my joy. Is there any hope for me?" "Do you ever pray?" "Pray! I cannot pray; I have not even attempted the form of prayer for a long, long time." After a long interview, the pastor bowed by her bed side in fervent supplication, and departed. He visited her again and again. But no hope dawned upon her soul. No peace soothed her disturbed spirit.

He was at her bed-side at the last hour of life, and witnessed the closing struggle. After praying for her, while the choking tears scalded the hearts of the remorseless mother and father, the pastor bowed over her, and trembling, inquired, "Can you not trust your soul in Jesus' hands?" "Have you not hope in his mercy?" She sadly shook her head, and with a despairing gesture pushed him from her, closed her eyes, and after a few, quick, hard breathings, her soul was in eternity.

The heart broken mother in a few months returned in penitence to the church from which she had so guiltily wandered, but for years she never sat at the table of the Lord without weeping bitterly as she thought of the daughter who had once in youthful beauty sat beside her in that holy place.—Southern Baptist.

A CONTRAST.

A court room in one of our large cities is thronged with a dense mass of spectators.—From floor to ceilling rises one crowded array of anxious faces. The room is as silent as death. A human being is on trial for life, and his advocate is just rising to make his last defence. Mark the carefulness with which he reviews the testimony. Mark the intense solicitude with which he avails himself of every symptom of feeling in the jury-box. And as he draws near the close of his argument, see how his hand trembles, how his face is flushed, how his whole frame is shaking under the weight of an overwhelming solicitude, too great even for utterance. Is he too earnest? Is his appeal too impassioned and fervid?—Look at that wretched criminal with his quivering lip, and let him answer! Look at that pale wife, and that group of children; all waiting in agonizing suspense for the fate of a husband and a father! Ask that breathless bystander, and he will answer, "No! he cannot be too earnest; the life of a fellow being is at stake; if he manifested any less solicitude, he would not only be wanting in professional fidelity, but even lacking the ordinary feelings of humanity."

When the next Sabbath comes, you meet that bystander in the house of God—Around you are a large company of travelers to eternity. Some of them are ignorant.—Some of them are careless and indifferent. A large portion of them are enemies of God, with the whetted sword of Almighty wrath already hanging over them. As the minister of Christ casts his eye over his audience, he sees many who are utterly without hope," and if death were suddenly to overtake them, he knows that they must sink to eternal darkness and the undying worm. Even to-morrow some of those hearers may be wrapped in their shrouds, and their souls in another world!

Weighed down with the tremendous responsibility that rests upon him, the herald of the cross proclaims his message, with strong crying and tears. Every argument that could be drawn from thundering Sinai or darkened Calvary, from an open heaven or a yawning hell, is presented from a soul breaking with solicitude for dying men. And when the message of love has been delivered, and the minister of Christ has returned to his closet, to mourn that he did not plead his Master's cause yet more earnestly, where are his auditors? How many heard his message? How many gave heed to it? How many remembered it until they reached their own dwellings? Well will it be if some did not retire to mock and sneer at it all as the effusion of crazy enthusiasm, or a fanatical bigotry. The modern Festus, who applauded the eloquent advocate at the court room pronounces this man "mad;" and even many a frigid professor thinks that the worthy preacher was somewhat "beside himself," from the ardor of his emotion.

If such painful contrasts sink the souls of God's ministers here in sorrow, and well nigh to despair, how must they appear to those who behold them from another world! How must they appear to a saint in bliss, or to a lost soul in the world of woe! —Christian Chronicle.

THE POLITENESS OF PAUL.

An old poet has quaintly called Jesus "the first true gentleman that ever breathed"—Paul's politeness, too, must not be overlooked compounded as it was of dignity and deference. It appeared in the nobleness of self-command in which he delivered his most startling and shattering messages, both to Jew and heathen; in his graceful salutations; in his winning rebukes—the very flowers of which did not break the head;" in the delicacy of his allusions to his own claims and services; and, above all, in the calm self-composed, and manly attitude he assumed before the rulers of his people and the Roman authorities. In the language of Peter and Joan to their judges, there is an abruptness savoring of their rude fisherman life, and fitter for the rough echoes of the Lake of Galilee, than for the tribunal of power. But Paul, while equally bold and decided, is far more gracious. He lowers his thunderbolt before his adversary ere he launches it. His shaft is "polished," as well as powerful.—His words to King Agrippa, —I would to God that not only thou, but also all that hear me this day, were both almost and altogether such as I am, except these bonds,"—are the most chivalrous utterances recorded in history. An angel could not bend more gracefully, or assume an attitude of more exalted courtesy.—Christian Chronicle.

A YONG GIDEON.

A boy belonging to one of the schools established by the missionaries in the South Seas, had heard so much of the sin and folly of idolatry that his confidence in idols was shaken, and he longed to know for a certainty whether the images he had been accustomed to worship was really possessed of power or not. One day his father and mother went out, and left him at home alone. He had spent some time in reading his task, and thinking over what he had been taught at the school the day before. At last the idea came into his mind that it would be a good thing to burn the idols. He was, however, afraid partly on account of his parents, and partly from the dread he had of offending the gods, and bringing down upon him swift destruction. In this difficulty he knelt down, and entreated the god of Christians to take care of him and help him. He then rose and taking up one of the smallest idols, he put it on the fire; the flames kindled about it and in a short time not a vestige of it remained. The terrified child looked on with astonishment; but no sooner was the first consumed than he threw on another, and another, and another, till like Gideon of old, he had thoroughly cleansed his father's house. When, however, the flames had subsided and all was over, the boy became alarmed at his own temerity. He had no fear of the gods of wood and of stone, but he trembled at the thought of what his father might say and he was half inclined to repent of his rashness. In this extremity he shut up the dwelling, and went into the woods; and the best way he could, devoted himself to God, promising that if God would befriend him and be his God, he would serve him all the days of his life. While he was there his father and mother returned, and missing at once the idols and the boy, they feared some spirit had come and taken them away together. As soon as they could recover themselves a little, they went to the missionary and asked him if he knew anything about their son. He said he did not; but suspecting what he had done, he offered to accompany them and find him out. After going in various directions, they bent their steps to the woods, and there at some distance, under the shadow of a large tree, they saw the lad kneeling before God. The parents were so thankful to see him again and to find that not a hair of his head had been hurt, that they forgot their rebukes, were persuaded to renounce their heathenish customs, and henceforth gave themselves up to the study of the Holy Scriptures. The boy encouraged by the Divine goodness, was confirmed in his resolution to be the Lord's, and afterwards became a zealous teacher in schools and a preacher of the gospel among his brethren.—Southern Baptist

REMEMBRANCE OF THE DEAD.

Thy memory as a spell
Of love comes o'er my mind.
As dew upon the purple bell,
As perfume on the wind,
As music on the sea,
As sunshine on the river;
So hath it always been to me,
So shall it be forever

I hear thy voice in dreams
Upon me softly call.
Like echo of the mountain streams
In sportive waterfall.
I see thy form as when
Thou wert a living thing,
And blossom'd in the eyes of men
Like any flower of spring

Thy soul to heaven hath fled,
From earthly thraldom free;
Yet 'tis not as the dead
That thou appear'st to me:
In slumber I see thee
Translated as thou art on earth;
The locks of yellow gold,
The sapphire eye of mirth.

I hear thy gentle
The [illegible] and free
That utters [illegible] mood
Wide scatter'd as they [illegible]
So strong [illegible]
My spirit [illegible] fill,
I think not they are dreams,
But [illegible]

TEMPERANCE.

A Good Sign.—A gentleman having occasion to visit Portland, not long since, on important legal proceedings, brought with him a man as a witness who was as sure to get drunk, as he was able to obtain liquor. Of course the gentleman had reason to fear that his man might get drunk, in which case it was probable that he would be useless to him as a witness. As soon as they had arrived here the man was missing; but in few hours returned sober, very much to the astonishment and gratification of the gentleman, who took occasion to speak to him of so remarkable an occurrence. The reply of the toper was—"I have travelled mor'n five miles, and could not get a drop." This speaks well for Portland.—True Union.

THE GREAT WANT.

This is want of charity. From the absence or defect of this arise many of our greatest evils, for which only in its increase can be found a remedy. Suspicion and distrust are elements of distruction to the happiness of individuals and to the public quiet and prosperity. The appalling horrors of the first French revolution were rather to be imputed to ignorance and fear than to malevolence and cruelty. At least, was not this true in respect to the masses? Of all men, he, at the present time, would be the greatest benefactor to this nation who could convince the people of our Southern and Northern States that no essential differences in principles, in interests, or conditions, seperate them—that they are brethren, under one and the same great and good Government, and still better by the holy ties of the Christian Faith—that, believing alike in the Redemption by Christ of the whole human race, they are alike concerned, and obliged to promote the welfare of each other and of all men, and especially and without exception bound to live and act in this world as destined to live forever in a world eternal. There is not a virtuous man in the North nor the South who does not cherish a true and humane regard to the present and future welfare of the colored population, not one who would exclude them from all hopes of improvement, or fail to rejoice at the revelation of any causes or events which, without injury to others, would work for their benefit. The great fund of humanity to the colored people is treasured up in the South; it is in the hearts of those who perhaps denounce all foreign interference, and often are unjust to good men like themselves because they misapprehend their views, but on whose hearts are engraven the lessons of the Gospel and the radiant and divine image of its Author.—Christian Statesman

LOUIS NAPOLEON.

Louis Napoleon is a little under size—say five feet eight inches high—with rather broad and square shoulders, a somewhat thick neck, and a German rather than French head. His complexion and expression, his wide face, his ample brain, expanded at the sides and rather lowered at the forehead, all would have led me, had I seen him without knowing him, to say he was a German. His hair is dark brown his moustache very massy, and reddish brown; eyes dark greyish blue, almost covered by thick and folded eyelids, and shaded by heavy fleshy eyebrows. His movements are simple, natural and moderate, with a touch of dignity, which is the more effective, as it seems suggestive of something more behind it.

On the whole Louis Napoleon might pass in the crowd as an ordinary man, unambitious at heart, bound to no fame by fortune, consecrated to no high purpose or achievment by Providence. I looked intently at his countenance for some traces of Josephine, whose blood beat in his heart, but in vain. I looked again for the resemblance of the great Napoleon, of whose sceptre he all but wields. It may be fancy, yet I thought I could perceive something of that sadness so impenetrable, so fathomless, so mystical which was characteristic of the Emperor. It is, however, slight, and has not the repulsive Asiatic gloom which blackened and rendered terrible the clouded countenance of the Corsican. On the contrary, Louis Napoleon's face is decidedly benevolent, his smile is pleasing, and the play of his features rather social and genial; yet there is a coldness and setting of mystery about him like that of a man trained to disappointment and little accustomed to hope; one who has walked the world by himself, not rejecting sympathy nor yet desiring to obtain it; one who is accustomed to be looked on as a riddle, which he would not, or could not, solve. He does not look disconcerted, nor the contrary; neither happy nor unhappy; neither excited nor desponding. His general expression is that of steadiness, self-possession, modesty, with an air of melancholy which irresistibly invites sympathy and begets favour—the more, perhaps, because of the blaze of pomp and power with which he is surrounded, and which he seems to command. I can very easily comprehend, now, the power which Louis Napoleon exercises over a considerable part of the people of France, in spite of the difficulties of his situation, and the many things, good or ill, which he has done, and which of necessity have often fallen with annoying emphasis upon the clashing interests of parties, cliques and cabals.—Hom. Journal

GOOD EFFECTS OF EARLY RISING.—It is related that King George III., who made the cause of longevity a subject of investigation, procured two persons, each above a hundred years of age, to dance in his presence. He then requested them to relate to him their modes of living that he might draw from them, if possible, some clue to the cause of their vigorous old age. The one had been a shepherd, remarkable temperate and circumspect in his diet and regimen; the other a hedger, had been noted for his irregularity, exposure, and intemperance. The Monarch could draw no inference to guide his inquiries from such different modes of life terminating in the same result; but on further inquiry he learned that both men were alike distinguished by a tranquil easiness of temper, active habits, and early rising.

☞If a person would obtain a true knowledge of the Christain religion, let him study the Holy scriptures, especially the New Testament, —Therein are contained the words of eternal life. It has God for its author, salvation for its end, and truth without any mixture of error, —John Locke.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, FEBUARY, 18th. 1852.

For some time past, we have not presented our readers with the "shipping list." Many causes combined, put it out of our power to do so, but as we are now getting into our usual order, we will see that this important information shall be given. The war threw us back; and as it now being classed "among the things that were," we hope in future not to be forced to come out with apologies. We can safely say, however, notwithstanding our commercial operations considerably suffered, on account of the difficulties in Grand Bassa, that a respectable number of shipping have visited our port and transacted business of considerable magnitude within the last three months. It is apparent to all, that the commercial operations of Liberia, are steadily increasing, and it is only necessary for some movement to be made, to bring from the interior, the rich productions with which it abounds, and which would increase our commercial interests, in a year's time, to one hundred per cent. If the government, from its numerous engagements, cannot now, give the subject of our interior intercourse, some attention, we think it might very properly, attract the consideration of our merchants. They know, as well as we do, that an intercourse with the natives, some two hundred miles back from the sea shore, would be the means of rapidly adding to their wealth; and such a trade as would come from that part, would be more safe and profitable, than the one they are now engaged in. Ivory, Gold and Hides, would form the principal articles of trade from the interior and a great portion of these articles that now find their way to Sierra Leone, would be brought to our towns and villages, if it were not for the intervention the natives are subject to, on their way to this place. To find a market for their rich wares, they travel to Sierra Leone, a distance of 300 miles, when it is greater than it is to Monrovia. A few hundred dollars expense, would remedy this evil, and change this condition of things. Let our merchants come to an understanding with each other, and there are more than enough heads to the wheels who reside on the road, to assess this and the trifle of the duties, and leave them where they receive the natives back of them, from 200 to 300 miles, such a commission as should be agreed upon, would have the desired effect. If it was necessary to make the troublesome hinderances of a few hundred dollars be it so. The commission should also be directed to extend their journey to the rich country, and if they were men of discretion, we feel satisfied in saying that the adventure would result in the happiest benefits. We hope some attention will be given to this subject. It is one worthy of the greatest consideration.

Names of officers attached to the U. S. Brig "Bainbridge"

Commander, John Manning
Lieutenants, W. H. McComb & A. Byson;
Purser, John Johnson;
Assistant Surgeon, G. H. Howell;
Acting Master, Thomas Raney;
Midshipmen, C. H. Green, and Robt. Boyod;
Captain's Clerk, John Higgins.
All well

We had not the pleasure of receiving a list of the names of the officers attached to the U. S. Brig "Porpoise;" but we learn that the officers and crew were enjoying good health.

President Roberts left in the government schooner "Lark," on the 18th. inst. for Grand Bassa. The President, while at "Buchanan" received information that Boyer of Trade Town desirous were of having an opportunity to defend himself, extended his visit to Trade Town. He remained the best part of two days in communicatin with Boyer, who seemed very desirous of regaining the favor he had lost, by his treachery and rebellion.

We learn that Grando, the Fishman, is preparing to build a town at Trade Town. Boyer does not object to his doing so, as he hopes, he will the have him under his eye, so as to get money out of him and his tribe.

Will Bucklar of Grand Colah has been seriously ill—the most fearful apprehensions were entertained, as to his recovery. He is now, however, we are glad to say, recovering. A well known tradesman who resides on the beach, has been accused of "witching" Bucklar—"the doctor says so" and he will be held guilty until the ordeal of "sassy wood" is over. The poor fellow is now a close prisoner.

The natives, in every direction, are at work on their farms—and in consequence there is but little trade going on. This will be the case for nearly two months. We are glad to know and hear that there is a probability of rice being as plentiful next season, as it has been the past. The supply of rice the past season was abundant and the price less than we remember ever to have known it to be. Our citizens, will also, add largely to the supply of next season; and they are now preparing large farms for planting

"A commercial traveller, whose business frequently called him from Orleans to Paris M. Edmund D——, was accustomed to go to an hotel with the landlord of which he was acquainted. He arrived a few days ago at the hotel where he was in the habit of staying. On Thursday evening, after supper, he invited the people of the hotel to go to his chamber to take coffee, and he promised to tell them a tale full of dramatic incident. On entering the room his guests saw on the bed, near which he seated himself, a pair of pistols. 'My story' said he 'has a sad denouement, and I require the pistols to make it clearly understood.' As he had always been accustomed, in telling his tales, to indulge in expressive pantomime, and to take up anything which lay handy calculated to add to the effect, no surprise was felt at his having prepared pistols. He began by narrating the loves of a young girl and a young man. They had in the usual manner, passed under the most solemn and irrevocable fidelities. The young man, whose profession obliged him to travel, made a long absence. While he was away, he received a legacy, and on his return, hastened to place it at her feet. But in the meantime he had left before her the learned [illegible] accordance with the wishes of her family, she had just married a wealthy merchant. The young man thereupon took [illegible] purpose. 'He purchased a pair of pistols like these,' he continued, taking one in each hand, when he assembled his friends in his chamber, and after some conversation placed one under his chin, in this way,' as I am saying in joke, that it would be a pleasure to blow out his brains. And at the same moment pulled the trigger. There was a discharge of the pistol and his head was shattered to pieces. Pieces of the bone and portions of the brain fell on the horrified spectators. The unfortunate man told his own story."

Remarkable Power of Memory

Facts compel the author to believe that the powers of the memory are only bounded by the extent of its cultivation. Of the extent of its natural capabilities, he has the highest ideas. Indeed, he regards its powers as almost infinite. Innumerable facts tending to establish this conclusion, he has witnessed and experienced. On requesting the South Boston Omnibus drivers to deliver cards in Boston, he observed that they took no memoranda, yet committed no errors though they often do a score of errands at a trip. The second time I went to Boston post office, the delivering clerk, without looking over the letters and papers, said there was none for me. I requested him to look which he did, meanwhile remarking that it was useless, but found none. And scores of times the moment he saw me, responded that there was, or nothing or nothing for me without my being able to detect a single mistake. Mr. Marston, baker, Manchester, N. H., serves about three hundred customers, two-thirds of whom take more or less every morning; he sets nothing down, till he returns home, after having visited one-half of them; yet he forgets not one loaf. A man in Halifax, N. S. can tell at once the name and age of every inhabitant in town, young and old. After delivering a lecture at Clinton Hall, on the improvement of memory, one of the audience said that a cattle drover of New York, who could neither read nor write, after having sold out large droves to different butchers; kept their numbers, prices, and every thing in his mind, and could go round months afterwards, and settle from memory, without ever having been known to forget anything. Persons who cannot read nor write have astonishing memories—several hundred per cent better than others. The reason is, in business transaction they are compelled to remember, and thus strengthen this faculty. [illegible] habitable & universal facts cannot [illegible] lief that the human mind is [illegible] and capacitated, provided the body [illegible] in the right state, & this faculty disciplined in the best manner, to recall every event of life.—Fowler on Memory.—C. Index.

MY MOTHER

How many pleasing thoughts arise with the memory of that name! If I think of my childhood's home, the lowly cot of my father, with the little dancing brook behind it, and the tall cherry tree from which spreads its branches above the now moss covered roof, the garden, the orchard, the happy family circle, still the brightest image in the picture is that of my kind mother. The sweetest reminiscences of my childhood are those of my mother's smiles—the saddest, those of her disapproval. My purest thoughts I attribute to my mother's early counsel. My holiest wishes were breathed into my soul by her hallowed teachings. In my childish years she could endure all hardships, undergo all privations, submit to the most extreme self-denial to procure my good; and in later years she has never been unmindful of every influence by which I am surrounded. If good is portended, with what fervency of spirit does she invoke the Almighty aid in its accomplishment—if omens of evil are seen, with the same vigilant care does she plead that the unhallowing influences may be averted.

My Mother! Her image is ever before me, and her kind voice always in my ear. If I am tempted to do wrong, the memory of her gentle chidings warns me of danger, and bids me beware the error. If I am despondong and sad, the fancied sounds of her voice in quiet counsel and kind approbation comes swelling on my ear, encouraging me to renewal of effort, and increased perseverence and fortitude. When my head is weary and my heart is sick with the dark scenes and the boisterous mirth and the future all looks dreary—the thought of my mother's smile, the tones of her cheerful voice, the memory of her earnest prayers tell me I still may hope, for while I have a mother's love, a mother's prayers, how can I be unblest?—Ex. Paper.

One of the alligators of the museum recently departed this life. A local of the city press, while recording an affecting obituary, remarks that, on one occasion he was observed to breathe, and soon after he was observed not to breathe, and that the 1st occurrence was the cause of his death.

A young lady who wished to 'join the war' was asked if she were willing to mount a breech. She promtly replied:

'Not only a breech, but if needs be, a pair of breeches.'

Saucky gal, that!

POETRY.

HARRY.

BY OLIVER OAKWOOD.

Where is my loved one, my beautiful boy,
 I have missed him an hour and more;
I think he is out with the children at play.
 And will presently tap at my door

Perhaps he is culling the prettiest flowers,
 To bring me to wreathe in my hair;
And has paused for a moment to list to the trill
 Of the lark floating high in the air.

Or else he is seated beneath the cool shade,
 Of the willow that stands by the stream
And marking each ripple that glides at his feet,
 While his spirit is wrapt in a dream.

Oft—oft I've seen him thus sitting alone,
 His blue eyes upturned to the sky;
He seemed like an angel waiting his wings,
 That back to his home he might fly.

I surely must seek him, he lingers so long,
 And here is his shuttle and ball;
He'll be coming to get them right quickly I think,
 Hark! there is his step in the hall.

No—'tis some other footfall that strikes on my ear,
 For his sounds like pattering rain;
I must seek him, for something has happened I fear,
 O! what can my Harry detain!

Ah! there is his laugh, but it sounds not so gay'
 What trifle has shadowed his joy?
I'll meet him, and quickly dispel the light cloud,
 That rests on my beautiful boy.

He comes not—I'm sure that I was not deceived,
 Here's his cap and his jacket of blue;
He has not gone far, he must be in the house,
 For there are his stocking and shoe!

There hearken, how lightly he taps at the door,
 My idol, O! come to my heart;
I'll open it quickly—Ah! no one is there,
 Why is it I shudder and start!

But now I remember, they told me he slept,
 And O! he will never awake.
Till the trumpet of doom sends its echoing blast,
 Earth's innermost caverns to shake!

He will not return, and his step and his laugh;
 I hear only in hours of sleep;
I wake from my dreaming and find then all false,
 And the solace I have, is to weep!

In the land of the angels were Harry now dwells,
 Where are pleasures all free from alloy;
I long for the message that calls me to meet,
 My loved one—my beautiful boy!—C. Com.

DR. BACON AT JERUSALEM

Under date of February 23, 1851, Rev. Leonard Bacon, D. D., of New Haven, addresses to his church and society, in that city, a pastoral letter from Jerusalem. The following extract, inspired by hallowed associations surrounding him, is descriptive and impressive:

"Would that I could adequately express to you the thoughts and feelings with which I look upon the places of the great historical facts recorded in the Scriptures. Many of the most interesting of these places I am yet to visit. I hope to visit, before many days are passed, the village of Nazareth, the sea of Galilee, and the plain of Gennesaret. I hope soon to see Bethlehem, where was born to us a Prince and Saviour, who is Christ the Lord. But I am permitted to date this letter from the city where our Lord was crucified. I have walked over the Mount of Olives to Bethany, where Jesus lodged in the house of Mary and Martha, and of Lazarus, whom he raised from the dead. I have stood upon the height from which he beheld the city and wept over it. I have walked around it in all once crowned with the temple in which he taught, and of which he foretold the utter and dreadful overthrow. I have seen Gethsemane, where he was in agony beneath the burthen of our redemption. I have looked upon the mountains round about Jerusalem, and the deep valleys between; and I have returned to the sight again and again, till the vernal landscape upon which he looked in the hour of his crucifixion—the same outline of hills and sky which met his eye ere the sun was darkened—has become almost as familiar to me, as the familiar view of the hills and mountains around the city of our own habitation. I need not say that this privilege, for which, under God, I am greatly indebted to your kindness, is worth all that it costs me. But I would say, that to me this privilege is far more than a mere luxury of sentimentalism. God forbid that the mere enjoyment of looking upon these places, rich as that enjoyment is, should be the only compensation to me for the long pilgrimage I have performed in coming hither, and for this protracted separation from my dearest friends, and from the work I love. Nor do I find my compensation merely in the hope that the personal inspection of these places, and a familiarity with the aspects of nature here, will aid me hereafter in illustrating the language of the Holy Scripture. I think I find higher benefit, both for myself, and for my ministry, in the intense feeling of reality which—as I look upon these places—connects itself with the great facts that are the basis of our faith and hope. As I read in the records of the Old Testament, the historical notices of Jerusalem, from the day when David took the stronghold of the Jebusites, to the day when Nehemiah, after the captivity, rebuilt the walls of the Holy City; as I read one and another of the Psalms, and then walk about Zion, remembering that as the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about them that fear him; as I read the inspired words which were uttered here by the prophets—every incident, every allusion, which has any local reference, presents itself to the mind with the most vivid exactness. I seem to behold the pomp of that ancient ritual, in which Christ, our high priest, our alter, and our sacrifice, was shadowed forth by Divine, yet inadequate symbols. I seem to hear the voices of the prophets foreteling incarnation of that Saviour, in whose work and kingdom all prophecy centres, and is consummated. I seem to catch the whispered aspirations of kings and righteous men, who, in the dim light of ages long ago, desired to see the things which we see. And when I turn from the Old Testament to the New, and read from the records what our Lord himself taught, and did and suffered within these encircling mountains upon the soil on which his steps have been accumulated the successive ruin of eighteen hundred years—I seem to see, with a more lively apprehension, 'God manifest in the flesh,' 'the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world.' I seem to trace along the Mount of Olives, and the vale of Kedron, the daily paths of him who had not where to lay his head. I see him entering the city attended by the multitude that spread their garments in his way, and cried with ignorant exultation, 'Hosanna to the son of David.' I see him as he sits with his disciples over against the temple, and foretells with minute exactness the destruction of the temple and the city, and the end of the ancient dispensation. I see him in that upper room where he kept the passover with his disciples, and breathed into their unprepared minds those sublime promises and consolations which his church in all ages has so inadequately appreciated. I see him in the garden, in the high priest's palace, in the hall of Pilate, while the watches of the night in which he was betrayed, are slowly passing. I hear the shouts of the people rejecting him and dooming him to die. I see him on the cross. I hear the wail of the women, as they gather around his lifeless body to prepare it for its burial. The stone is rolled to the door of the sepulchre. The Sabbath passes away in silence and gloom; and then comes to the amazed and incredulous disciples the stupendous fact of his resurrection. I see their dismay, their doubt, their slow reception of the fact made palpable to their senses. I see them at last returning from the mount which is called Olivet, and testifying that he who had been crucified, and had risen from the dead, is Christ the Lord, invested with all power in heaven and on earth, and that in his name, and no other, there is salvation for men.

The message, then, which I would send you from the height of Zion, from the brook of Siloe, from Gethsemane, from the city where our Lord was crucified, and from the slope whence he ascended to reign at the right hand of the Majesty on high; the message I would send you from the place where the new work of the revealing and renewing Spirit began upon the day of Pentecost, and whence the gospel went forth to bless all nations—is first of all that which was written by the Apostle to the Hebrews, 'Hold fast the profession of your faith without wavering.' You have trusted not in fables and vain traditions, but in facts. Permit yourselves to entertain no momentary doubt of the grand historic realities on which rest all our hopes for our own souls and for this wicked and miserable world. Let no trust of those facts weaken your Christian energy, or cloud your Christain hope. The story of Jesus of Nazareth, in all the grandeur of its import, and in all the fathomless and boundless mysteries which it involves, is a true story—a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation.—Sourthern Baptist.

Musical Anecdote.

In Cooke's Musical Miscellany, a work abounding with amusing anecdote and reminiscence, is the following capital story of a Highland piper:—

A Highland piper, having a scholar to teach disdained to crack his brains with the names of semibreve, minims, crotchets, and quivers.

"Here, Donald," said he, 'tak' yer pipes, lad, and gie's a blast. So, verra weel blawn indeed; but what's a sound, Donald, without sense? You may blaw for ever without making a tune o't, if I dinna tell you how the queer things on the paper maun help you. You see that big fellow, wi' a round, open face, (pointing to a semibreve, between two lines of a bar:) he moves slowly from that line to this, while ye beat ane wi' your fist and gie a long blast; if, now, ye put a leg to him ye mak' twa o'him, and he'll move twice as fast; and if ye black his face, he'll run four times faster than the fellow wi' the white face; but if, after blacking his face, ye band his knee, or tie his legs, he'll hop eight times faster than the white-faced chap that I showed you first. Now, whene'er you blaw you pipes, Donald remember this: that the tighter those fellows' legs are tied, the faster they'll run, and the quicker they're sure to dance."

Influence of the Sabbath upon Health.

1. That ideas of proper fitness for appearing at Divine worship, which are diffused through every Sabbath keeping community, carry with them that attention to cleanliness, that change of apparel, and that regard for neatness of person, which is an important and wholesome change from the habits of the week.

2. The rest the Sabbath brings for the body is another most important item. The physical machinery gets run down with the incessant and wearisome action of the week, and would soon be utterly prostrated and ruined, were it not that the Sabbath comes to the rescue. The Sabbath['s] refreshing rest restores the system, and saves the health.

3. The same is true of the mind. It needs a periodical repose as much as the body, and without it would sink and carry the body with it to ruin. The exhausted intellect reposes quietly under the shadow of the blessed Sabbath, and can go with vigor and alacrity to renewed toil after its weekly rest.

4. Mental gloom and depression by whatever means occasioned, act powerfully against the health; but the cheerful, life-giving, animating influence of an honored Sabbath tend to sweep away the clouds and darkness of the mind, and give that elasticity to the spirit which is so favorable to health.

5. All the various vices of society make destructive war upon the health; but the honored Sabbath acts with great energy and efficiency against them, and, to the extent that it represses them, and saves men from the exhaustion and diseases of sinful passions.

6. The effect of Sabbath influences is to give purity to the heart and peace to the conscience, and therefore to confer that quietness and tranquility of the mind, and that calm confidence in God, which saves it from those anxieties and excitements which are so prejudicial to health.

7. None can doubt that the overtasked energies of men in the irrational and intense desire after the leading things of the world have caused the frequent breaking down of body and mind, resulting in premature decay and disease and death; but the hallowed influences of the Sabbath tend to promote just views of the proper objects of human pursuit, to calm and moderate desire and thus save the system from those over-workings so prejudicial to it.

8. The laws of health, and man's obligation to obey them, are more clearly seen and more deeply felt when Sabbath influences enlarge the mind's views of all the great interest of this and another life.

In respect, therefore, to that single object the preservation of health, we may regard the holy Sabbath as operating with great efficiency and as producing the most important results.—Colonization Herald.

SHOOTING THE DEVIL.

The Florence correspondent of the London Times, writing under date of July 16th, relates a singular occurrence, taken from the Gazette dei Tribunali of that place, which we condense as follows:—A reckless, dissipated young man of rank, at Florence, having fallen sick, and finding himself dying, was much importuned by friars to receive the offices of religion, but steadily refused to the last; whereupon the friars threatened that the Devil should claim his body as soon as he was dead. To prevent this, the dying man called a Corsican friend to his bedside, and exacted a promise that he would watch by his side until his body was safely deposited in the tomb. The man died, and the Corsican kept watch accordingly by the side of the corpse in the convent chapel, where bodies are exposed twenty-four hours before burial. At midnight, as the clock struck twelve, a figure entered, disguised after the usual description of the Devil, with tremendous horns, a long tail, a chain girt around his body, and draped in red and black, as his Satanic Majesty should be. The Corsican had a bold heart, and he asked the Devil what he wanted. The Devil replied by an awful groan, the rattling of chains, and the outspreading of his claws to seize his prey. The Corsican, still undaunted, declared that he would not allow the body to be touched, and he warned the Devil that if he did not leave the place, he would send him back to his infernal regions faster than he came from them. To this speech the Devil replied by a scornful laugh such as Zamiel in Der Freischutz used, and with another rattle of the chains advanced to the coffin-side, on which the faithful friend produced a loaded pistol, and taking sure aim, shot the Devil through the heart, and dropped him at his feet, dead, as they say at Amsterdam, as a herring, or at Birmingham, as a door-nail.

The report of the pistol alarmed the police [illegible] a number of [illegible] in the neighborhood [illegible] to their astonishment [illegible] per place, the Corsican sitting [tran]quilly by its side, and a bleeding mass [cover]ed with red and black, with [illegible] pair of horns, and the well-known tail. An explanation was soon given, and when the Devil was stripped of his finery, he turned out to be the [illegible] [illegible] employed no doubt by the friars whose religious assistance was refused, for the purpose of giving a striking proof of the danger of dying without the consolations of the Church, and of the fate to which all impenitent sinners are exposed. The Corsican was tried and acquitted, as he showed that in the Tuscan code there is no penalty attached to shooting the Devil, and as he persisted in saying that when he fired he believed he had to deal with his Satanic Majesty, and no mortal representative. The friars of the convent declare that the whole story is a fabrication, and the minister of instruction announces that he will prosecute the Gazetta dei Tribunali for giving it [illegible].—Sunday [illegible]

New [Calculating Machine] [illegible] dinary calculating [machine] [illegible] the Austrian Court. It is the invention of a Polish Jew [illegible] [illegible] of Warsaw, and works sums in addition, subtraction, multiplication and division [illegible] not only [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] ing. It also [illegible] [illegible] extracting the square [illegible] [illegible] calculated sums [illegible] fractions. [illegible] the inventor calls Arithmetical Instrument, al[illegible] the size of an ordinary [illegible] [illegible] 18 [illegible] inches, about four inches high. The external [illegible] presents three rows of [illegible]. The first and upper row, containing 13 figures, is [illegible] the second and third, containing 7 figures each, [illegible]. The words addition, subtraction, multiplication and division are engraved on a semicircular ring to the right, and underneath is a hand, which must be pointed to which ever operation is to be performed. The figures being properly arranged, the simple turn of a handle is then given, and the operation is performed at once as if by magic. The most singular power of the instrument is, that if a question be wrongly stated—as for instance, a greater number being placed to subtract from a lesser, it detects the error, and the ringing of a small bell announces the discovery. The inventor has exhibited the powers of this wonderful calculating machine to the Queen, Prince Albert, and several others of distinction. The inventor also exhibited a machine for ascertaining by weighing the fineness of gold or silver, but this is to be submitted to [illegible] more severe tests. Both machines are, to say the least, extremely curious, and have [been] rewarded with a silver medal by the Russian Government. During the week the Directors of the Bank of England visited the machine.

DR. TROOST AND HIS SNAKES.

The death of the excentric German professor Dr Troost, of Tennessee, recently occurred. His passion for animals of the serpent tribe was well known, and we find it illustrated in this anecdote related by Sir Chas. Lyell:—

"Every thing of the serpent kind he has a particular fancy for, and he has always a number of them—that he has tamed—in his pocket or under his waistcoat. To loll back in his rocking chair, to talk about geology and pat the head of a large snake when twining itself about his neck is to him supreme felicity. Every year, in the vacation, he makes an excursion to the hills, and I was told that, upon one occasion, being taken up by the stage coach which had several members of Congress going to Washington, the learned doctor took his seat on the top with a large basket, the top of which was not over and above well secured. Near to this basket sat a Baptist preacher, on his way to a great public immersion. His reverence, awakening from a reverie he had fallen into, beheld, to his unutterable horror, two rattlesnakes raise their fearful heads out of the basket and immediately precipitated upon the driver, who almost knocked off his seat, no sooner became apprized of the character of his ophidian outside passenger, than he jumped upon the ground with the reins in his hand, and was followed instanter by the preacher. The 'insides' as soon as they learned what was going on, immediately became 'outsides,' and nobody was left but the doctor and rattlesnakes on the top. But the doctor not entering into the general alarm, quietly placed his great coat over the basket, and tied it down with his handkerchief, which when he had done, he said, 'Gentlemen, only dont let dese poor dings pite you, and dey wont hoort you."—Southern Baptist.

A FARMER'S LIFE.

"The best faculties of men must be devoted to the farmer's pursuits; the best intellect must be engaged in it, and the farmer's life must be a field wide and attractive enough for the engrossment and development of every human faculty, or error, or ignorance and thriftlessness, will not be explored, and the calling will not secure the elevated position it deserves. Happily, a rapid change is perceptible. The relative position of professional, mercantile and farming pursuits, are changing, day by day. The first are no longer sought with so much avidity, the last no longer shunned. A wise man should never encourage his children to assume the duties, vexations and hazards of precarious and unhealthy pursuits, no matter how dazzling the prospect, how brilliant the prize. There is a higher object than wealth to be gained—sound sleep and sound health; a higher object than personal distinction—a composed conscience. In times past there seems to have been a kind of infatuation among the farming community in regard to evasion of their honorable calling. Thirty years ago, a father was prone to act with his children as though he himself followed a degraded calling. He seemed to deem professional or mercantile life the only road to high respectability or social and official distinction. The Websters, the Wrights, and the Fillmores, were not retained to ennoble their own, but crowded off to illustrate and adorn some other profession. It has somewhat mended of late.

The public mind has become more sound. It bids fair to become perfectly sound. It certainly will, if man will speak the truth, and hear the truth, and practice on its precepts. The world will never regard the farmer's calling as the most honorable till it is so cherished by himself. In public estimation a pursuit is appreciated at the value placed upon it by those who follow it. Turn back, then, the tide of public sentiment among the agricultural population. The sturdy sense of many a sturdy farmer pierces the gauze delusions thrown around the fanciful and frivolous life of the towns-man. In the expression of his judgement sound he yet practically may have sought all his life to make his children the very butterflies he detests. If he would have his occupation take rank as the most respected and most dignified among men, he must not himself act as though he regarded it as a dull and stupid exercise of human powers. I know not so small a farm, so limited a garden, that may not engross a man's faculties and consume all his leisure. The time may be distant when each farmer may be a geologist, a naturalist, a chemist—but the time has already arrived when the application of science to agriculture is producing a peaceful, certain, and gigantic revolution, elevating the calling, multiplying its results, increasing its comforts, and promoting a higher civilization of the race.

"A farmer should not consider it presumption, but a duty, to gladden his home with all true, and genial, and intrinsically valuable comforts that shed a glow and attractiveness around the private home of the citizen. He can make it more inviting. There are few comforts and appliances about the home of a towns-man which countryman cannot enjoy. There are a thousand pleasures around a country residence which all the capital of a city cannot buy. A farmer surveys from his window with unalloyed delight the field now groaning by superior cultivation, under twice the crop of previous years. While he gains it, the world gains it. It is so much added to the production. But multiplied and dubious are the ways in which a townsman makes his gains; sometimes 'tis extortion. Sometimes a double value is given to the raw material, but oftener his gain is loss to another. To say the least, the townsman is sometimes exposed to the inevitable necessity of expediency and dishonor. From such necessities the farmer can, if he will, always be free.

"God made the country, man made the city!' Just so superior as God's works are to man's works just so far superior are the studies of the country to the studies of the town. If you look upon the rich and gorgeous development of nature from spring to fall, from the tiny germ to the abundant crop, with no more delight than on piles of stone, and brick, and mortar, then your life any where will be desultory, hard and dull. When he gazed upon the miracle of his frame, in awe and admiration, David exclaimed: 'I am fearfully and wonderfully made.' Yet each plant and spire of grass, each tree and fruit, each creature every form of vegetable and animal life, is a growing and living miracle, no less wonderful than the frame of man. If he studies them all as living illustrations of scientific truths, and he delights at each new discovery of the capacity and properties of a plant or an animal, and each new insight into the laws regulating its propagation and perfect growth, then, indeed, will a farmer become a philosopher and a man of science, and his life will be a ceaseless round of triumph, experiment and success. From the most trifling act, to the performance of the highest duty of a noble calling, his life will be full of delightful satisfaction. The favorite domestic animal, which he has watched and fed from a nursling, seems to lick his hand in gratitude, and almost eager to contribute to his support. Look along that avenue of stately trees, groaning beneath an abundance of delicious fruit or throwing a refreshing shade over the weary traveler. But yesterday it was a bundle of mere twigs, which he providently brought home, grasped perhaps in a single hand. It may be that wide fields around him have been transformed from the wilderness by his energy, and now blossom like the rose. No groans nor tears, no sinks of misery and crime, no squalid poverty, are witnessed in his daily walks, and in the performance of his daily duty. His mind need not be tortured with intense anxiety because struggling on the verge of commercial ruin. He runs less hazards of having his body racked with every disease to which muscle and nerve, and head and stomach, are liable. But I fear I am straying wide of my subject. I wished to show that the pursuits of a farmer may be rendered the most intensely interesting, the most noble, and the most engrossing to all the faculties, of both body and mind, of human occupations. As soon as it is made so, it will become the most profitable and thrifty also. What a farmer wills his life and profession to be, that will it prove."—

FRITZ:

OR THE CITY OF THE DECEIVED.

When the ancient city of Nuremburg, in times which were reckoned old by our fathers, stood high among German towns for manufactures, merchants, and meister-singers, the most notable and not the least properous of its burghers Fritz Fusseldorf. Fritz was regarded as chief among the wise and prudent of his native city. There were richer men in Nuremburg, but few have navigated the waters on which their lots were cast so safely, or kept the full freight of fortune, friends and character in such good condition as he, up to what in life's geography looms out as the headland of fifty.

In the course of that half century Fritz had seen some changes, and heard much noise in the world around him, though his feet had never been a league beyond the walls of Nuremburg. The Augburg Confession, the Council of Trent, the Thirty Year's War, and the Free-will Controversy, had each in turn disturbed the worships and warehouses of that old trading city. There had been displacement in its convent cells and in its senate-hall; great houses had sunk, and small ones risen, through the change of creeds and masters, but that of Fusseldorf still stood firm by a neutrality most difficult to practice in those times, in right of which its master had won his unrivalled reputation for prudence. Fritz sought for no office, and labored after no distinction; every established power found him in quiet subject, and every fallen one a friendly passer-by. Indeed, passing by on the other side had been the policy of his life when there was danger or trouble to be expected; but nobody charged him with party-zeal, personal ambibition, or unfaithfulness to any cause. Nature had done much for Fritz Fusseldorf in keeping him to his wisdom, for he was of a temper cold, calm and calculating; but fortune had done something too, in making the only son of a gaining and careful merchant, with three daughters, all married and portioned off in the lifetime of their father who died leaving Fritz well advanced in man's estate & in mercantile practice, with the fair mansion he had built hard by the church of St. Sebald, a fairer business in the Venetian trade, and the hopeful condition of a bachelor.

Fritz had kept these privileges and possessions yet entire in spite of many a bold conspiracy against his peaceful solitude among his fair neighbors (for such practices existed even in the Reformation times,) and many an eager hope among the increasing families of his numerous relations, as they read in fancy his last will and testament. There were those in Nuremburg who sincerely believed that his own judicious steering between these hostile interests was one prevailing cause of the number and steadiness of Fusseldorf's friends; as from Legilend, the maiden sister of his neighbor the goldsmith, and the most renowned needle-worker within the ramparts, who had declared her intention to embellish a noble piece of tapestry, then in progess with his picture, to his eldest brother-in-law, who found consolation under the infirmities of seventy years by investing Christmas gifts in his legacy. Fritz was universally sought after and commended. Thus keeping aloof from the snares of time and the cares of life, Fritz had applied himself steadily to business from his youth, taking little relaxation, except in observing the mistakes and follies of less prudent burghers on which no man could make wiser remarks, and in the easy outskirts of letters as they were then known in Germany.

The city of Nuremburg was accounted learned in those days; besides the corps of artizan poets known as meister-singers, it was rich in doctors of law and divinity, and had a press, yet famous with the collectors of old books for the quaint and curious folios it printed. Under favor of these opportunities the burghers cultivated taste in the fashions of their day. Some also dipped in philosophy; others read accounts of voyages and travels; but by far the most generally accomplished was Fritz Fusseldorf. He had gone a little way into all learning of his age, and his library consisted of almost fifty volumes of every current subject, from the alchemy of Albertus to the melodies of Hans Sachs— Fritz used and exhibited that treasury of knowledge prudently as became one who knew not what might be looked upon as heresy, but as his mercantile wealth and bachelor years increased, the fame of his acquirements grew also, till poets began to solicit his patronage, and poor doctors dedicated their works to the enlighted merchant. These honors Fritz at least thought merited, but he sustained them with his accustomed steadiness. The poets were patronized to the extent of giving himself little trouble and less cost, and the dedications received with some ready and well-turned compliments. Time and fortune had well rewarded his attention to their lessons—placing him in strong contrast to many an early acquaintance. He had remarked on the ruinous vanity of one, and the needless parsimony of another; on a third's imprudent match, and a fourth's ill-reared family; and thanked his good sense that he was like none of those. Yet the wise and wealthy merchant was not without aims in existence beyond the increase of his profits and the enlargement of his warehouse.

Fritz had an ambition of his own, though it was of the soft and provident sort. The vein from that point commenced with retiring from business, extended through far travels in the observation of men and manners, and closed with the authorship of a volume containing such sage remarks and maxims, as would make him the wonder of his own age, and the master of moralists to all time. After that achievement, Fritz had not quite determined on his line of march to the grave—whether it was to be enlivened by the presence of Gertrude, the goldsmith's daughter, who had learned obedience under her distinguished aunt, and whose youthful mind might be conveniently formed by his precepts, or to be magnified by the foundation of a college in Nuremburg, or be called by his name, and for ever subject to the reigning authodoxy.

By way of beginning these mighty schemes, Fritz took an early occasion to inform his friends, and through them the city, of his retiring intentions; sold out his stock in trade to one of the wealthiest and least hated Jews in Nuremburg; vested his capital in the city bank, then believed to be as strong as his imperial castle; and commenced poring over maps, in preparation for his travels.

He had been occupied all day in tracing his route from Nuremburg to the Emperor Charles' Spanish capital, though flowers had been strewn, and shepherds had danced in the streets, for it was Whitsuntide. The Franconian corn stood high and green, and the linden-trees were in full leaf round the old city's ramparts, as Fritz walked in the shade, still pondering on the distance and dangers of the journey. That was his accustomed walk down by the river just an hour before the shutting of the gates. The sun was setting, and he could hear the hum of the town grow faint behind him, while the cow-bells and the swine herds horns sounded from neighboring hamlets; but his path was usually deserted; not a wayfarer could be seen along the banks of that smooth river, except one man, who sat as if to rest on the broken wall of a long ruined hermitage. His garments were in the fashion worn by the artizans; his face was calm and thoughtful; but Fusseldorf's expectting the customary reverence to his rank was disappointed by the fixing his keen gray eye upon him as he said:—"Good evening brother. How call you yonder town that stands so far in the sunset?"

"It is the ancient and famous city of Nuremburg," replied Fritz, with a true burgher's pride; "renowned throughout Christendom for arts and letters. Whence came you, stranger, to be so near, and know it not?"

"I came from a still greater town," replied the stranger. "You are doubtless acquainted with Falsenberg—famous throughout the world for the tricks and cheats with which its inhabitants impose upon themselves."

"I never"—heard of such a town, the merchant would have said; but he recollected half way that so full a confession of ignorance did not become his learned reputation, and therefore added—"met with any traveller from that city."

"That is marvellous," said the stranger, considering that so many came this way, which is indeed the most direct. "I myself left Falsenburg in the morning, and am about to return further."

The soul of Fritz Fusseldorf was astonished. In all the books of travels he had read, from Marco Polo to Columbus; in all the maps and charts he had so lately explored, there was no mention of Falsenburg. The first impulse of his surprise prompted him to declare his utter ignorance, and request immediate information from the stranger; but his wanton prudence suggested that the particulars might be reached without that exposure.

"I had not suspected that your city was so near; but truly there is little mention of it in either map or volume," said he, familiarly seating himself beside the blunt, honest-looking traveller, who smiled as he answered: "The name of Falsenburg is unknown to those geographers. They study but the upper side of the world, and it lies on the other; yet trust me the way is direct, and not a day's journey from this ruined hermitage."

"Friend," said Fritz, much relieved on the score of his own learning, but growing more impatiently curious at every word—"you may now know that I am a free burgher; and sometime a merchant of note in yonder town. My fortune is ample, for I inherited a large business and fair possessions from my father, the profits of which I have increased by a prudent and industrious life, carefully avoiding the vanities and follies into which I saw many of my neighbors fall, and giving up my leisure to the study of letters and general wisdom till now, in the prime of days, I have retired from trade, resolving to spend some time in travel and inquiry after the ways and wonders of the world, that I may leave the results of my knowledge and experience to posterity."

"It is a noble design," said the stranger, "and well becoming a citizen of large fortune and liberal mind in this enlightened age.—Poor artizans like myself cannot aspire to such great things; but as you may not know that I am a cobbler and a poet, with a stall and sundry printed ballads in the fair city of Falsenberg, I will mention that my father left me nothing but three little sisters to maintain, which I have done, and got them all well married; that I have cobbled shoes since my thirteenth year besides composing a few songs and plays which are known to mountebanks and the frequenters of taverns; and that, with God's blessing, I expect to compose and cobble till the end of my days."

"Friend," said the merchant "I rejoice in your art, and have patronized many poets. The meister-singers of Nuremburg are doubtless known to you; but tell me something of your great town, for I am curious on such matters."

"It has," said the stranger, "ramparts, trade, and churches, a senate house, a citadel, and a place of execution, like most other towns. Armies have leagued its walks, kings have feasted in its castle. Scholars have been born, and books published there; the sun shines upon it, and the rains descend; yet whether the cause be in the air, the water, or a spell which some ancient socerer laid upon its site, our divines and doctors cannot agree, but all the inhabitants live in the practice of deceits upon themselves, and believe, beyond persuasion, in the most palpable falsehoods."

"It is strange," said Fritz. "But friend, how are they generally deceived? Is it in matters ecclesiastical or civil?"

"Every way," said the traveller. "Man and woman, noble and artisan, each prepares cheats of his own. But two things are remarkable concerning them all; first, that every man clearly understand his neighbor's mistake, and will reason freely upon it; and secondly, that he will never forgive any one who attempts to even suspect his. It is also observable that his madness augments with their years. In childhood, the greater part believe only untruths which they are told, but in early youth they begin to trust in fair-speaking fancies; and ever after, through all the disproofs of time and the teachings of experience, their faith grows stronger in one falsehood or other, which no mortal credits but themselves. One of my neighbors in Falsenberg believes the whole city to be somehow so deeply indebted to him, that when his fortune is utterly expended—and he is striving hard for that end—the burghers will feel bound to maintain both him and his family. Another imagines that the more unkind and tyrannical he may be to his children, relations, and servants, the more abundantly will they respect his old age, and cherish his gray hairs. I know one who is convinced that without his eating, drinking and sleeping, the world could not exist; a second, who believes himself born a school master to the entire universe; and a third, who expects that fame, friends, and fortune will come in search of him where he sits with his pipe and tankard. Delusions no less singular prevail among the dames of our city.—The lady of a goodly mansion close by my stall, has an inward persuasion that she saves her husband from ruin by expending fifty florins a week in keeping the house in continual tumult; while her opposite neighbor expects that a certain quantity of gay-colored silks and hungary-water will preserve her forever young. Many live in the conviction, that neither the inhabitants of the town nor the strangers who visit it ever think or talk of anything but them: and others believe that they have done the community a signal service, and merited some public reward, by living like the wives of honest burghers."

"Friend," said the merchant, "you spoke of doctors of philosophy as belonging to your town—has no treatise been written on this extraordinary madness?"

"None," said the traveller, "our philosophers have no time for the like. When they are not occupied with the categories and the predicaments, they always engage with the origin of matter and derivation of souls; besides, the learned doctors are subject to the prevalent insanity; and among many marvellous conceits I have always found them apt to fancy that words and science were the same thing, and that much talking was equivalent to proof on any subject."

"Has no judicious traveller, then, observed and reported the wonders of you town; for in all the books I have collected and partly read," said the merchant, "I cannot recollect any account of Falsenberg."

"Many travellers come thence to our outer side of the world, but they write not of these things," said the stranger; "and few descend hither, because, as I take it, the light of our hemisphere is of a nature so different from yours; that no man might endure except his eyes had been covered in the substerraneous passage."

"Friend," said Fritz beginning to suspect at once his learning and his ears, "I cannot rightly understand you. What is this lower hemisphere of which you speak?"

"The under side of the world," said the stranger, "according to that chapter in the fifth treatise of the learned Paracelsus, which declares that "the lower side of the earth hath air and clouds, sun, moon, and stars of its own; that there are there mountains and forests, rivers and seas, and men dwelling upon it, with flocks, corn, and cities, and the ancients believed the dead went thither, and called it the realm of Pluto; because in their times there were certain passages leading right through the solid earth, which had been formed by immemorial fires or great watercourses. By one of these Æneas descended as Virgil relates: so did Orpheus in search of his lost spouse; and some yet exist, great peril must be in the descent, because of the central attraction. Certain moralising men have indeed imagined that Paracelsus conveyed a fabulous meaning in this chapter, others have said that wine was stronger than wit with him when it was written; but fault and parable finders abound on both sides of the world."

"True," said Fritz; "but that region is your country, and is there one of those passages in this neighborhood leading direct to Falsenberg?"

"Undoubtedly," said the traveller. "A scholar, as I perceive you are, must know that he who first built and dwelt in this hermitage was one of the architects of that unfinished cathedral in which the nations were to pray at Cologne—a brother of the order of free and accepted masons, who, in right of his art, understood many secrets, and among the rest that ancient passage, which he either discovered or read of in the Algamist. Many a time, as I have heard them say below, the good man was making merry in tavern yonder, when the citizens here believed he was keeping Virgil."

"Come and show me the passage, friend," cried Fritz, springing from the broken wall.

"Take leisure, master burgher," replied the stranger, as he leaned lazily back; "that task is not quite so safe for me as you may think. The senate of our town some centuries ago conceived a strong fear that Falsenberg might be overrun with troublesome strangers from the upper world; and therefore, though they allowed the citizens complete toleration in the matter of going up, they made it death without the benefit of clergy to show your people the way down; and great peace they say we have had among us on account of that law."

"Friend," said the merchant, re seating himself, "I commend your prudence; but as you are a poet, and instructed beyond the vulgar, I have confided to you that besides being a rich man and a scholar, I have a strong desire to see strange customs and distant countries, in order to write my travels for the benefit of posterity; and if you will guide me to your extraordinary town, I will cheerfully pay any reasonable reward you may ask and doubt not that my discretion may be trusted."

"I agree, said the stranger, "on three conditions; first, that you will meet me in this place two hours before the next daybreak; second, that you will consent to have your eyes securely bandaged, as I cannot consent to endanger any man's sight; and third, that on your return to your own home, you will send two dozen of the best Rhenish to the Cobbers' Tavern in Nuremberg, as your guide's reward."

"It is small," thought the merchant but he added aloud: "I accept the conditions; and be assured that the wine will be the best in Germany."

"Good night then," said the stranger; "the gates of Nuremburg will be shut if you delay much longer. Remember, two hours before day-break;" and with a spring over the wall, he dashed away into the now darkening country.

There happened (and that was a rare case for those times) to be no war just then in Germany; the barriers of Nuremberg were therefore but slightly guarded, and the old watchman at the river gate considered Fritz the most liberal and enlightened of burghers, when he slipped a silver florin into his hand, with a hint that there was no necessity for strict looking up that night. The merchant had determined to see Falsenberg, though prudence suggested that some of the conditions were strange, and the travellar might be a robber. But he had never heard of robbers quoting Paracelsus; & as there was room for that and more in faith of his age, a visit to the under side of the world by the journey of a few hours, came so exactly up to his desire for achievement made-easy, that Fusseldorf would have accorded some additional dozens of wine, had his guide demanded them. His humble confidant, old Gretchen; who had kept his and his father's house for more than thirty years, was employed the greater part of the night in assisting him to select his best travelling gown, a sword, and tablets for the journey, not to speak of a flask of the best Rostock and a bundle of strong sausages, safe packed in a well concealed wallet, lest Falsenberg should afford no Christian fare. With these equipments, and an injunction to Gretchen to say he had gone to visit a relation in the country, the merchant, two hours before the breaking of the summer day, took his way through the river gate towards the ruined hermitage. There, in the still starlight, sat the stranger, on the same broken wall where he had first found him; but by his side lay a strong, coarse napkin, with which, before Fritz had finished his salutation, he proceeded to bind up his eyes so securely, that the prudent burgher congratulated himself on absolute safety, in that quarter. "And now," said he, taking him by the arm, "friend, hold fast by me, and keep your feet steady, for we are about to descend, and the path is steep. I suppose," continued the stranger, "as they advanced a few steps further, "you perceive the great declination of our way. We will soon be within the sphere of the downward forces, which hasten the progress of all bodies and will make our speed exceed that of an eagle."

Fritz had not at first perceived this astonishing declination, but he was too far judicious to manifest such dullness of apprehension; and as his guide continued to warn him of the steepness of the path, and the ever-increasing speed of their descent, both became apparent, and fear began to creep on the burgher's mind

"We are now near the end of our journey," said the stranger at length, to his great relief; "and as you are a traveller whom it would not be safe for one to acknowledge in our town, I will take the liberty of conducting you to the very door of one well known as a rich and substantial man among us. In his house you will be sure to find entertainment; but let me warn you, that of all Falsenberg he has contrived to forge the most extraordinary deceits for himself. In the first place, I have been told that he imagines certain heaps of waste paper laid up in the corner of one's house is sufficient to make him a scholar; secondly, that mere dullness of life and thought are the very ingredients of wisdon; thirdly; that money will buy of all evils, in this world and that to come. But his fourth delusion has been variously reported, for some say it consist in a belief, that all the city will obey him after his funeral, and some that it is a remarkable mistake in numbers, by which he is positive that eighteen will exactly correspond with fifty. Now, thank the stars," added his guide, giving Fritz a sort of twirl, "we are here on firm ground within the city gates; the towers and churches rise round us in the summer night: we pass by the dwellings of sleeping thousands; and yonder calls the watchman."

Fusseldorf did indeed hear the long shout of the night-guard, and knew by other sounds that he was treading a city street.

"Here friend," said the stranger, pausing in the walk, "you are now beside our eldest church, and near the house of that most deluded citizen. I go home for prudence sake, you know, and when the clock strikes, pull off the bandage and find your own way."

His words were almost lost in a run from the merchant's side, and the round of a church clock, chiming four. With the last stroke Fritz had pulled off the bandage, and found himself standing in front of his own house, hard by the old church of St. Sebald, in the good town of Nuremberg, and in the early gray of a summer morning. The native of Falsenberg was gone. Fritz never saw him after, and most people agree that the greatest sign of his wisdom was given by making no enquiry on that subject: but with him seemed to vanish Fusseldorf's projected travels, his edifying volume, and his college scheme—at least its honest burghers heard of them no more; and the goldsmith, who had lately taken to consulting Fritz on family affairs, was particularly astonished at his serious advice to bestow Gertrude in marriage on his faithful apprentice and cousin a son Heinrich. For that council both daughter and apprentice promised to pray for him as long as they lived; but although it was eventually acted upon;—neither tale nor chronicle has recorded how they kept their vow. The reputation of learning and prudence attended Fusseldorf to a good old age, though murmurs against it arose among his nearest relations when Legilend and her tapestry-frame took triumphant possession of his mansion, in the chief apartment of which was long to be seen the famous hangings on which that mistress of the needle expended fifteen years in portraying the nine worthies of Nuremberg with her husband in the van, marching to paradise under the conduct of the cardinal virtues.

From the discreet and tranquil life which Fritz continued to lead, even after his marriage, scholars have not found it easy to settle how the adventure of this tale was first published. Some say the manuscript was found among his papers; some that the story was revealed to old Gretchen in an unadvised moment, when restoring to her custody the flask of Rostock and the prepared sausages; and others are positive that the whole was related in one of the many unwritten moralities of Han Sachs the renowned poet-cooler, and hence became traditional in Nuremburg, where old men still speak proverbially of the prudent merchant and his strange travels to the City of the Deceived.—Massachusetts Ploughman.

In the Middlesex sessions, England, a man brought a suit for damages in the loss of his nose, which a young married woman bit off because he attempted to kiss her. The jury found a virdict for the woman, the foreman expressed the opinion that if any man attempted to kiss her without her consent, she had a right to bite his nose off, IF SHE TOOK A FANCY TO IT!!

'How are ye, Smith?' says Jones

Smith pretends not to know him, and replies, hesitatingly—'Sir, you have the advantage of me.'

'Yes,' retorts Jones, 'I spose so; everybody has that's got common sense.'

Smith looks unhappy.

WORK, WORK!

I have seen and heard of people who thought it beneath them to work—to employ themselves industriously to some useful labor. Beneath them to work! Why work is the great motto of life; and he who accomplishes the most by his industry is the most truly a great man. Aye, and is the most distinguished man among his fellows, too. And the man who so far forgets his duty to himself, his fellow creatures and his God—who so far forgets the great business of life as to allow his energies to stagnate in inactivity and uselessness, had better die; for, says holy writ, "He that will not work neither shall he eat." An idler is a cumberer of the ground; as weariness and curse to himself, as well as to those around him.

Beneath human beings to work. Why, what but the continued industry that brings forth the improvement that never allows men to be contented with any attainment he may have made, or any work he may have affected—what but this raises man above the brute creation, and under Providence, surrounds him with comforts, luxuries, refinements, and physical, moral and intellectual blessing? The great orator, the great poet, and the great scholar, are great working men. Their vocation is infinitely more laborious than that of any handicraftsman. And the student's life has more anxiety than that of any other man. And without the perseverance, the attention of real industry, he never can succeed. Hence, the number of mere pretenders to scholarship of those who have not the strength and industry to be real scholars, but stop half way and are mere smatterers, a shame to the professin.

Beneath human beings to work! Look in the artist's studio, the poet's garret, where the genius works with her uneffaceable signet, and then you will see industry standing by her side.

Beneath human beings to work! Why I had rather a child of mine should labor regularly, at the lowest and meanest employment, than waste its time, its body, mind and soul, in folly, idleness and uselessness. Better to wear out in a year, than to rust out in a century.

Beneath human beings to work! What but work has tilled our fields, clothed our bodies, built our houses, raised our churches, printed our books, cultivated our minds and souls? "Work out your own salvation," says the inspired apostle to the Gentiles.—Southern Baptist.

For the "Liberia Herald"

MR. HERALD:

I had the gratification of being present at the celebration of the 4th anniversary of the Fidelity Division No: 1. of G. U. O. Daughters of Temperance, on Friday 27th, ultimo. They assembled about half past three o'clock, P. M. at the Senate Chamber—where also, were gathered numerous spectators—and listened to addresses on Temperance, by Messrs H. Teage and H. W. Erskine.

The appearance of the ladies on this occasion was truly captivating, and betrayed, on their part, most exquisite taste. Whatever others may think, they presented to my view, a most imposing spectacle. From the annual report it appears that they have made a decided progress during the past year, both pecuniarily and numerically. We cordially tender to them our best wishes—may they continue to increase until the influence of their noble institution shall be felt throughout Liberia.

From several remarks made by the gentleman who spoke last, I gather the impression that there existed once a temperance society among the males of this community. It appears that once there was a general interest felt in the temperance cause. But owing to some circumstance or other, the society gradually wasted away, until it has degenerated to nonentity. Although the awful effects of intemperance are witnessed, yet the society is apparently buried in oblivion. We see establishments for the dispensation of the "fire-water," increasing. We see in them steel-hearted men, administering with unrelenting feelings, the poisonous draughts to the unweary and inexperienced. We see many promising youths wasting their time, destroying their health in pursuit of the poisonous glass.

Is there time then to lessen our efforts? Is there time then to stay the general diffusion of temperance principles? O no!—to cease to inculcate them orally and practically, to cease to lift up the voice against the use of ardent spirits, to cease to resist the powerful and detrimental influence, which the introduction into this community, of spirituous liquors, must exert on our youth. Is to lay ourselves open to the ravages of intemperance—nay is to open its flood gates, and immerse the "hopes of Liberia" in its poisonous waters.

Should men lag behind when daughters are coming forward—when their tender voices are lifted up in declamation against the poisonous bowl? Shall men relax their efforts when daughters are holding the cold water cup in their pliant hands, and pointing to the crystal stream? O let their example, which to the heart of every man should speak in tones most powerful, arouse the dormant energies of men of influence Let them come forward and exert their talents for the benefit of the rising generation, for the good of Liberia. Let fathers come forward and co-operate with the "daughters:" let them come forward and by that judgment and discretion, with which age and experience qualify them, assist in staying the current of influence which so rapidly bears many a hopeful youth to the port of destruction. Let those in manhood's prime come, and by inflexible and indefatigable exertion, resist the monster of iniquity, until he be entirely driven from these shores. And O may erring and reckless youth come and yield to the influence of example;—may they take heed to the admonition of the wise man: "Look not upon wine when it is red, when it giveth its color to cup, when it moveth itself aright; at last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder:" Proverb, xxiii, 31—32.

Monrovia, March. 1st, 1852.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, MARCH, 3rd: 1852.

We had the pleasure a few days ago to spend the best part of four days in making friendly visits to our friends on the St. Paul's. We had not the gratification of remaining from home for a longer time; but the time we were thus employed, was among the most pleasant, we remember, ever to have enjoyed. The hospitality of the gentlemen residing on the river, is truly unbounded, and is extended to visitors as a matter of duty. There is nothing mean in the reception they give you. It appeared to be a pleasure to welcome an acquaintance from "Monrovia's rocky Mount" Our time were not idly employed—we were constantly on the move, going from farm o farm—receiving excellent advice on the mode of agriculture, and imparting such information as our poor mind was capable of affording. Among the places we visited, and at which we spent hours of the most agreeable kind, were that of our old acquaintance, Sion Harris, Esqr., Caldwell—his premises indicate the true and independent farmer—the neighing of horses, the bellowing of cattle, the squealing of pigs, & the continual bah, bah, of goats & sheep, spoke more plainly than words, that there was nothing like hunger in his neighborhood. Mr. Harris has commenced agriculture on a more enlarged scale, some distance up the river, on a beautiful site he has lately purchased—he intends erecting on it a large brick house, and the materials are now being collected for the purpose. We have forgotten what his place is named. No doubt need be entertained, but that of complete success in every undertaking by friend Harris. A. Blacklege, Esqr. is well known as the most successful sugar manufacturer in Liberia He has a considerable quantity now on hand, of a very good quality, and it will favorably compare with any imported article of the kind—his molasses and syrup are spoken of as being fine. Mr. B. is about commencing to cut his present large field of cane, and from it, he expects to make several thousand pounds of sugar, and some hundreds of gallons of molasses and syrup. Mr. B. in the strict sense of the word, is in easy and independent circumstances—he lives in a large brick house, surrounded by a happy and interesting family, and from his well known good nature, it is seldom that he has not one or more visitors. We were perfectly at home, at Mr. B's. From Mr. B's. we sped our way to "Iconium," the place and residence of Allen B. Hooper, Esqr. the most systematic in farming, of all our Liberia agriculturists. Here we made our head quarters, as had been agreed on with friend Hooper—& to keep in peace with him, we had to consent to take possession of his neat comfortable house. It would be silly in us to attempt a description of Mr. H's. beautiful place—it is not yet, two years since what is now his farm, was a complete wilderness,—it was the home of the wild animals of the forest—it is now one of the handsomest places we have ever seen—it is beautifully laid off, & on landing, one passes through beds of flowers, from which a rich fragrance is inhaled. In the rear of the house, the staple articles of the country, coffee, & sugar cane are growing; and if we are permitted to judge from their luxuriant appearance, the soil must be of the very best quality. If one wishes to see a very handsome place,—beautiful nurseries of coffee & cocoa, he must visit "Iconium"—if he wishes to see well filled lots of cassada, potatoes plantains and other table vegetables, Mr. Hooper will point them out to him—and besides set him down to a plentiful table. Indeed, one may pass off a day at this beautiful place without experiencing the least weariness—what with walking over the farm, and admiring its neatness, and the quiet manner the laborers perform their seemingly agreeable task—and listening to the fund of rich information which the noble proprietor can give you of the various modes of cultivating the soil,—our readers may well believe that the day imperceptably passes away, before one is aware of it.

We spent some agreeable hours at "Pleasant View" the property of Hon. Desserline T. Harris, this is a lovely location, and it will, under the well informed mind of its enterprising proprietor, become a valuable piece of property. But a few months have passed since Mr. Harris and his estimable lady, left Monrovia to reside there, and in so short a time, much labor has been performed on the place—the residence is a neat and commodious building, by far superior to any thing we expected to find in that neighborhood Our time passed off delightfully.—It would surprise one, on visiting "Pleasant View," to notice the extensive clearing and improvement that have been made there in the course of a few months We left our kind host & amiable hostess with many regrets, that our time would not permit a more lengthened visit, and we are certain that we will not soon forget the kind hospitality of "Pleasant View."

We were obliged to decline many pressing invitations from friends and acquaintances, to call on them, as we were compelled to hasten home. Our visit to Caldwell, Kentuckey and Virginia, was short; but saw enough to authorize us in saying, that greater interest is now taken in the cultivation of the soil, than at any former period. There is an appearance of comfort about the houses, and premises of the people that a visitor will readily perceive. In fact, the people on the St. Paul's are contented and doin well. On returning, we stopped at "Mount Horeb," the property of Col. Yates, the Colonel and his amiable lady, were there with the family. We went over the place, and viewed with much delight, the manufacture of syrup, and the luxuriant growing of coffee, sugar cane, &c. The Colonel had just commenced a brick building, which will be completed, before the ending of the dry season. it will be a stately edifice, and will present a fine appearance along the river—it is on a companding hill, and from a few feet above the ground, the eye may scan over the distance o miles. After partaking of refreshments, we left the Colonel & his very delightful family, with much relactance; as with them, we were at home. We returned home in good time to enjoy a cup of tea with our "own house-hold."

We have thought much, since our excursion—and the more we think of what we witnessed, we willingly admit, that those who adopted the farming life, "have chosen the better part." There seems to be a contentment about the farmer, that is not to be witnessed, scarcely, in any one in Monrovia. If wealth is man's object, there is no surer way of finding it, than by cultivating the soil. If health is desired, let his occupation be on a farm.—If he wishes to live in peace with his neighbor, avoid the bustle and vexations of a town. In fine, if he wishes to pass through this life, with less of the troubles and perplexities, which a town or city life is heir to—go and live on a farm.

We have not had any arrivals from the United States for nearly three months. We are anxious to learn if Congress will take up the subject of Steam Packets for Liberia. That body commenced its session on the first Monday in December, and by this time must be fairly at work. We learn from letters received in November, that the friends of Liberia, had great reason to believe that a majority in Congress would favor a line of steamers, to ply regularly to Liberia; and unless other, and more pressing matters demanded the attention of the government, very little doubt was entertained, but that a bill would pass this session, authorizing the building of three steamers of large size. Should the law pass the present session, the company will purchase a steamer and send her out immediately with immigrants, frieght &c. &c.

Melancholy.—It is our painful duty to record the death of one of Liberia's most favored sons. It is seldom that we are called upon to notice the departure of one, upon whom so many expectations had been made—one who were the only surviving son of a fondfather and an affectionate mother—one who we thought, would in a few years take a prominent position in the management of the affairs of his country:—but our reflections now are of a more sad and contemplative character. Instead of being called to hear Liberia defended by a son, we are called to record his melancholy and fearful death James R. A. Wilson, of the age of 22, was the only son of Rev: Beverly R. Wilson and Mrs Affish Wilson—he came to this country with his parents when, a small lad; he had seldom been from home; and from them received a christian education. He was taught early to read God's Holy word;—and when opportunity offered, he was placed in the best schools the country afforded. The deceased had commenced the business of life—was industrious and enterprising and bid fair to be a valuable citizen. A few weeks ago, this young gentleman left home for Grand Bassa in the English brig "Arab" and it was in crossing the bar at that place that he met his death. The boat in which he was, capsized—the bar was rough, & he was drowned. His body has not been recovered. A fearful death was his, and truly heartrending was it to his parents,—a son upon whom they had lavished every kindness and affection—one whom they hoped would be their stay and comfort when they became burdened with age, a son they had just reason to look upon with pride, this son upon whom they had made great calculations; has been suddenly called from their embrace to join the spirits of another world—not only has his parents and relatives lost an affectionate son and a kind relative, but the State has lost a valuable citizen—and society one of its interesting ornaments. But a few days had elapsed since he left the home of his parents with buoyant spirits, in the enjoyment of excellent health, when the unexpected and sad intelligence reached them, that their son was no more. We are unable to describe the deep grief which took possession of this interesting and distinguished family—and indeed, the sad news, seemed to draw a silent tear from all composing the large circle of his acquaintances.—He was respected by all—and deeply is his death deplored. We feel, and deeply feel and sympathize with our afflicted friends—we have ourselves drank deeply of the cup of affliction; and while we pen these hasty lines to the memory of our young friend our heart bleeds at what we have been called to pass through. Fourteen months ago, and we were blessed with an affectionate son—in his fourteenth year he left us for another world—we had high expectations of him—but we forbear to say more.

Prince Boyer at Trade Town, has not, we learn, commenced to build his town. More than a month ago, he selected a spot for the purpose, but some of his Headmen disagreeing with him as to the location—Boyer determined on consulting a "grone Devil Man" or "Doctor." For this purpose he despatched messengers to Rock Cess to get the opinion of the great Doctor. The messengers, at our last advices had not returned; nor will the building of the town commence till they do. The great Man may find it convenient for his purpose, to detain giving his opinion for months. He will not be hurried—and all who seek him for information, must have more than an ordinary share of patience,—to say nothing about the large sums of money necessary; to propitiate the favor of the oracle, and obtain for the petitioners a favourable hearing. Boyer ought to remember that he was told by the oracle, that he would succeed in driving the Liberians before him; and he knows how greatly to the reverse was the result.

The Palm Nut, and the Kernal of the Palm nut are becoming important articles in our trade. The French Merchants are eager for them, especially the latter. Last year a German Merchant, contracted with persons here and at Grand Bassa, for some hundred thousand bushels of nuts, and kernels; and now, the French are buying them in any quantity There is a Frenchman at Cape Mount, who offers very fair prices for these articles, and no doubt he will succeed in procuring them to any amount: The French are also eager for palm oil; hitherto, the trade in oil has been confined principally to the English and Germans. Unless we are very much mistaken, these old traders will find the French their rivals.

POETRY.

THE DECK OF THE 'OUTWARD BOUND."

How seldom we dream of the mariner's grave,
  Far down by the coral strand;
How little we think of the wind and the wave,
  When all we love are on land.
The hurricane comes and the hurricane goes,
  And little heed do we take;
Though the tree may snap as the tempest blows,
  And the walls of our homestead shake,
But the northeast gale tells a different tale,
  With a voice of fearful sound,
When a loved one is under a close-reefed sail,
  On the deck of an "outward bound."

How wistfully then we look on the night,
As the threatening clouds go by—
As the wind gets up and the last faint light
  Is dying away in the sky.
How we listen and gaze with a silent lip,
  And judge by the bending tree;
How the same wild gust must toss the ship,
  And arouse the mighty sea!
Ah, sadly then do we meet the day,
  When the signs of storm are found
And pray for the loved one far away,
  On the deck of an "outward bound."

There is one that I cherished when hand in hand
  We roved o'er the lowland lea,
And thought my love for that one on the land
  Was earnest as love could be.
But now that he hath gone out on the tide,
  I find that I worship the more,
And I think of the waters deep and wide,
  As I bask on the flowers on shore.
I have watched the wind, I have watched the stars,
  And shrunk from the tempest sound;
For my heart-strings are wreath'd with the slender spars
  That carry the "outward bound."

I have slept when the zephyrs forgot to creep
  And the sky was without a frown,
But I started soon from that fretful sleep,
  With the dream I a ship going down.
I have sat in the field when the corn was in shock,
  And the reaper's hook was bright,
But my fancy conjured the breaker and rock,
  In the dead of a moonless night.
Oh! I never will measure affection again,
  While treading earth's flowery mound,
But wait till the loved one is from the main,
  On the deck of an "outward bound."—Massachusetts Ploughman.

INDOLENCE.

BY A. W. H

Indolent! indolent! yes, I am indolent,
  So is the grass growing tenderly, slowly;
  So is the violet fragant and lowly,
Drinking in quietness, peace, and content;
  So is the bird on the light branches swinging,
  Idly his carol of gratitude singing,
Only on living and living intent.

Indolent! indolent! yes I am indolent
  So is the cloud overhanging the mountain
  So is the tremulous wave of a fountain,
Uttering softly its eloquent psalm;
  Nerve and sensation in quiet reposing,
Silent as blossoms the night dew is closing,
But the full heart beating strongly and calm.

Indolent! indolent! yes I am indolent.
  If it be idle to gather my pleasure
  Out of creation's uncovered treasure,
Midnight and morning; by forest and sea;
  Wild with the tempest's sublime exultation;
  Lonely in Autumn's forlorn lamentation;
Hopeful and happy with Spring and the bee.

Indolent! indolent! are ye not indolent?
  Thralls of the earth, and its usages weary;
Toiling like gnomes where the darkness is dreary,
Toiling and sinning, to heap up your gold.
  Stifling the heavenward breath of devotion;
  Crushing the freshness of every emotion;
Hearts like the dead, that are purseless and cold.

Indolent! indolent! art thou not indolent?
  Thou who art living unlovely and lonely,
  Wrapped in a pall that will cover thee only,
Shrouded in selfishness, piteous ghost?
  Sad eyes behold thee, and angels are weeping
  Over thy forsaken and desolate sleeping;
Art thou not indolent:—Art thou not lost!—Christian Chronicle.

KINDNESS THE BEST SAFEGUARD

The following interesting incident in the wanderings of Miss Dix, the Philantropist, is related in a South Carolina paper:

"The other day, in conversation with Miss Dix, the Philanthopist, during her visit to Greenville, a lady said to her, 'Are you not afraid to travel all over the country alone, and have you not encountered dangers, and been in perilous situations?' 'I am naturally timid,' said Miss Dix, 'and diffident like all my sex; but in order to carry out my purposes, I know that it is necessary to make sacrifices and encounter dangers. It is true, I have been in my travels through the different States, in perilous situations. I will mention one which occurred in the State of Michigan. I had hired a carriage and driver to convey me some distance through an uninhabited portion of the country. In starting, I discovered that the driver, a young lad, had a pair of pistols with him. Inquiring what he was going to do with arms, he said he carried them to protect us, as he had heard that robberies had been committed on the road. I said to him, give me the pistols—I will take care of them. He did so reluctantly.

"In pursuing my journey through a dismal looking forest, a man rushed into the road, caught the horse by the bridle, and demanded my purse. I said to him, with as much self-possession as I could command 'Are you not ashamed to rob a woman? I have but little money, and that I want to defray my expenses in visiting prisons and poor-houses, and occasionally in giving to objects of charity. If 'you have been unfortunate, are in distress, and in want of money, I will give you some.' While thus speaking to him, I discovered his countenance changed, and he became deathly pale. 'My God!' he exclaimed, 'that voice!' and immediately told me that he had been in the Philadelphia penitentiary and had heard me lecturing some of the prisoners in adjoining cell, and that he now recognized my voice. He then desired me to pass on, and expressed deep sorrow at the outrage he had committed. But I drew out my purse, and said to him, 'I will give you something to support you until you can get into honest employment.' He declined at first taking anything, until I insisted on his doing so, for fear he might be tempted to rob some one else before he could get into honest employment.'

"Had not Miss Dix taken possession of the pistols, in all probability they would have been used by her driver, and perhaps both of them murdered. 'That voice' was more powerful in subduing the heart of a robber than the sight of a brace of pistols."

POLITENESS.

There are few subjects upon which more erroneous notions prevail than upon that of politeness. Paradoxical as it may seem, the opinions of the thing thus styled are of the most vulgar sort. The mass of people seem to fancy it is altogether an outward thing—a matter of form and ceremony—and that its essence lies in a punctilious observance of etiquette—in the elegant bow, the five minutes' call, the courteous & polished speech, the graceful restoration of a fan, the quick presentation of a dropped handkerchief, & other forms of exterior behavior, which may indicate a knowledge of "fashionable life," yet spring from a heart full of the intensest selfishness. But true politeness is not a thing of formality and ceremony; it consists in no artificial smiles or precise carriage of the body, but in an earnest and sincere desire to promote the happiness of those with whom one comes in contact—in a willingness to sacrifice one's own ease and comfort to the enjoyment of others. The poor woman who found Mungo Park perishing under the palm trees of Africa, and who led him to her hut, and supplied him with food, and lulled him to sleep with her simple songs, it has been justly said, was truly polite. A story is told of a poor drover, who was driving his cattle to market one day, and met a lady whom the drove compelled to turn out from the path into the deep snow. "Madam," said he, "if the cattle knew as well as I, what they should do, you would not walk in the snow." Here was genuine politeness. Such a man, though rough and awkward in his manners, course in his speech, and clad in homespun, is, in the truest sense, a gentleman; while many a finical and smirking ape, who prides himself in the immaculate purity of his white kid gloves, and the graceful air with which he enters a drawing room, or lifts his hat as he meets an acquaintance, is an incarnation of rudeness and incivility.

The truth is, mere external politeness is only the husk or shell of true politeness: it is in fact, so far as essence of the thing is concerned, to politeness at all, though with many it is the hinge upon which all other social conduct turns, while in mingling others of different temperament, they freeze, as does the wintry air in nature, the kindlier feelings of the heart, and reduce everything to smooth surface, polished but cold, like a sheet of ice. Many a man who is rough and even boorish in manners, has a warm and generous heart; and many a one, who is reckless of the comfort of others, seeks by a scrupulous observance of etiquette and ceremony, to hide his real indifference to the happiness of his fellow men. When we see a person who evinces on all occasions a delicate regard for the rights and feelings of others, however inferior in wealth, dress, or station; who betrays no anxiety to engross the best seats at the public table, in the car, or in the concert room; who at his meals, prefers to carve for others the richest slices, rather than for himself; who speaks as respectfully to a peasant as he would to a king, and is as prompt to offer his umbrella in a rain-storm to an old lady as to young one; when, in short, we see a person acting always upon the golden rule of doing unto others "whatsoever he would that they should do unto him"—then we feel that we are looking upon a TRULY POLITE man. So says and thinks the Yankee Blade.—Chr: Chornicle.

MATTER-OF FACT AGE.

The matter of fact character of the age is thus hit off by Henry Ward Beecher in one of his Lectures, and it seems indeed a true picture. A foreign writer remarked of us that we were a nation of workers and on every house in the lane, there could be seen an inscription, "No admittance except on business."

"This is an age of matter-of fact and money making. This fair earth, God's temple, has been converted into a counting-room. Glassy rivers are now only to ad big ships on—green fields are only ploughing grounds, at so much an acre—huge mountains, so many cubic feet of copper or coal—God's lightning are hired out by the hour for the transmission of telegraphic despatches, and his birds and flowers caught and caged, and exposed for sail in the market place."

While Mr. Burchard was preaching one of his hottest sermons (at the old Chatham street chapel, New York) he raised his eyes towards the door just at the moment Col. Aaron Burr entered, and exclaimed, there is the gray headed sinner, I shall appear in judgment against him. Col. Burr walked down the aisle with that bold, firm military step, so peculiarly his own, until he had reached the centre—with a low bow he addressed the minister thus:

"Mr. Preacher, I have been a lawyer in this city for near half a century, and of all the rascals it has ever been my lot to deal with, none surpass that class of criminals who turn state's evidence.'

The above may be relied on as correct.

It is often said that the most serious dissensions between married people take their rise in the most trifling and inconsiderable circumstances. A philosopher has discovered that the more refined and the better bred and educated the parties are, the more extended will be the effect of their quarrels. The same impropriety that a pair of vulgar people would settle with two smoothing-irons and a broom stick, will so estrange a gentleman and lady of refinement that nothing but a divorce can reconcile them, either to themselves or to society. Mrs. Forrest lost her husband's affections by contradicting him, as she says—an offence to Mrs. Malony that her husband would have adjusted by throwing the table at her head.

In some hot countries, to which Yankee ice is sent, it is regarded as a great luxury. A foreign journal relates that a gentleman, who had purchased some lumps of it, sent it to his cook, with orders to have it served up for dinner. The cook was at a loss to know what to do with it. But, as he had a pot of boiling water over the fire, he dropped the ice into it. At the dinner table, the master said, when the desert was ready:

'Now fetch on the ice.'

'All gone, massa.'

'Gone! where's it gone to?'

'Why, massa, me put it into de pot to boil, and when me looked for it, it wasn't there'

The poor fellow had a bottle thrown at his head for the blunder.

Sometimes medical blunders turn out well for both physician and patient, as in the case of our friend John Smith. After a convivial meeting Mr S. was sent for by a young lady who was fond of a sly glass. Upon being left alone with his fair patient, he felt her pulse, but owing to his potations, found himself quite incapable of counting it—unconsciously muttering to himself as he held her wrist: 'Drunk, very drunk.' It so alarmed the young lady, that she fell upon her knees and implored the doctor's secrecy as to her frailty.—Figaro

Mr. Curran, being retainned against a young officer, who was indicted for a very gross assault, opened the cause in the following manner:

'My lord, I am council for the crown; and I am first to acquaint your lordship, that this soldier——'

'Nay, sir,' says the military hero, 'I would have you know, sir, I am an officer!'

'O, sir, I beg your pardon,' says the counsellor, very dryly; 'why, then, my lord, to speak more correctly, this officer, who is no soldier.'

A SISTERS VALUE.

Have you a sister? Then love and cherish her with all that pure and holy friendship, which renders a brother so worthy and noble. Learn to appreciate her sweet influence, as portrayed in the following words:

He who has never known a sister's kind ministration, nor felt his heart warming beneath her endearing smile and love-beaming eye, has been unfortunate indeed. It is not to be wondered at, if the fountains of pure feeling flow in his bosom but sluggishly, or if the gentle emotions of his nature be lost in the sterner attributes of mankind.

"That man has grown up among affectionate sisters," I once heard a lady of much observation and experience remark.

"And why do you think so?" said I.

"Because of the rich development of all the tender feelings of the heart."

A sister's influence is felt even in manhood's riper years; and the heart of him who has grown cold in chilly contact with the world, will warm and thrill with pure enjoyment, as some accident awakens within him the soft tones, the glad melodies of his sister's voice; and he will turn from purposes which a warped and false philosophy had reasoned into expediency, and even weep for the gentle influences which moved him in his earlier years.—Christian Chronicle.

A BEAUTIFUL THOUGHT.—The sea is the largest of all cemeteries, and its slumberers sleep without monuments. All other graves vary, in all other lands, show some symbol of distinction between the great and small, the rich and poor; but in that ocean cemetery the king and the clown the prince and the peasant, are alike distinguished. The same waves roll over all—the same requiem by the monotony of the ocean is sung to their honor. Over their remains the same storm beats, and the same sun shines, and there, unmarked, the weak and the powerful, the plumed and the unplumed, will sleep on until awakened by the same trump when the sea shall give up its dead.—Christian Chronicle.

An instance, showing the patient quietude of our model Dun, came to our knowledge recently. A merchant on ——— street had owed a bill for some time, and had promised even more than positively, to pay it on July 5th. At eleven o'clock we happened to be in the store, and who should make his appearance but our dunning friend. The following dialogue immediately ensued:—

Dun.—Good morning, Mr. Jones. (We'll call the merchant Jones, that name being as good as the original.)

Jones.—Good morning, sir.

Dun.—I just called in, presuming that you wished to see me, sir.

Jones.—I wish to see you? no indeed!

Dun.—I thought perhaps you wished to pay something on account, sir, (showing the bill.)

Jones.—No; I ha'nt got a cent. I hav'nt sold a thing to-day.

Dun.—Well, as I'm not by any means in a hurry this morning, and the weather's hot, I think I'll just take a seat, with your permission, and remain till you sell something.

The coolness with which the proposition was made, and the seat, suiting the action to the word, was taken, confirmed us in the opinion that the Dun was no ordinary individual; and being so confirmed, we left, determined that he should find a place among

WHAT WE GIVE TO THE WORLD—WHAT THE WORLD RETURNS.

I knew a young girl once, who entered upon the journey of life without one fixed principle—without one controlling emotion, save the desire to please and be pleased. You can imagine persons where this led her? Into a maze of worldliness and deceit; into a course of action which weakened her character irreversably, and destroyed her affections, which made her selfish and vain and exacting, and at the end, instead of the golden fruit of satisfaction, left only ashes upon her lips.

Providence had placed her in a quiet station in life; but by slow degrees, by patience and watchfulness, and skilful manœuvres she worked her way into the company of the rich and gay, and tasted of their exclusive enjoyments. But as she found herself advancing step by step towards the goal of her imagination, she found that old scenes, old friends, however familiar, must be forgotten—that the two would not mingle well; that her old life blocked up the road to the other; so little by little, as she could do it she dropped the Past, and fancied she was doing it so adroitly, that none but herself perceived it. Vain belief! both those whom she was living recognized her actions and her motives, and despised or pitied her accordingly, and as this desire to please, made her very sensitive to the opinion of others, she soon knew how she was regarded, and no face adulation, or flattery could remove the secret sting from her soul;—it was the one bitter drop that turned her cup to "vanity and vexation of spirit."

Fair reader, perhaps you recognize a portrait? Do not say it is exaggerated; is there no taint of this wish to suit yourself to the great world, in your own mode of life, and do you not aspire with constantly increasing desire, after assimilation with those above you, and too often turn aside your eyes from your lowly brothers and sisters? And how are you different from them that you should set yourself above them on the great highway? You have the same common human heart, with the same feelings, passions, and affections; you cannot alter the material of that heart; all you can do is, with the help of your Maker, to subdue its sinful tendencies, and that correction would draw you nearer to the common world, instead of separating you;—draw you near with pity and with love.

But beyond all thought of sin it is so simply ridiculous to cherish and indulge this selfish pride. In your nobler moments you feel it to be so. It never takes from any one in your opinion that he stoops from the highest station, to speak kindly and meet on equal ground the poorest. No—you feel for that person in your secret soul unbounded admiration, and you wish so heartily that your moral courage equalled his; that you could speak and act independently without regard to the thousand summer friends around you; for you know that their friendship is not to be depended on; the very fear you feel lest they should detect in you some taint of vulgarity which lead them to withdraw their countenance, is your surest warrant for this; and yet you immerse your soul in slavery, simply that you may preserve your place among them. But it is possible that you can willingly bind yourselves to a set of opinions held by people, who, having gained a little gold, would fain forget the rubbish from which it was extracted, and raise up a barrier between themselves and their former associations? Think if one noble emotion actuates such a course of conduct! think if one Bible precept is mixed up with their pretensions! Did the Saviour stand aside that his garments might not touch the sinful multitude—that his smiles might fall only on the rich, the noble, the great? Ah, we all know where the sunlight of his countenance fell most freely—where his footsteps oftenest led!

But the world, ever wiser than the God who created it, has made for itself a new bible and a new creed, and every one who can buy, or borrow, or steal a ladder, is busy mounting it, towards the heaven of his own creation; and every one's eyes are cast before him, and he has no time to think of those below himself, and every stone or stumbling block is put aside in the strife to reach the goal.

And what is there so supremely good in the fruits of association with the rich and great? What does it bring that will separate you from the poor, and wretched, and outcast, in that other world beyond the grave? Unless you have given up all thought of that, unless you have diliberately resigned your hopes for that, you can take no pleasure here, that will not bring its fearful alloy. For though this heaven of the children of this world has to be sure, many beautiful and pleasing decorations, has brightness and mirth, and passing love,—it has also heart-burning, heart-strivings, and envyings, and jealousies, and oftentimes an utter weariness; and the golden bowl which holds the wine of Life, is grasped with frantic, convulsive clasp; for beyond, the grave, and the pall, outspread as well for them, as for those at the foot of the ladder, and neither the gold, nor the greatness, nor brilliancy and splendor, have power to penetrate or illume its utter darkness; neither can any bribe remove this terrible reality from the sight—or from the experience.

Oh, should we not think, really think of these things ere we make our choice of the two lives—the Savior's or the World's! Is it not better to be "acquainted with grief" here, and have the "glory revealed" hereafter, than to lay our frail, worn out, miserable bodies in the tomb, with no requiem but the bitter moan of disappointment and despair?

THE POWER TO RESIST.

"——Thou hast shown that thou hast in thee the [illegible] out of which true manhood is forged and shaped. Thou hast the power to resist."

Happy they who possess it—to whom God teaches it; for though some few seem born with perfect strength, by far the greater number need some bitter lessons ere they learn to know the measure of their weakness. With resistance to the might of temptation, as with all difficult things, "it is the first step that counts." Oh! why do we cleave to the sin, and cry with pain and passion, "I cannot give it up! I care not what the end may be; I care not for the misery it may bring; I cannot cease from it!"

It is because we have made other gods to us than One, and on the throne of our hearts. Self reigns absolutely; and the Father is put away defiantly, and our prayers, our thoughts, our love, centre round this idol, and we will not escape from its slavish debasing thraldom.

And strange it is, that while we bow before this Deity, and know that calm and peace have fled from us, that not one gleam of pure joy penetrates our souls; that we are causing sorrow to others; that morning, noon, and night, the spirit of unrest is doving up the fountain of healthful life; strange that we struggle not, that we clasp more closely the sin which is corroding our lives!

O feeble soul! say once—resolutely, imploringly—

"Our Father, who art in heaven"!

and merge your weakness in His strength.—your sinful will, in His divine one! Then, how easy it will be to give up the things which destroy your peace! For when we can say with sincerity, "Thy will—not mine," all burdens fall away, and the narrow way lies bright, and clear, and open before us.

We are indebted to Commodore Lavalette, Commander-in-chief of the U. S. Squadron, on the coast of Africa for the following useful and well-arranged information procured from Ceylon, respecting the growth of Coffee in that Island. We beg that Commodore Lavalette will accept our thanks for this, another proof of the deep interest he feels in the prosperity of this infant Republic. We recommend to our Farmers a careful perusal of this document and doubt not they will derive some benefit in regard to the culture of Coffee in this Republic.

COPY OF QUESTIONS PUT, RELATIVE TO A COFFEE PLANTATION IN CEYLON.

Q. What quantity of labor will it require to crop and manage a Plantation of 10.000 Coffee Trees? A. To take off the crop from a Plantation of 10.000 Coffee Trees, (or 10 acres, according to the usual distance at which the Trees are placed in the ground), would require about 40 or 50 Coolies; but the cropping season over the number might be reduced to 15 Coolies, in order to keep the Estate clear of weed, and pruned.

Q. What is the distance usually allowed between each Coffee Trees? A. Generally 6 feet apart; though in precipitous situations, such as the sides of hills, the distance may be reduced to 6 feet by 5 feet.

Q. Is it necessary that the Trees be periodically manured? A. This question can scarcely yet be answered in Ceylon; the experience in Coffee is insufficient to determine this matter, which time alone can shew. Coffee has been planted by Europeans only 5 or 6 years, and as yet there has been no necessity for manure—though as there is considerable difference in the strength of the soil in the different parts of the Kandian Province where the Coffee is found to thrive best, it is most probable that on some Plantations manure will hereafter have to be used.

Q. Is it advisable to prune the Trees yearly? A. Most certainly.

Q. Is it advisable to keep the Tree on one stem, or to permit a plurality of stems? A. One stem is only allowed; and the suckers are carefully removed.

Q. Does the Coffee Tree require any rich soil? A. A very rich soil is not considered the best for Coffee, and one of a medium quality generally preferred—provided the climate is good, which is as much to be considered and sought after as favorable soil.

Q. Are hills or valleys best suited for Coffee, or will they thrive best in poor land, provided there is moisture and wet? A. Undulating land is considered best; and from the nature of the Kandian Country, more easily procurable.

Q. What number of years usually is it from the seed, before the Coffee plant bears fruit? A. Three years are generally allowed for trees to come into bearing, though a small crop is generally gathered the second year after removal from the nurseries.

Q. What is the average number of pounds of Coffee a tree yields annually? A. Two pounds per tree is a fair average for trees well weeded and looked after.

Q. What is the height a Coffee Tree is allowed to attain? A. On the Plantations first formed the trees were topped at 5, 6, 7, and 8 feet; but it is ascertained that 3 feet 6 inches or 4 feet is better, and that at this height the trees yield larger crops.

Q. What is soil temperature and aspect best calculated for the production of Coffee? A. A soil which has supported a virgin forest which is felled and burned off to make way for the Coffee is always desirable in preference to one from which crops of grain, &c., may have been recently taken off. Coffee thrives very well in a light gravelly soil, but it may hereafter turn out that the richer soil will be more durable; the best temperature is found at an elevation of between 1,500 and 3,500 feet above the sea; and a north east aspect is preferred, on account of the violence of the southwest monsoon.

Q. What is the average loss calculated in planting out 1,000 Coffee Trees from the nursery? A. This will entirely depend upon the care bestowed on the removal of the plants; if they are taken from the nursery with large balls of earth attached, and the weather be well chosen, scarcely a single failure need be apprehended.

Q. What is considered a good Plantation of Coffee in Ceylon, i. e., what number of trees? A. 500.000 plants, or about 400 acres.

Q. In what state is the Coffee when gathered? A. Ripe, or of a deep red color.

Q. Are there any mills or other mechanical instruments for preparing the Coffee after the plucking for market, the price of such machine, and is it to be got in Ceylon as cheaply as in England or elsewhere? A. There is a pulping machine for removing the outside cover from off the berry, after which operation it is soaked in water for 26 hours, and then well dried in the sun; when the parchment skin is then removed by means of a large wooden wheel shod with sheet copper, and made to revolve in a circular wooden trough; it then passes through a winnowing machine, which separates the parchment skin from the merchantable berry; if water be obtainable in sufficient quantity (which is generally the case in the hills), it is used to turn a water wheel of sufficient power to work the above-mentioned machines. The pulping and winnowing machines are procured from Home, and the total cost of a complete set of works for an estate of 200 acres is generally reckoned at £1.000 or £1 200 which includes buildings.

Q. Is it the practice in Ceylon in making holes for a Coffee Plantation to sow the seed, or to have young plants from the nurseries for that purpose, and what is the best age to transplant the seedling? A. To form extensive nurseries sufficient for the quantity of land intended to be placed under cultivation, the plants will be ready for transplanting in about nine months.

Q. What is the average state of the thermometer in Kandy in the Coffee districts, more particularly when the Coffee ripens? A. The average in the Coffee districts may be stated as at 6 a.m. 68 deg., 12 a.m. 75 deg., and 6 p.m. 70 degrees.

Q. Does the Coffee Tree require irrigation at any time of the year in Ceylon? A. No—the quantity of rain that falls on hills is quite sufficient.

Q. What are the best months for transplanting Coffee Trees, or may they be put out during moist weather generally? A. The planting season is from June until the end of Oct.; the other months are dry, or at any rate the rains are too uncertain to risk putting out plants save as above.

Q. Is it always the practice to keep the Coffee plants very clean, and free from weeds and other trees? A. Yes.

Q. How many months is Coffee coming to perfection? A. It will be in full bearing in the forth year from the time of sowing the seed and the quality of the Coffee is found to improve with the age of the trees; a small crop may be expected the second year after planting.

Q. What is the calculated profits of return of a good Coffee Plantation, say 20,000 trees? A. This depends upon the superintendence, if well looked after and attention paid. The estate, say 200 acres, ought to clear itself on the fourth year, at all events on the fifth; it has been done on the third year, and when in full bearing should yield at least from 3 000 to 3 300 wt. of clear Coffee.

Q. How long will the Coffee tree profitably bear fruit before it requires to be renewed; in which case is the old tree converted to any useful purpose, and to what? A. It is impossible to answer this question for the same reason as stated in answer No 3. viz: that the cultivation of Coffee in Ceylon is of much too recent a date, and that time alone can determine this matter.*

Q. Is the Coffee tree found in an indigenous state in the Kandy or Ceylon forests, or has it been introduced from other countries? A. The Coffee is not indigenous to Ceylon, but was most likely introduced from the continent of India.

Q. What is the probable expense of labour in curing a cwt. of Coffee for market? A. It depends upon the expense of the machinery, some have larger works than others; it may be put down at 1s. to 1s. 6d. per cwt.

Q. What necessary apparatus is requisite to prepare Coffee for use after being plucked, and at what cost? A. For an enumeration of the apparatus required, see answer to questions No. 15.

*There are a vast number of native trees which were supposed to be planted in the Dutch time and the branches are constantly loaded with fruit; therefore it may be presumed, that a tree will give fruit for many years; and should the trees cease to bear, the stem and roots might be grubbed up, and passed off for Coffee amongst the late sex.

Colombo, 18th Feb., 1843.

A STORY WITH A MORAL.—When Charles the Second chartered the Royal Society, it is notorious of him that he was disposed to give the philosophers a royal, but at the same time a wholesome lecture:

"Way so it, my lords and gentlemen," said he, "that if you fill a vessel with water to the very brim, so that it will not hold a single drop more, yet, putting a turbot into the water, it shall not overflow the vessel?" Many were the sagacious conjectures; that the fish would drink as much water as compensated for his own bulk—that he condensed the water to that amount—that the air-bladder had something to do with the phenomena—and a hundred others, which were propounded and abandoned, in their turn, much to the amusement of the merry monarch. At length Mr. Wren, (afterward Sir Christopher) modestly asked, "But is your majesty sure that such would be the case?" "Aye, there," exclaimed his majesty, laughing, "you have it; always, gentlemen, find out if a thing be true before you proceed to account for it; then I shall not be ashamed of the charter I have given you."

DISASTROUS FIRE!!

Destruction of the Library of Congress

It is with pain that we announce the fact of the destruction of the invaluable Library of Congress by fire yesterday morning. How the fire originated no one knows, but when discovered early on the morning of Wednesday, the flames had made such headway, as to make it impossible to preserve even a portion of the treasures which the Library contained. For a long time serious apprehensions for the safety of the entire Capitol were entertained, for had the flames communicated to the cupola, the whole building would have been consumed.

As it is, the Library has been entirely destroyed—and the damage to the walls cannot yet be ascertained. The extent of the loss, inflicted by this disastrous fire, it is impossible to even estimate. Since the act of Omar, no single fire has wrought such destruction of articles, impossible to be replaced. The cost of the books is estimated at about a quarter of a million of dollars—the damage to the building must also be considerable—but the great loss is in the destruction of the collection of rare and valuable works—MSS. and others—works which no expenditure of money, no toil, or energy, can possibly again restore. Such a loss may well be regarded in the light of a general calamity—and the labors of the student, the researches of the writer and the verification of facts by the politician, will all be retarded and prevented henceforth, by this sweeping destruction of the authorities, which could alone be found in that collection.

The loss is not a local but a general one—and over this funeral pyre of so much learning, every educated man and the country will mourn. There are some things which cannot be replaced, nor substitutes found, and emphatically such were the collections which had accumulated in that Library since its foundation.

Whether the calamity originated in accident or design is impossible yet to say—but in either case, the offence is almost unpardonable.

The damage to the wood and stone can easily be repaired—but for the lost books, like those of the Sybil, there can be no restoration.

THE USE OF TEARS.

BY LORD MORPETH.

Be not thy tears too harshly chid;
Repine not at the rising sigh;
Who, if they might, would always bid
The breast be still, the cheek be dry?
How little of ourselves we know,
Before a grief the heart has felt;
The lessons that we learn of wo
May brace the mind as well as melt.
The energies too stern for mirth,
The reach of thought, the strength of will,
'Mid cloud and tempest have their birth,
Through blight and blast their course fulfil.
Love's perfect triumph never crown'd
The hope uncheckered by a pang;
The gaudiest wreaths with thorns are bound,
And Sappho wept before she sang.
Tears at each pure emotion flow;
They wait on pity's gentle claim,
On admiration's fervid glow,
On piety's seraphic flame.
'Tis only when it mourns and fears,
The loaded spirit feels forgiven
And through the mist of falling tears,
We catch the clearest glimpse of heaven.

UTOPIA

There is everywhere to be found a class of persons who are ready to sneer at every scheme which enlightend philosophy conceives for the melioration of abuses, and to pronounce such undertakings visionry, chimerical, Utopian. If these sagacious individuals are to be believed the land of Utopia must be only another name for Paradise, from whence all good influences go forth to humanize and purify the world. Not an enterprise of benevolence, of religion of temperance, is set on foot, but, it is forthwith pronounced Utopian; every new and important invention or discovery in art or science, when first announced, is derided as the conciet of a visionary or demented person. This sneering faculty is regarded by its possessors as a mark of clear common sense, and a familiar knowledge of "the world;" whereas, it only betrays a narrow understanding, or a blunted moral sense. It is not unusual to hear persons of limited capabilities, natural an acquired, attempt to throw ridicule upon enterprises of benevolence in which the greatest minds and noblest hearts in Christendom are engaged. Such persons are little aware that they oftener bring themselves into contempt, than a good cause into ridicule.

A SEA-SICK COCKNEY.

Thackeray, through the mouth of one of his heroes, thus amusingly depicts the sensation of sea-sickness:—"Gentle reader," says Chawls, "av you ever been on the otion!—the sea, the sea, the hopen sea!" as Barry Cromwell says. As we entered our little wessel, and I'd looked to masters luggitch and mine (mine was wrapped up in a very small handkercher) as soon as I saw the waives, black and frothy like fresh drawn porter, a dashin egainst the ribbs of our gallant bark, the keal like a wedge, splittin the billoes in two, the sails flaffin in the air, the standard of Henland floating at the mast-head, the steward a gettin ready the basin and things, the capt. proudly tredding the deck & giving orders to the sailors, the white rox of Albany, and the Bathin macheens disappearing in the distans—then then I felt for the first time, the madgistry of existence. "Yellaw-plash, my boy," said I in a dialog with myself, "your life is now about to commens—your carear, as a man, dates from you entrans on this packet."

Here, I reckolect, I was ableeged to stop. A fealing, in the fust place singular, in the next place paneful, and at last completely overpowering, had come upon me while I was making for abuff speach, and now I found myself in a sitvoation which Delixy for Bids me to describe. Suffis to say, that I discovered what basins were madfor—that for many, many hours, I lay in hagony of exotion, dead to all intence and purposes, the rain patterin in my face, the salers a trampling over my body—the panes of purgatory going on inside."

An Act to encourage the cultivation of Cotton.

Whereas it is deemed expedient and proper that the Government should, by every means in its power, encourage the growing spirit of agriculture every where manifesting itself in this Republic; and especially to encourage the cultivation of some staple article of produce for exportation:—And whereas, it is fully demonstrated, by actual experiment, that native Cotton can be successfully cultivated, and if attended to, would greatly increase the commercial interests of this Republic—therefore.

It is Enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia in Legislature Assembled:—

Section 1st. That any person or persons, Citizens of Liberia, who shall raise or cause to be raised, in either or any of the counties of the same, upon his or their own lands the best crop of cotton in quantities herein after specified, shall receive from the Government annually, for each successive crop, during the ensuing five years the following premium or premiums—To Wit:—

For the best crop of cotton raised on a quarter of an acre of land, in each county aforesaid, will be granted as a premium to the successful cultivator the sum of five dollars;—for the best crop of one acre ten dollars;—for the best crop of two acres twenty dollars;—for the best crop of three acres thirty dollars;—for the best crop of four acres forty dollars;—for the best crop of five acres fifty dollars. Any person or persons as aforesaid having planted either of the above quantities of land in cotton, and intending to apply for the premium thereon, shall produce, to the General Superintendant of the county in which said crop of cotton is planted, at least one month before the time of gathering in the same, a certificate, by him or them signed, declaring the number of acres or parts of an acre under cultivation by him or them, and of his or their intention to compete for the premium or premiums above mentioned.

Section 2nd:—There shall be appointed, in each county of this Republic, a Committee of three persons, to be selected as follows—the General Superintendent of said county shall name one of said committee, the cotton planters, by a majority of votes, shall name the second, and the two thus chosen shall name the third. It shall be the duty of the committee thus chosen, carefully to inspect the crops of cotton, in their respective counties, when the same shall have come to perfection; and report to the Secretary of the Treasury fully and minutely in regard to the following—viz; (1) of the surface of the land; (2) the character of the soil; (3) the arrangement of the field, mode of cultivation—whether planted in rows or hills, and the distance of the stalks apart; (4) the average size of stalks and number of bolls on a stalk; (5) the quality, as to texture and staple, of the cotton, and the probable quantity in each feild; (6) the whole number of acres of land actually under cotton cultivation.

It shall be the further duty of said committee, after they shall have inspected the several fields of cotton, in the county, to grant to the owner of the best crop of cotton upon the several plots of land above named, a certificate signifying the same; which certificate, on presentation to the Secretary of the Treasuery, will entitle the holder to the premium arising thereon, as specified in the first Section of this Act, and which shall be paid to him from the Public Treasury by order from the President. If in any case the committee shall find it dificult, or shall be unable, to arrive at a satisfactory decision as to the superiority of any two or more crops, all being equally good in quality &c; then, and in that case the largest crop of cotton over half an acre, and under an acre and over an acre and under two acres, &c &c. shall be preferred.

Section 3rd: As a further inducement to small cotton planters, the President is hereby authorized and requested to appoint, in each of the counties of this Republic, an agent with powers and instructions, to purchase, at fair prices any quantities of cotton however small, raised in the Republic, and ship the same to some foreign market to be sold for account of the Government. The President is further requested to solicit from any foreign company, association, or society that may be disposed to aid the people of Liberia in making experiments in the cultivation and growth of cotton—The President is also requested to encourage, as far as in his power, any connection between the citizens of this Republic and any foreign company, association, or society, which, in his opinion, would tend to the advancement of cotton culture in this Republic.

J. J. ROBERTS,

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, MARCH, 22nd: 1852.

Buchanan, March 4th. 1852.

Sir:—I fear there is some mischief going on at Tradetown; and that your anticipations of a speedy adjustment of affairs with Boyer will not be realized. William, whom Jim Flaw sent up to this place, a day or two ago informed me that soon after you left Tradetown, Her Majesty's Brig "Spy," with Mr Consul Hanson on board, arrived there, and remained in company with the the Eng. barque "Venus," Odgers, a couple of days;—that Jim Flaw was invited on board both these vessels; when he visited, and was told that it was desirable to see him and Boyer together—meanwhile a boat was sent ashore for Boyer. Flaw having remained nearly a day, left for home, soon afterwards Boyer went on board the "Spy."

William, whom you know, is Flaw's right hand man, tells me that he was not permitted to accompany Flaw on board; but Flaw informed him that Mr. Hanson and the Captain told him (Flaw) that they had come to inquire into the cause of difficulty between Boyer and the Government. William says farther that they obtained from Boyer an instrument signed by him, disavowing the jurisdiction of this Government over the Tradetown country. If all this be true, it is to say, the least of it, a dangerous, and to my mind, a culpable interference on the part of those officials, with the affairs of this Government—and Heaven only knows what is to be the result of it. I am persuaded, sir, that this interference with Boyer, portends no good; I have, therefore, taken the liberty to communicate to you the above facts without delay. That Boyer received any express encouragement to continue his resistance to the authority of the Government, I have not been able to learn.

I have the honor to be
&c. &c. &c
Your obt. servt. B.

His Excellency.
President ROBERTS.
&c, &c. &c.

Edina, March. 16th, 1852.

Dear Sir.

Great excitement prevails here, created by intelligence just received that Boyer and Grando are making extensive preparations for another attack upon our settlements in this county. It is rumored, and there seems but little doubt of the fact, that they have engaged a large number of mercenaries from the interior, now collecting in New Cess and Tradetown; and that the several settlements are to be attacked simultaneously by the savage horde. I can give you no idea of the alarming apprehensions of our citizens. Colonel Washington is about despatching a courier to Monrovia with despatches to inform the President of our perilous situation, and to ask supplies of men and ammunition:—by this conveyance I send you these hasty lines.

For a week or two past rumors have been circulating here that Boyer and Grando were contemplating a renewal of hostilities—these rumors, however, were but little heeded, as it was known that Boyer had made overtures to the Government, and was suing for pardon, and that negotiation had been opened with him to this end. But there appears now no doubt of his infidelity; and that he is hatching some mischief against us. What has produced this sudden change, and encouraged him to new acts of insubordination and rebellion is shrouded in some mystery. It is known here that Mr. Hanson, the British Consul, visited Tradetown, in one of Her Majesty's vessels' of war, soon after President Roberts was there negotiating with Boyer,—and that he (Mr. H.) had an interview with Boyer on board the vessel, and caused him to sign, it is said, a paper denying the right of this Government to exercise sovereignty over the Tradetown District. There is good reason to believe that Boyer and Grando have been emboldened by this visit (even admitting they received no direct encouragement, this friendly natives assert, Boyer says he did)—to the stand they have taken, and the demonstrations they are now making. I must say, I think the visit of Mr. Hanson to Tradetown at the time very importune, and, if true that he caused Boyer to sign, or even received from him, a document denying the jurisdiction of this Government, cannot be considered in any other light, but an improper interference in our public affairs—and such as should be protested against; and I hope the Government will not fail to do its duty in this respect. I write in haste.

Yours truly,
D. S.

We have inserted the above extracts, that our readers may learn the sad fate which the enemies of this Republic are now assiduously and adroitly preparing for it. a fate, which, if the interference the extract reveals, is not speedily arrested by a repressing hand from abroad, is as certain, as that the budding spring precedes the summer! We have neither time nor inclination at present, to talk of the propriety or impropriety on the score either of comity, or of the law which regulates national intercourse, of the interferrence alluded to. Nor is it needful that we shall do so. The character of the interference is too obvious to require note or illustration. A brief history of the state of affairs, past and present, is all that is necessary. In 1849, Boyer, the acknowledged Chief of Trade Town, ceded for a well defined and understood consideration, the sovereignty of the whole, and proprietory right of a part of his country to this government. An Englishman Mr. William Lawrence, then a resident at Trade Town, witnessed the deed of Transfer. This deed states that Lawrence & Murray had purchased the right to a site for factories. This was well understood at the time—it has never been denied, nor is there a disposition to deny it now. Mr. Lawrence was required to conform to laws which bear equally upon him and upon citizens of Liberia. Lawrence complained, but submitted and conformed. The natives took up Lawrence's complaints, and said, that in consequence of Lawrence having to pay duties to the Liberian Government, he did not give them as much as he otherwise would. Boyer with this complaint in his mouth, rebelled; put himself in an attitude of defiance of the government—joined another Rebel, Grando, in an attack upon Bassa Cove. fortified his town, and with a force of, from seven hundred to a thousand men, stood a seige by the Liberian forces, at a cost of a number of lives, and a considerable outlay of money. He was however beaten and forced to retire. Subsequently he sued for peace offered to pay the cost of the war, as far as he was able—to exert himself to conquer the chief rebel Grando, on condition that he should be allowed to rebuild his town, and occupy his former position, which was that of Chief among his countrymen. These concessions, and proposals was forwarded to the Government, in a letter written for Boyer, by Captain Odgers, of the British barque Venus. It is proper to state here, that the evidence is at hand, putting it beyond all doubt, that Lawrence prompted Boyer to the resistance alluded to—that he furnished him with munitions of war, and promised that he should have further supplies when he should need them—that he endeavored to excite other Chiefs to join Boyer—promising to aid them in all necessary measures and instructions, how to carry on the war. The war, however, was concluded—peace restored, and the natives on every side were sending in expressions of friendship. Even the rebels were tendering expressions of desire of pardon and of permission to return, with assurances that hereafter they would demean themselves peaceably and obediently to the law. The hope was universally entertained that a permanent peace was at length restored—that the sad effects of the bloody and expensive outbreak would soon disappear, that law and order were once more triumphant, and that trade and agriculture would not only again flourish, but receive a new impetus.

Boyer's predatory letter is dated on board the British barque Venus, January 2nd. On the 27 ult. Mr. Hanson, the British Consul, left this place in H. B. M. Brig Spy. He proceeded to Trade Town. He there recieved a visit from Boyer. On the 18th inst. H. B. M. Sloop Crane, arrived here. The Commander J. J. McDonnell, Esqr. sent, under cover to His Excellency, a proclamation, directed "To all to whom this may or doth concern:" stating that "the right of the Government of Liberia to exercise sovereignty over the Trade Town Country, having been disputed by the native Chiefs;" and on this disputing, the Commander founds a protest in the proclamation alluded to, "against any arrest or molestation whatever, of Mr. Lawrence." It is of importance to bear in mind, that Lawrence stands indicted for misdemeanor, in stirring up rebellion at New Cess—a territory respecting our claim to which, no objection has been set up, nor can be. Up to the date of Mr. Hanson's visit to Trade Town and his interview with Boyer, the country was quiet, and confidence was on all sides rapidly gaining strength. Mr. Hanson was at Trade Town on the 18th ult. To day, the 20th, March, the Govt. received dispatches from Bassa, containing the sad intelligence that the whole country is in a state of excitement—that a combination more extensive, and more formidable than that we have just destroyed and put down, is formed against the settlements—that an attack on Bassa Cove is hourly expected, and earnestly calling for aid from this place, in ammunition and men. We have preferred to state facts, so that if those concerned in them can successfully controvert them, they may have an opportunity to do so.

From these facts combined and connected, but one conclusion can be drawn—and that is, there has been interference. We have written often of improper interference by foreigners—of attempts either directly, or by pursuading the natives to repudiate treaties they have made with us. This may be done by what an English lawyer would call overt acts' or covertly by moving in the line of native prejudices, and operating upon native cupidity. Hitherto these attempts to excite insubordination and resistance of law—to cut the throats of women and children, as at Bassa Cove, have proceeded from humble quarters. This last, clearly inferrible from the series of facts and circumstances detailed above, comes from a higher ground. It is therefore more to be regretted, more to be feared; and were it not for the confidence we still retain in the justice and humanity of the British Government, we should at once abandon ourself to the blackest despair. If this conduct of British officers should be justified by their government—the highest wish of the most malignant enemy of this Republic and of Africa, will be realized—the hopes of their friends blasted forever. In that case, Liberia is no more. Our last refuge prostrated in the dust; and that sun which it was hoped, would so ten this arid soil & impregnate it with the seeds of science, morality and religion, extinguished in a starless night, just as it sent forth its first recovering and vivifying beams! For where on earth can we expect to find a home from which the circumstances that gave rise to this interference can be wholly excluded? Were there no commerce upon our coast, there would be no complaint, no exciting of the natives to cut our throats. Should we break up here, and remove to any other part of the coast, the probability is, there would be some little trade there. If foreigners should come to trade with us, we might suppose as in the present case, regulations necessary. If among those visitors for trade, there should be Englishmen, it is not to be supposed they would submit to regulations there, against which they have so violently and determinedly arrayed themselves here. Should we have there, as we have evidence here, that an Englishman, influenced by a desire to get a few more gallons of oil had excited the natives to sack our villages, & to cut the throats of our women and children, and we had indicted him for the same, an English officer would have the same right there as here, to take the felon under his protection and to menace us from his ship, bristling with guns, touch him at your peril. The proof is at hand, that both Trade Town and New Cess belong to us, and that Lawrence did excite the natives to rebel, and did furnish them with ammunition. We hope therefore he will be arrested, and submitted to an impartial trial, and if guilty condemned and punished. And if he should be vested from our hands, we think the government could not acquit itself more honorably than, looking in the face of its oppressor, to say respectfully, we defer to superior strength—we yield because you are the stronger. We repeat however, we do not believe the British Government will sanction this conduct on the part of its officers on this coast.—The British Government must know that poor and weak as we are—a poverty and weakness, not the consequences of any fault of ours, but attaching unavoidably to the circumstances under which philanthropy and religion planted us, we cannot long maintain our ground against the whole weight of the country, urged upon us by emisaries from abroad. And when we recollect that our cause is the cause of humanity, morality and religion—that with our growth, will be the growth of these paramount interests—that if we fall, they fall with us, we repeat we do not, we will not believe magnanimous Britian will sanction a conduct growing out of so sordid interests, and aiming to accomplish so selfish purposes as the interference alluded to—nor that, that government will descend to protect a man who has cut our throats, attempted to arrest the progress of civilization and christianity, simply because the parties on one side are savages and heathens, and on the other weak and dependent.

NOTICE

Is hereby given to all, each, and every Guardian, Owner, and Trustee of lots within the Corporation of the town of Monrovia, which are now lying open, to commons, not enclosed, and growing up with noxious weeds &c. It is required that said lots be cleared according to law, (vide "Acts of the Town Corporation, Art. 2nd. A THOUGHTFUL CHARACTER.—Accustom a child, as soon as it can speak, to narrate his little experiences, his chapter of accidents, his griefs, his fears, his hopes; to communicate what he has noticed in the world without, and what he feels struggling in the world within. Anxious to have something to narrate he will be induced to give attention to objects around him, and what is passing in the sphere of his instruction: and to observe and note events will become one of his first pleasures. This is the ground work of a thoughtful character.

POETRY.

EARTH'S SUNNY SPOTS.

What though we wander in a maze,
Bestrewed with many a throne;
What though across the stream o time
Our bark be rudely borne;
What though we number weary hours,
When life appears a blot;
Still may we find to cheer our hearts
There's many a sunny spot.

Though on the present, with its cares,
No light is seen to fall.
And o'er the page of future years,
Despair has spread her pall;
Yet early days of childhood's mirth,
What heart remembers not?
When hope's bright dreams made all so fair,
Earth seemed one sunny spot.

The heedless foot may press the flowers,
And oders from them bring;
Thus oft, in sorrow s deepest night
Faith's sweetest blossoms spring.
If thou hast dried the widow's tear,
Pitied the orphan's lot,
Then hast thou felt, amid the gloom,
There was a sunny spot.

If to the humble couch of pain,
Aid thou hast kindly brought,
And poured upon a wounded heart,
The balm it vainly sought:
If thou in prayer hast meekly bent.
Within the lowly cot;
Then thou hast in life's desert proved
Thyself a sunny spot.

Then, what though down the stream of time
Thy bark be rudely driven,
Thy Pilot's hand is ever near.
To guide thee safe to heaven.
In Jesus trusting, thou shalt find—
Then, every care forgot,
Thou calmly restest, free from fears—
The grave a sunny spot.

CHIDE MILDLY THE ERRING.

BY CAPT. G W. PATTEN.

Chide mildly the erring!
Kind language endears;
Grief follows the sinful
And not to heir tears.
Avoid with re rouches
Fresh pain to bestow;
The heart which is stricken
Needs never a blow

Chide mildly the erring!
Jeer not at their fall;
If strength were but human,
How weakly were all!
What marvel that footsteps
Should wander astray,
When tempests so shadow
Life's wearisome way!

Chide mildly the erring!
Entreat them with care;
Their natures are mortal,
They need not despair;
We all have some frailty,
We all are unwise;
And the grace which redeems us
Must shine from the skies

THE DYING WIFE TO HER HUSBAND.

The following most touching fragment of a Letter From a Dying Wife to her Husband, was found by him some months after her death, between the leaves of a religious volume which she literally dim with tear marks, was written long before the husband was aware that the grasp of a fatal disease had fastened upon the lovely form of his wife, who died at the early age of nineteen:

"When this shall reach your eye, dear G——, some day when you are turning over the relics of the past, I shall have passed away forever, and the cold white stone will be keeping its lonely watch over the lips you have so often pressed, and the sod will be growing green that shall hide forever from your sight the dust of one who has so often nestled close to your warm heart. For many long and sleepless nights, when all beside my thoughts were at rest, I have wrestled with the consciousness of approaching death, until at last it has forced itself upon my mind; and although to you and to others it might now seem but the nervous imaginings of a girl, yet, dear G—— it is so! Many weary hours have I passed in the endeavor to reconcile myself to leaving you, whom I love so well, and this bright world of sunshine and beauty; and hard indeed is it to struggle on silently and alone, with the sure conviction that I am about to leave all forever, and go down alone in to the dark valley! 'But I know in whom I have trusted,' and leaning upon His arm I fear no evil.' Don't blame me for keeping even all this from you. How could I subject you, of all others, to such sorrow as I feel at parting, when time will so soon make it apparent to you? I could have wished to live, if only to be at your side when your time shall come, and pillowing your head upon my breast, wipe the death damps from your brow, and usher your departing spirit into its Maker's presence, embalmed in woman's holiest prayer. But it is not to be so—and I submit. Yours is the privilege of watching, through long and dreary nights, for the spirit's final flight and of transferring my sinking head from your breast to my Saviour's bosom! And you shall share my last thought; the last faint pressure of the hand, and the last feeble kiss, shall be yours; and even when flesh and heart shall have failed me, my eye shall rest on yours until glazed by death, and our spirits shall hold one last fond communion, until gently faded from my view—the last of earth—you shall mingle with the first bright glimpses of the unfading glories of that better world where partings are unknown. Well do I know the spot, dear G——, where you will lay me; often have we stood by the place, and as we watched the mellow sunset as it glanced in quivering dashes through the leaves, and burnished gold, each perhaps has thought that some day one of us would come alone, and which ever it might be, your name would be on the stone. But we loved the spot; and I know you'll love it none the less when you see the same quiet sunlight linger and play among the grass that grows over your Mary's grave I know that you'll go often alone there, when I am laid there, and my spirit will be with you there, and whisper among the waving branches. 'I am not lost, but gone before!"

A SHORT STORY.

When Mary and I were married we were young and foolish, for we had nothing to be married with, but Mary was delicate and I thought I could take care of her best. I knew I had a strong arm and brave heart to depend upon.

We rented a chamber and went to house keeping. We got together a little furniture—a table, bedstead, dishes, but our money failed us before we brought the chairs. I told Mary she must turn up a tub, for I could not run in debt No, no It was not long before our rich neighbor Mrs. M found us out, and kindly enough she supplied us with half a dozen chairs added to our store. They were old to be sure, but answered for just as well for us. I shall never forget the new face those chairs put upon our snug quarters—they never looked just right before. The tables have turned with Mrs M. and me. "Now she has become a poor widow, "but she shall never want while I have anything, never!" cried the old man with a beaming face, I shall never forget those ol chairs"

Ah, now the secret was out! It was the interest of the old chairs which maintained the poor widow. She was living on the interest and compound interest of a little friendly act done years before, and it sufficed for herself and daughter.

How beautiful it is to see how God blesses the operation of his great moral law, "love thy neighbor;" and we should oftener see it, could we look into the hidden paths of life, and find that it is not self-interest, nor riches, nor fame, that binds heart to heart. The simple power of a friendly act can do more than they. It is these, the friendly acts, the neighborly kindness, the Christian sympathy of one towards another, which robs wealth of its power to curse, extracts the bitter from sorrow, and opens wells of gladness in desolate homes. We do not always see the golden links shining in the chain of human events, but they are there, and happy is he who feels their gentle but irresistible influence

PROFIT OF FOWLS.

E. M. Brexdly furnishes the East Bloomfield Farmer's Club with a statement in regrad to the profits of eighty fowls for ninety days. In the month of Febuary he built a poultry-house 81 feet long and 13 feet wide, attached to a shed on one side and to a barn at one end—The roof was of boards, battened, and it had two windows for the admission of light. On the first of March he put into it eighty fowls of the common kind, mostly one year old.—They cost 18 3-4 cents each. They were fed with corn, oats, and fresh meat boiled.—Gravel, lime, and clear water were furnished constantly, and they were let out of the yard and allowed to roam every afternoon. His account of the expenditures and receipts is as follows:

Lumber and nails for building	$10 00
Labor of building 4 1-4 days at $1	4.00
Eighty fowls at 18 3-4 cents each	15.00
Ten bushels of corn at 50 cents	5.00
Nine bushels oats at 33 1-2 cents	3 00
Making whole expense	$ 38 00

In ninety days they furnished 385 dozen and ten eggs, which at ten cents per dozen were worth $38,50—being a trifle more thon the cost of building the house, the fowls and the grain consumed —Albany Cultivator.

INABILITY TO SPEAK IN PUBLIC.

The power of public opinion has been felt in all ages and in all societies—and its influence has been always beneficial to mankind. Men exercise a certain control over one another, something analogous to that exercised by the heavenly bodies, on each other, under the principle of attraction. We all, more or less, regulate ourselves by what we suppose our fellows think of us. It is to this universal principle we must refer that perturbation of the generality of men which seizes on them when they have to face and address a number of people—especially for the first time. That panoramic aspect of the human face divine seems to have a powerful fascination for most men—a terrible one, for the sensitive or inexperienced in public addresses!

A sensitive person can brave the public opinion of one man; but when it comes out upon him from the eyes of a couple of score, he is lost!

He hesitates and stammers, and aghast,
Stares blankly at the audience and sticks fast,

The finest wits have been disgraced in this way at the stupidest. Pope, the poet, whom one would suppose to have been a pale, austere, self-sustained mortal, could not speak ten consecutive words correctly in public He has to hear him state that he could tell a thing to three persons very well; but if his audience was a dozen, his polished intellect experienced a bewilderment—he did not feel himself equal to a conversation with twelve individuals. He was once examined as a witness before the House of Lords, in the case of the Bishop of Rochester; and actually made three blunders in an evidence of less than twenty words—though he had merely to state how the bishop pass his time at Bromley, and though he (the poet) cast his eyes along the nearest bench of peers—they did not venture to farther off—he saw they were nearly all his personal acquaintances! Then there is the French poet, Beranger—he is even worse in this respect than Pope. In 1848 the people elected him to the National Assembly for one of the departments of the city of Paris, but it was against his will, and he refused to sit e was forced to go to the Chamber nevertheless. He went one day, but would not go again. He then wrote a letter to the papers, from his garret excusing himself, and declaring that to address more than six people would disconcert him that his vocation was to be a ballad maker, not a law-maker. With the grace of Lafontaine, and the philosophic wit of Voltaire, the old man is as shy as Dominie Sampson; and to those who did not know him would seem "to have a great genius for silence," as the saying is. Erskine, the great lawyer, was at first painfully unready of speech, and so extremely embarrassed that he would have given up the attempt to be an orator, if he did not think he felt, as he says himself, his little children tugging at his gown, and urging him on, in spite of his boggling and stammering. Sheridan was, at first, a poor hand at speech-making. But he said, "I knew it was in me, and I was determined it should come out!" Curran was almost knocked down by the sound of his own voice when he first addressed his "gentlemen" in a little room of a tavern.

Cowper is another instance of extreme bashfulness and want of presence of mind, or whatever this infirmity may be termed. In early life, his aristocratic family connections had influence to procure for him the place of clerk in the House of Lords, where his duties would have been little more than to stand up and read palamentary notices or documents to the House on occasion. Such was his timidity of disposition, that the idea of being obliged to speak before a large audience terrified him extremely, and the thing so worked on his imagination, as the time drew near when he should begin his attendance, that he gave way to an agony of apprehensions, and absolutely attempted to hang himself. Rather than make a figure in the eyes of the public, he deliberately got a rope and tried to put an end to his mental sufferings. A servant entering his room as he was about this dreadful business, hindered the design His friends were informed of his condition and the cause of it—and his mind was restored by the assurance that of course he was not expected to do what affected him with such repugnance. But for the old servant the world had wanted some immortal songs. It was so during the future life of this great poet.

While he lived in retirement with Mrs Corwin, her son and daughter, he rather avoided the company of strangers; and he was often known in his rural walks to leave the road and conceal himself inside the hedge, if he saw any one—a lady especially—coming to meet him. When the danger was past he would come out and proceed on his ramble

Therefore—and this is the moral—let all stammer and scatter-brained members of society console themselves under their inability to wield the people at will. If eloquence in speech is denied them, let then be satisfied with as much of the superiority of mind as their kind friends please to articulate to them —Yankee Blade.

BEAUTIFUL.

We clip the following paragraph from a Boston paper. If true, it is one of the most beautiful and pleasing incidents we have read for a long while:

"There is one town in New England, perhaps more than one, where universal toleration is extended to birds of every feather, and neither gun, nor stone, nor missile of any kind, is raised against them; the consequence is that they are fearless of danger, full of melody and song, familiar, gentle, and affectionate in all their bearings toward man, and abundant in their contributions to the pleasures of society. For ourselves, let us say, once for all, that we feel no respect nor affection for such as delight to terrify and mangle the loveliest and gayest and most innocent specimens of the Creator's workmanship in all the animal tribes"

It is sad to think that we are far behind the Hindoos in our practical forbearance and tenderness towards that sweet portion of the creation that contributs so much to our happiness by their melodies. Colonel Sleeman, in his ramblings through India, gives us the following memoranda of his observations of the gentle manners of the Hindoo children:

"We passed close to a village, in which the children were at play; while upon the bushes over their heads were suspended an immense number of the beautiful nests of the sagacious Baya bird, or Indian yellow hammer, all within reach of a grown-up boy, and one so near the road that a grown-up man might actually look into it as he passed along. It cannot fail to strike a European as singular to see so many birds nests situated close to a village remain unmolested within reach of so many boisterous children, with their little proprietors and families fluttering and chirping among them with as great a feeling of security & gayety of heart as the children themselves enjoy In any part of Europe not a nest could have lived an hour within reach of such a population; for the Baya bird has no peculiar respect paid to it there, like the wren and robin-red-breast in England Nobody in India has the slightest wish to molest birds in their nests; it enters not into their pastimes, and they have no feeling of pride or pleasure in it"

Kindness to the birds, then, American children may learn from the poor heathen children of India, and it is a lesson which, once learned, will carry with it a rich reward.

Taking in contemplation New Orleans as a whole, what d've think of it?' asked an old settler' of an acquaintance-stranger, in my hearing.

'As a hole? you're depreciative and—'

'No—no—none of your waggeries; I mean balancing the advantages and the disadvantages of locality, climate, et cetera.'

'Well, then, to be candid,' continued he who was button-holed, and whose uncle has been in correspondence with Priessnetz. I think it is a paradise or a wathr-cure hospital.

CONVERSION OF A SEA CAPTAIN

A CORRESPONDENT of Zion's Herald writes from Canton, and gives the following encouraging fact:

This morning returned from a ship whose chief officer lay at the point of death As I entered his state-room he immediately remarked, "Ah, sir, I did not think the last Sabbath I was hearing you preach my last sermon. I want you should repeat that text again." I did so as follows,—"Wherefore he is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing," &c. "I know this is truth," said he, "but 'tis a word for such a sinner as I am to believe." Do you think your case beyond what God calls the uttermost? I asked. After repeating the passage several times, with the eagerness of a dying man, he exclaimed "I must be, if he saves to the uttermost, that he saves me." Cling to this precious truth, said I, and never for a moment doubt it. After bearing his case to the mercy seat I left him for a time, but soon a message came that he wished me to see him die. I hastened to the ship, and as I entered his room and saw the light of heaven beaming in his countenance, I needed no language to assure me that his pardon was sealed; yet, after a little effort he opened his eyes and with perfect distinctness whispered, "'Tis true! 'tis true! I know. I feel he is able to save even to the uttermost, for he saves me;" then closed his eyes and calmly died Yes, the same compassionate Jesus, who spoke words full of consolation to the thief on the cross, saved the penitent sailor in the eleventh hour.

Cuba—Its Discovery, Its Island—Its Population, Its Resources.

[illegible] between 23 deg. 12 [illegible] 13 min. N. lat. Its [illegible] its breadth varies [illegible] the greatest distance [illegible] the sea is about 43 miles. At least two thirds of the island are from 60 to 80 miles in breadth, and it measures on its surface about 42,000 English square miles. The eastern part is very mountainous, and some of the peaks are from 7,000 to 8,000 feet above the level of the sea. The valleys in the eastern department are exceedingly picturesque and fruitful. Cuba was discovered by Columbus on the 27th of October, 1492. In 1519 Havana was founded. The cultivation of the sugar cane was introduced about four years after. When first discovered the island had an Indian population of about 200,000. The greater part soon perished under the hardships imposed by the Europeans. Only a few half breeds remain in the eastern department. In 1755 the exportation of sugar from Havana in a year was comparatively inconsiderable. The English took Havana in 1762, and gave it up again in 1763, in exchange for other possessions and advantages. During the siege great numbers of the British fell victims to the vomito. Many were also poisoned or assassinated by the Cubans. The position of the island is admirable, being within a few days' sail of the Atlantic ports of the United States, and two and a half days by steam from New Orleans. The soil is generally fertile, producing the sugar cane in the highest perfection; no part of the world is more favorable for its growth, and indeed the climate and soil admit of the cultivation of all kinds of tropical fruits and productions, which might be cultivated in quantity, to reach ten times the present amount, as, of twenty four million acres comprising the surface of the island, only two millions are under cultivation, about three millions being in natural pasturage, five hundred thousand in artificial pasturage, fourteen millions woodland, and the rest, four and a half million, are barren lands. In the western department about one-fourth of the land is barren, one fourth in woodland, and the remaining two fourths are equally devoted to cultivation and pasture. In the central department about one third is barren and only one thirty seventh part is under cultivation, about an eleventh part in pasture, and more than three fifths are woodland. In the eastern department about a twelfth is under cultivation, about one fifth in pasture, two thirds in woodland, and only one-sixth barren.

Supposing the Island to be divided into 72 parts, 13 would represent the size of the western department, 31 the central department, and 28 the eastern. Of the cultivated land, one half is in the western department, one-sixth in the central, and two sixths in the eastern department. The principal agricultural productions are, the sugar cane coffee, molasses, honey, rum, tobacco, wax, rice cocoa and cotton are also produced with many other minor articles.

In 1841, when the number of sugar estates on the island appointed to 1,238, upon which were employed, according to the census, but 138,701 persons, giving an average of 112 hands to each estate, the exportation of sugar from all the parts of the island amounted to about 850,000 boxes, according to the custom house returns, which would allow, upon an average 686 boxes to each estate, or 6 boxes to each hand; however, making allowance for the sugar not entered at the custom houses, as the article then paid an export duty of $1 per box, and also taking into consideration that which was consumed in the island, the produce of each estate, upon an average, might be about 900 boxes, or 8 to each hand; nor does this amount appear too great to allow, when the best lands afford upwards of 6,000 pounds of dry sugar to the acre. In Louisiana, where the best lands produce about 3,000 pounds to the acre, the average produce of each hand is about 5,000 pounds.

Besides the cultivation of the sugar cane large quantities of coffee are produced. However, this article is not so extensively cultivated as it was some ten years since, when upwards of fifty millions pounds' weight was exported from different ports of the island. Last year (the most favorable during the last few years) showed but an export of thirty-five million pounds of coffee. Brazil has been able to furnish this produce at a low rate, and consequently that of Brazil has taken the place of Cuba coffee in the markets of the United States; therefore sugar is produced in many parts where coffee was once cultivated, or the lands have been turned over to new estates, in the fertile regions in the neighborhood of Cardenas, &c.

The climate and soil of Cuba in general are not so favorable for the cultivation of coffee as for the sugar cane, tobacco, and other articles; however, the easter district appears to be well suited to the production of coffee, the crops there being more certain; and the quality of the bean infinitely superior. A hilly or rather mountainous country seems to be the most favorable to the tree.

The celebrated Mocha coffee, which is indigenous to Arabia, and that part of Africa on the opposite side of the Red Sea, grows without cultivation on the rocky sides of the mountains.

After coffee, tobacco is the next article of consequence produced. There are various kinds, which derive their different qualities from the peculiarities of the soil in which they are cultivated

The most esteemed is that which is produced in the Vuelta Abajo, about a hundred miles west of Havana in the jurisdiction of New Filipina; of this the finest Havana cigars are made. It costs from 40 to 120 dollars per bale according to the quality, and the crop is very inferior, so that it is impossible for a manufacturer always to supply the same quality of cigars. The next to the tobacco of the Vuelta Abajo is that called "Partido," some of which is very good, and is used in making those cigars of which astonishing bargains are very often obtained. There is another tobacco grown in the western department, in which the two classes mentioned are grown. It has a course leaf, and is called "De Vuelta Arriba;" also the tobacco grown in the eastern department goes by that name, of which there are two kinds, the Santiago de Cuba tobacco and the Yara. The Yara tobacco is sometimes very fine, and of this the best Principe cigars are made. Many persons have sown the Vuelta Abajo seed in the States, but never have they been able to raise tobacco from it in any respect similar in flavor to the original kind. The soil gives the flavor, and its cultivation cannot be extended even in Cuba.

The other articles of consequence produced are wax, honey, and rice. The two first of these articles are exported in very large quantities; the last mentioned article is produced to the amount of 40,000 tierces, or about 24 million of pounds, but is insufficient for the consumption of the island so that large quantities of rice are imported from Charleston, Savannah, Spain, South America. And latterly from Manilla; however, that from Charleston is most esteemed, and from that place the largest quantity is imported. Wax is produced to the amount of about 800,000 pounds, and honey to the amount of two millions gallons. Cotton is little cultivated, 650 bales being about the amount produced.

The other vegetable articles are, all kinds of tropical fruits, sweets potatoes, yams, arrow-root cocoa, Indian corn castor oil, and different kinds of woods; such as cedar, mahogony, lance-wood, and other woods used by turners, &c.

Cattle to the number of about 900,000 head, are owned in the island and there are about 200,000 horses, 50,000 mules, and large numbers of smaller animals.

The annual product of the vegetable and animal creation, on a moderate calculation, may be set down at about $75,000,000.

In minerals the island is very rich; of copper mines, no less than 114 have been discovered in the island, 57 in the eastern department, 18 in the central, and 45 in the western. The mine at Cobre, worked by an English company, has shipped from 27,000 to 43,000 tons per annum, valued at two and a half to four and a half millions of dollars. The other departments have not as yet shipped more than about 2,000 tons per annum. Coal, iron, silver and aminuthus have been discovered.

The revenue of the island, according to Mr. T. W. Wilson from whose valuable work upon Cuba we have compiled most of the foregoing, is about $12,000,000. The population is about 1,200,000

SCENE IN ENGLAND.

THE London correspondent of the St. Louis Intelligencer gives quite a graphic picture of the prorogation of Parliament, thus:

"All that England can boast of rank is assembled within the gorgeous House of Lords on this occasion. The lords are in their ermine cloaks, the ladies in feathers and diamonds, the bishops in full robes. I remembered last year how the old Duke entered, leaning on the arm of the beautiful Marchioness of Wellesley, whose portrait some of your readers may have seen, painted by Lanseer, in last year's exhibition of art. The Queen enters in full state, with a constellated crown of diamonds, her train carried by four pages of gentle blood. A peer bearing the crown of State, another the sword, (the duke,) another the sceptre, &c, from an interesting procession. By the side of the Queen walks Prince Albert. He takes a seat on her left—on the right of the throne is the seat of the Prince of Wales. Hitherto he has not attended. One of the bishops read a short prayer. Two counsels, in black robes and wigs demand the Queens assent to certain bills. The Queen bows each time. The counsels bow in return, and exclaim, in old Norman French, 'La Reine le veut.'

"A rushing noise is then heard on the carridor, like a pack of Eton school-boys.

"It is the Hon. House of Commons rushing up stairs. When this uproar had subsided, the Queen, who was conversing with Lady Londonderry, rises, and in a voice as clear as a silver bell, the metallic tones of which penetrate into every corner of the hall, reads the speech of prorogation amidst dead silence! The procession then leaves as it came; a blast of chivalrous trumpets; 'God save the Queen,' strikes up by the band of Guans; deafening cheers outside of loyal population, and the roar of artillery, close the session. It is a sight which every foreignet should endeavor to see if possible, but the tickets are very limited. All the Ambassadors attend in full costume"

BRADDOCK'S DEFEAT—HIS SASH.

From an article in the New York Literary World, reviewing De Haas' History of Western Virginia, we cut the following interesting account of Gen. Braddock, and some incidents connected with his death:

"The great defect of Braddock in this battle, as is well known, was his neglect of the usual Indian methods of warfare. He appears to have been a daring, undoubtedly a courageous officer, of the old "blood and thunder" school; but his sacrifice of the lives of his men and officers was fearful. Mr. De Haas maintains, as an unquestionable point of history, that he fell by a shot from one of his own men. His memoranda of events are striking.

"In the ranks of Braddock were two brothers, Joseph and Thomas Fausett, or Fawcett; also first a commissioned, and the other a non commissioned officer. One of these, (Tom Fausett) Hon. Andrew Stewart, of Uniontown, says he knew very well, and often conversed with him about early times. 'He did not hesitate to own, in the presence of his friends, that he shot Braddock.' The circumstances were briefly these.

"Regardless of Gen. Braddock's positive and foolish orders, that the troops should not protect themselves behind trees, Joseph Fausett had so posted himself, which Braddock discovering rode up and struck him down with his sword. Tom Fausett, who stood but a short distance from his brother, saw the whole transaction, and immediately drew up his rifle and shot him through the body. This, as he afterwards said, was partly out of revenge for Gen. Braddock's assault upon his brother, and partly to get the General out of the way, and thus save the remnant of the army.

"In addition to the above, we may give the statement of a correspondent of the National Intelligencer who seems to have been familiar with the facts. 'When my father was removing with his family to the West, one of the Fausetts kept a tavern house to the eastward from and near where Uniontown now stands. At this man's house we lodged, about the 10th of October, 1781, twenty-six years and a few months after Braddock's defeat; and then it was made anything but a secret, that one of the family dealt the deatiblow to the British General. Thirteen years afterwards I met Tom Fausett, then, as he told me, in his 70th year. To him I put the plain question, and received the plain reply, 'I did shoot him.' I never heard the fact doubted or blamed that Fausett killed Braddock.

"Mr. Watson (Annal of the Olden Time, vol. I. pp. 141-2) says, that in 1833, he met Wm. Butler, a private of the Pennsylvania Greens at the defeat of Braddock and he answered promptly, one Fausett, brother of one whom Braddock had killed in a passion.'

"In 1820, Butler saw Fausett near Carlisle, where he had gone on a visit to his daughter. The Millerstown (Perry Co. Pa.) Gazette, 1830, speaks of Butler being there, and in company with an aged soldier in the town, who had been in Braddock's defeat, and that both concurred in saying that Braddock had been shot by Fausett."

"A minister of the M. E. Church, writing to the Christian Advocate, says: 'The old man died at the age of 114 years, in 1828, who killed Braddock.'

"The Newburyport Herald, of 1842, declares its acquaintance with Daniel Adams an old soldier of that place, aged 82, who confirmed the shooting of Braddock by one of his own men.

"Braddock wore a coat of mail in front, which turned balls fired in front; but he was shot in the back, and the ball was found stopped in front by the coat of mail. The venerable William Darby of Washington city, has recently stated to the author that during his early days he never heard it doubted that Fausett had killed Braddock. It seems a generally conceded fact, and most of the settlers were disposed to applaud the act.

"At the fall of Braddock, Washington with Capt. Stuart of the Virginia Guards, hastened to his relief, and bore him from the field of his inglorious defeat, in the sash which had decorated his person."

The sash, here alluded to, has another recent and [illegible] interest. It passed, in military [illegible] into the hands of Gen. Taylor. The [illegible] history is thus preserved by Mr. D[illegible]:

"The sash was worn by Braddock at the time of his defeat, and in which he was borne from the field bleeding and dying, recently presented to the friends of one of America's greatest and most successful generals.

"It appears that the sash referred to, some years since became the property of a gentleman at New Orleans.

"After the brilliant achievements on the Rio Grande in 1846, the owner of the relic forwarded it to Gen. Gaines, with a request that it might be presented to the officer who most distinguished himself on that occasion. The old general promptly sent it by a special messenger to the commander-in-chief.

"The person who bore it thus speaks of the presentation and interview. 'Gen. Taylor took the sash and examined it attentively. It was of unusual size, being quite as large when extended, as a common hammock. In the meshes of the splendid red silk text composing it, was the date of its manufacture, 1797. And although it was one hundred and forty years old, where the dark spots that were scattered over it, showed the blood of the brave who wore it, it gleamed as brightly as if it had just come from the loom.

"Upon the unusual size of the sash being remarked, Gen. Worth, who had joined the party at the tent, remarked that such was the fashion when he first entered the service, that the officers wore it extended to carry, if necessary, the wounded from off the battle field. It gave rise to much conversation, that after General Braddock was wounded that Lady's Lovie, the sash, such as in form, was used as a hammock to bear him from the field, and that in it he was borne several miles, his body swaying to and fro between the horses to which the ends of the sash were securely fastened. To a wounded soldier no conveyance could be more grateful, or more appropriate.

"Gen. Taylor broke the silent admiration, by saying he would not receive the sash. Upon our expressing surprise, he continued, that he did not think he should receive presents until the campaign, so far as he was concerned, was finished. He elaborated on the impropriety of naming children after living men, fearing lest the sons honored might disgrace their namesakes. We argued his acceptance of the present; and he said, finally, that he would put it carefully away in his military chest, and if he [illegible] deserved so great a compliment, at the end of the campaign, he would acknowledge the receipt.

"The stirring events that have transpired since have driven that remark above all the laurels of Monterey to those he then wore, as well as the donor of that sash, will insist upon his acceptance of it.

"Since writing the above, the old chieftain has passed from the living to the dead. He died on a singular coincidence—on the anniversary of the terrible event, the defeat of Braddock. But a few weeks previous to his death, the author, then on a visit to Washington, freely conversed with the distinguished chieftain upon every subject about which we have been writing. He said that the sash referred to was still in his possession, and at any time we desired it would have it shown. Knowing that matters of state pressed heavily upon him, we did not ask it at the time; and thus, perhaps, the opportunity has been lost forever, certainly deprived of one of its most interesting features to be seen in the hands of Gen. Taylor. During the interview referred to, he spoke more and frequently of Washington's early operation in the West, and inquired whether any of the remains of Fort Necessity could be seen."

An Act to encourage the cultivation of Cotton

Whereas it is deemed expedient and proper that the Government should, by every means in its power, encourage the growing spirit of agriculture every where manifesting itself in this Republic; and especially to encourage the cultivation of some staple article of produce for exportation:—And whereas, it is fully demonstrated, by actual experiment, that native Cotton can be successfully cultivated, and if attended to, would greatly increase the commercial interests of this Republic—therefore

It is Enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia in Legislature Assembled.—

Section 1st. That any person or persons, Citizens or Aliens, who shall raise or cause to be raised, in either or any of the counties of the Republic, on their own lands the best crop of cotton in quantities hereinafter specified, shall receive from the Government annually, for each successive crop, during the ensuing five years the following premium or premiums—To Wit:—

For the best crop of cotton raised on a quarter of an acre of land, in each county aforesaid, will be granted as a premium to the successful cultivator the sum of five dollars;—for the best crop of one acre ten dollars;—for the best crop of two acres twenty dollars;—for the best crop of three acres forty dollars;—for the best crop of four acres sixty dollars;—for the best crop of five acres fifty dollars. Any person or persons as aforesaid having planted either of the above quantities of land in cotton, and intending to apply for the premium thereon, shall produce, to the General Superintendent of the county in which said piece of cotton is planted, at least one month before the time of gathering in the same, a certificate, by him or them signed, declaring the number of acres or parts of an acre under cultivation by him or them, and of his or their intention to compete for the premium or premiums above mentioned.

Section 2nd.—There shall be appointed, in each county of this Republic, a Committee of three persons to be selected as follows—the General Superintendent of said county shall name one of said committee, the cotton growers, by a majority of votes, shall name the second, and the two thus chosen shall name the third. It shall be the duty of the committee thus chosen, carefully to inspect the crops of cotton, in their respective counties, when the same shall have come to perfection; and report to the Secretary of the Treasury fully and minutely to report to the following—viz: (1) of the nature of the land; (2) the character of the soil; (3) the arrangement of the field, mode of cultivation—whether planted in rows or hills, the distance of the stalks apart; (4) the average size of stalks and number of balls on a stalk; (5) the quality, as to texture and staple, of the cotton, and the probable quantities from each field; (6) the whole number of acres of land actually under cotton cultivation.

And it shall be further duty of said committee, that they shall have inspected the several fields of cotton, in the county, to grant to the owner of the best crop of cotton upon the several plots of land above named, a certificate signifying the same; which certificate, on presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury, will entitle the holder to the premium as sing forth, as specified in the first section of this Act, and which shall be paid from the Public Treasury by warrant from the President.—If in any case the committee shall find it difficult, or shall be unable, to come to a satisfactory decision as to the superiority of any two or more crops of cotton being equally good in quality and quantity, and to that case the largest crop of cotton over half an acre, and under one acre; and over one acre and under two acres, &c. &c. shall be entitled to the premium.

Section 3rd.—To further inducement to small cotton planters the President is hereby authorized and requested to appoint, in each of the counties of this Republic, an agent with power and instructions to purchase, at fair prices any quantities of cotton however small, raised in the Republic, and ship the same to some foreign market to be sold for account of the Government. The President is further requested to solicit from any foreign company, association, or society that may be disposed to aid the people of Liberia in making experiments in the cultivation and growth of cotton.—The President is also requested to encourage, so far as in his power, any connection between the citizens of this Republic and any foreign company, association, or society, which, in his opinion, would tend to the advancement of cotton culture in this Republic.

"Ladies L. Literary Institute"

The above is the name of a well known institution in this town, and one in which every young person in, especially of that class, for whom it is professed to be intended, should feel a deep interest.

It has been in existence now for some two or three years, and so far as I can learn, those who have maintained their connection with it since its commencement, have made tolerably fair advancements, and rarely, if ever, has any left on account of a deficiency in the system to interest and instruct. The course pursued in this institution is very well suited to the improvement of the mind—though we could wish that more efficient method were adopted.—The members meet weekly, and read from books containing very useful knowledge—e. g.—Astronomy—Moral Philosophy &c.—They read alternately.—At every meeting, one or two members are appointed to perform a kind of introductory reading,—this exercise generally consist of pieces selected from favorite authors, or amusing anecdotes, questions of importance requiring some research, are also given to each member at every meeting to be answered the next; these questions either have reference to the study in pursuit, or embrace other topics of interest and importance. But it is much to be regretted, that, not withstanding, the great utility, and evident need of such an institution in this community—its salutary influence it is calculated to exercise if properly appreciated, on the mind of "ladies." For whom it was especially intended, and for whose mental improvement it is so well adapted—few seem to feel any interest in it, there are but few who may be seen wending their way to the nightly meetings, and even those few, I believe, on account of discouragements are almost ready to give up. But may this never be,—for educated women are needed in Liberia as well as educated men—I presume, however, that the reason so few appreciate this institution is, that the good arising from such an association for literary purposes, is not generally known, as was stated before reading is practiced at the meetings, and by reading frequently to an assembly where there is perfect silence, we see no fears need be entertained of being ridiculed. And readers acquire a habit of good reading, and good readers become still better.—and all are aware of the profitable results of competition in a good undertaking. the maxim is that "encouragement is the best stimulus to perseverance" holds good in all cases. By reading such books as they do, and having to answer questions that require research, a taste for reading is acquired—(which few possess) to say nothing of the improvement of the mind and expansion of the intellect going on at the same time. Is not this institution then worthy the attention of the ladies? Do the young ladies of this town feel no desire to improve in literature,—to become acquainted with the revelations of science? I venture to reply—they do,—then, let them not grudge to devote two hours in one evening out of every week to the study of books—to the pursuits of "knowledge" which "is power," and the acquisition of which will make them the delight of their friends and associates, beloved and respected in society, useful and efficient in the church—and ornaments to their country. O shall none of the "fair sex" of Liberia invoke the aid of the muses—and sing the achievements of Liberia pioneers? Shall no gifted dame deck the memory of the great and venerable departed with flowers from her poetic mead? Shall there be none to speak in accents soft and wavering of the glories of Liberia? O young ladies—let your self-love—the love of your country, rouse you to effort, and let not an association like the "Ladies Literary Institute" waste away because of inattention and neglect on your part, but uphold it, & strive, not only to adorn yourselves outwardly with gay and beautiful apparel, but decorate your mind with the unfading laurels of wisdom for "wisdom is the principal thing" Prov. iv.—7

[illegible] the first effusion of an [illegible] paper the Christian Statesman. Its author is lending his [illegible] to the cause of virtue and humanity for which he deserves the thanks of all the friends of humanity rights, and human improvement, we trust the appeal in behalf of Liberia, was received in America, in the same kind spirit in which it was evidently dictated: for, spite of the [illegible] difficulties, which stand in the way of America doing for us what justice might seem to require, we have unabated confidence in the generosity and correct sense of honor of the American people. And when once their sympathy is awakened and their energy roused, no people are more fruitful in expedient, more determined in their efforts to execute their designs. Justice with them is sometimes tardy, but usually sure.—

LIBERIA TO AMERICA.

I.

Foster mother, shrewd and stern,
Favor yet thy sable child—
Graciously and frankly turn,
With a heart well reconcil'd:
Be not thou the last to bid
Africa's young hope God-speed;
Let not all thy love be hid
From thy daughter's day of need.

II.

England, with maternal heart,
Cheers us on, and clears our way;
And her Bayard's generous part
France has nobly well'd to play!
Will before them, the last art Thou
Thus to recognise our claim—
Equal, and Free now,
Free in State, and race, and name?

III.

Have we not deserved right well
Of Mankind, and Thee, forsooth?
It is but a boast to tell
That our progress helps the Truth?
Be not, then, too last to look
Kindly on Liberia's light—
Quickened by the Blessed Book,
And made glorious by the Right.

IV.

Great America behold!
Thou, through ages shalt be seen
Man's deep leprosy of old!
Nedia's curse, Gen. Hen[illegible]'s sin:
Be not, then, the last to bend
Generous greeting o'er the wave;
But with gracious glance befriend
Tomorrow's sons, no more slaves!

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, APRIL 6th, 1852.

Religious.—On the 11th ultimo, the ordinance of Baptism was administered in this town by Elder Hilary Teage. Four candidates were immersed. We learn that there are others, who will soon to be the subjects of this Holy rite.

Prince Will Buckler, of Grand Cobah.—This Chieftain died a few days ago. Our readers may remember, that in a former number, we noticed that he was in ill health. Will Buckler's death will be deeply deplored not only by his own tribe, but by our Government and the people of Liberia. He was considered an honest man—kept his country in peace; and gave protection to all, who resided within the bounds of his authority. The King of Grand Cobah, depended on Will Buckler for the preservation of peace; and to retain a good understanding with our Government. Now, that this Prince is dead, it is much to be feared, that there will be a number of petty Chieftains claiming the right to take the authority of Buckler; and as there is not energy enough in the King to resist them: there is a possibility; amounting almost to a certainty, that that beautiful country, will soon become a theatre of bitter feuds.

The Liberia Packet, Captain Chase, arrived in our port, on the morning of the 15th, inst. from Savannah Georgia, from which port, she sailed on the 29th, January.

There came in the Packet 171 immigrants—90 of them from Savannah, to be landed at Sinoe—80 for this place, and the remainder will be landed at Grand Bassa.

There had been a few cases of small pox among the immigrants, but on their arrival here, they were in good health. One man died on the passage.

The Rev. E. Ball came passenger in the Packet. We learn that he is connected with the Southern Baptist Board of Missions—and that his object in visiting Liberia, is, to examine the condition of the Missionary stations supported by his society. On the following sabbath, Mr. Ball, delivered to the Providence Baptist Church very interesting discourses, and gave a very encouraging history of missions in other heathen lands.

Colonel William L. Weaver.—It is with feelings of sadness, that we record the death of this valuable citizen. Col. Weaver, immigrated to this country from Petersburg, Va., in the year 1824,—in that place, he was respected by all classes of people. He arrived in Africa, and with the rest of the pioneers established himself in Monrovia. He was always among the foremost of his fellow citizens in carrying out measures for the security, improvement and advancement of his adopted country: and by his discreet and active behavior, commanded the respect of all.—Col. W. was very soon after his arrival here, employed in the Executive Department of the Government, and to the time of the settling of Grand Bassa, was in the Councils of several Governors. He was selected to form the settlement at Grand Bassa, and the town of Edina was built under his direction and management. So pleased was he with the loveliness of the country, that he determined on making Edina his home for the future: and up to the time of his death, lived there with his interesting family. In many trying circumstances, the deceased, proved himself equal to the character he bore, for courage, prudence, and a love of country. He was allways ready to enrol his name, and risque his life in the defence of the honor and rights of his country;—and the last occassion which called for the exercise of these qualifications, was in January last, for the chastisement of Grando and Boyer. Though, then, laboring under affliction, he volunteered his services for the expedition, but was obliged to return home on leave, owing to ill health, before the campaign had ended. Under the Colonial Administration, the deceased, was a member of the Legislature and under the present government, he was a member of the first senate. In every situation Col. Weaver discharged his duties with fidelity. He died at his residence in Edina, on the 27th, of Feb.

uary last, in his 57th year; deeply regretted by every citizen of the county; and in the words of a correspondent, his numerous friends and acquaintances here, will say, "a patriot has fallen, and our hearts are greatly smitten."

We sincerely sympathize with the afflicted family of the deceased; & beseech them to put their trust in their heavenly Father, who has promised to be a husband to the widow, & a father to the fatherless.

We have had the pleasure of perusing quite a number of American papers, sent to friends, by the Liberia Packet, and of a few received by us. We see nothing in them to warrant the belief that the Government of the U. S. will soon recognize the independence of Liberia. Politicians at Washington are too much engaged at this time, in canvassing about the Presidential election, to permit any subject, not immediately connected with the all-engrossing one, of "who shall be the next President," to be discussed. It is said, and believed, that President Fillmore and the members of his cabinet, are bighly favorable to Liberia, and would no doubt, if the political horizon was less cloudy, promptly come out, now that the slavery agitation has measurably subsided,—and give favor and acknowledgement to Liberia. Our readers will remember, that Mr. Fillmore, and his Secretary of State, Mr. Webster, are spoken of as candidates for the Presidency—and until the national convention shall have published its decree, these two great men will hardly risque their popularity, by discussing subjects of doubtful expediency.

The Hungarian Governor, Kossuth, has been received by the American people, with great eclat. We do not remember an instance where the American people extended so hearty a welcome as in the case of the Hungarian Patriots. Banquets of the most magnificent and costly description, and deputations from all quarters have crowded in upon the distinguished refugee. They are not only feasting, and encouraging the exile in his effort for the freedom of Hungary, by patriotic speeches &c.—but they show their sympathy in a more tangible form, in the shape of dollars & cents—six hundred thousand dollars have been collected and handed over to Kossuth, to effect the liberation of this country from "Austrian tyranny." Governor Kossuth is a very remarkable man, this is his first visit to the U. S. and he seems to have a perfect understanding of the organization of the government—the limit & severity of the several states: and has elicited "universal" admiration for the character and disposition of the American people, as if he had lived among them all his life. He will receive, it is said, a very flattering reception by the Government at Washington.

The English government made to that of the U. S. an apology for the indiscretion of the Commander of one of H. M. vessels of war, being into an American vessel, and refusing to comply with part of the crew at Greytown, Mosquito Grenada—These islands form no part of the British dominions, and with their domestic affairs British officers have nothing to do, it is, therefore, not surprising that H. M. Government, readily apologised for the improper interference of a British officer. We have seen it insinuated that Her. M. Government were thus prompt in apologizing to the U. S. Govt. because Bro' Jonathan now a days stands no nonsense—and can speak as loud and as long from his floating Batteries as John Bull. This however we think a little unjust, for we have yet to be convinced that Her. M. Govt. would not have been as prompt in doing the same justice to the weakest Govt. in christendom—and Liberians will see that Her. M. Govt. will as promptly discountenance and check the improper interference of British subjects and British officers in the domestic affairs of this govt. as in that of the U. S. or any other.

Difficulties have been amicably arranged, between the governments of Spain and the U. S. At one time, it was thought the breach would be considerably widened, by the refusal of the American Government to comply with some of the demands of the Spanish Minister.

It has been officially notified to the U. S. Government, that the Governments of France & England have instructed the Commanders of their Naval forces on the American station, to prevent in future, the landing of said enterers on the Island of Cuba. The American Government protests against any such orders, and will not favor any measure that will permit American vessels to be searched by armed vessels of other nations.

It is not difficult to conjecture what may be the probable result of such orders, if they are carried out, and if further attempts are made by American adventurers to revolutionize Cuba. It is the settled policy, and determination of the government and people of the U. S. to prevent any arrangement being made in connection with that Island which may place it in a position, different from the one it now occupies.

The Governments of England and France hold, and will maintain the same position. To prevent a rupture, the U. S. must prevent armed adventurers from leaving its shores to operate in that Island; if it is unable to do this, or will not do it the orders of the confederated governments will be enforced; and the U. S. will then have something to do.

Our Liberia readers, will no doubt, hear with regret, that the distinguished friend of African Colonization the Hon: Henry Clay of Kentucky, at the latest date was seriously ill: and that his friends did not entertain the least hope of his recovery. Liberia at this time, needs much, the friendly services of so distinguished a statesman and advocate; and if it pleases a wise Providence to remove him—the people of Liberia will long revere his memory.

The Slave war, or as it is known by some, "the Zara War," is now at an end. It has been raging, nearly thirty years; and in all that time the people of the Gallinas, Sollum, Manna River, and Manna Rock, have been prevented from holding any intercourse, of any consequence, with the interior. This has been a war for freedom. The slaves fighting their masters in the hope that they would eventualy overcome them; and the masters were fully resolved to conquer, and subdue their slaves. What could not be accomplished by open warfare, has been done, by the cowardly treachery of Prince Manna. Prince Manna, and the Chiefs of the several territories, proposed a truce with the slave Chiefs, and assured them that it was their determination to endeavor to put an end to the war, to the satisfaction of both parties. A truce was agreed to, and a time named when there should be a general meeting of all interested Chieftains, to agree on terms of peace and friendship. In the meanwhile, both parties scrupulously abstained from committing the least act, that could be construed into a violation of the truce; and the people of either party were going from place to place, without fear. The time of meeting arrived. Firo, the capital of the Manna territories was named as the place of meeting. And there the Chieftains, on both sides, congregated. The conference was organized—the discussion of the main subject was well entered upon when Prince Manna, secretly proposed to some of the Chieftains who were dastardly and unprincipled like himself, to get rid of further trouble by massacreing the slave Chieftains. The proposition was agreed to, and an immediate slaughter of the unprepared Chieftains commenced. It is but fair to say, that this diabolical act, is not to be laid to the charge of all the Chieftains who were of Prince Manna's party. Far from such being the case, Many of them, did not know that Manna had any intention of murdering the Chiefs. Every Chieftain of the slave party, of any note, to the number of forty three, fell a sacrifice to the perfidy and cowardice of Prince Manna and his name will ever be held, by the honest Chieftains, in detestation. Prince Manna is liked by no one—not even by his relatives—and if it were not through fear, the Chieftains of the Gallenas, would years ago, have attempted to drive him from the country. About two hundred and fifty of the followers of the murdered Chieftains, met the fate of their leaders,—the rest of them managed to escape.

Sooner or later, Prince Manna will meet with deserved punishment, for the crimes he has committed. He is known frequently to have ordered the murder of persons, who had offended him: and it is now well known, that William A. Parker, the English Agent, was murdered by his direction.

—SINCE writing the above, a friend has handed us for perusal a letter from Robert Gordon, who has for a number of years, been living at the Gallenas: and who, from his general good behavior, was permitted to every privilege enjoyed by the natives. After the Chiefs surrendered the sovereignty of the county, to the Government of Liberia, he determined on making the Gallenas his home; and expended the greater part of his means for his comfortable establishment there.

Mr. Gordon is a peaceable man, and not the least disposed to be meddlesome—but Prince Manna does not admit these qualities to have any influence with him, if they are in opposition to any of his villanous plans. To get possession of the property of Gordon, he accused him of holding intercourse with the slaves in time of the war. Gordon denied the charge, and tho' Prince Manna failed to influence other Chieftains as to the guilt of Gordon, he determined, nevertheless, to possess himself of Gordon and his property—his plan was, first, to have G. murdered; but on the morning of the evening the murderous deed was to have been committed, a friend secretly conveyed to him Manna's intention, and advised him to take a hasty departure. Leaving his wife and a family of small children at home, he made the best of his way out of the Gallenas territory; and he is now at "Mattrau"—anxiously awaiting to know, if the President will not take his cause into consideration. The letter of Mr. Gordon has been laid before the President, and it is desirable that it receive a favorable notice. The only hope now left to the supplicant, is in the interference of the government. We think at all events that his property may be obtained—but it is very doubtful if the life of Gordon would be secure if he returned to the Gallenas. Openly Manna would not act, but his influence with mercenary wanderers are so great, that one may be murdered, without the perpetrators being known.

The Ladies of Caldwell, on Friday the 26th ultimo gave a fine dinner to the officers of the "First Regiment." The dinner was served up under a grove of orange trees, which entirely shielded the guests from the sun. We hope the gentleman who appeared to be the most prominent actor on the occasion, will furnish for publication the toasts given at the dinner &c., &c. This is the second time within the last three months that the Ladies of Caldwell have showed their goodwill to the military & we do not remember an instance where the Ladies of Monrovia have thought enough of the chivalry of the military, to give them a dinner. We have, for some time past, had our doubts as to the patriotism of the Ladies of Monrovia—but we will not say any thing now on the subject, we will wait and see what time may bring forth. But we love the ladies, and feel assured they will do what is right, and in good style too. We hope none of our mischievous people, will take it upon themselves to try to make the Ladies believe we are coming them. We do not intend to be guilty of any thing of the kind.

Prince Boyer and Grando, it seems have concluded to stop and think a little before they again attempt hostilities. The New Cess people have told them in very plain language that they shall not pass through their country with hostile intentions—and if Boyer was simple enough to be led to commence hostilities, from false representations of others, or through a belief, that what designing persons have told him is true, and that he can by harrassing our settlements, bring the Government to allow him to do what he likes,—he is very much mistaken. Boyer, too, no doubt, recollects, that it is neither safe or politic, for him to leave his place, unprotected, as long as James Flaw quietudes faithfully his allegiance to this Government.

A True Bill.—The Grand Jury for the County of Montserrado, at the last court of Quarter Sessions, returned a Bill of Indictment against William Lawrence, an English trader on the Liberian coast, for inciting the natives to insubordination and rebellion against the authority of the Government.

England. Change of Ministry. Saturday Feb 21st Lord John Russell tendered his resignation to Her Majesty, which was graciously accepted. The Earl of Derby was immediately sent for and has undertaken to form a new Ministry.

Taken from the Manchester Guardian of 4th Feby 1852.

CHARGE OF OBTAINING MONEY BY FALSE PRETENCES AGAINST A MAN OF COLOUR.—At the Borough Court this morning a man of colour, named Alfred Wood, was charged with having obtained £15, the property of a merchantile house in Manchester, by means of false pretences. A gentleman stated that he was a partner in the firm, and that on Friday forenoon the prisoner called at their office. He presented a letter of introduction, purporting to be signed by Mr Roberts, the President of the Republic of Liberia, which stated him to be a respectable man and worthy of credit; and desired them to advance him a small sum of money to pay for some goods which he was sending to Liberia by a vessel which was about to sail in a short time. The letter of introduction was believed to be genuine, and £15 was given to the prisoner. The firm were afterwards applied to by a person in Manchester, to know whether they had any correct information respecting the prisoner. They in consequence wrote to Liverpool, and were informed by some friends there that Wood was an impostor.—Mr Chief-superintendent Beswick stated that on Saturday, the last witness and Mr. Clegg called upon him and stated that the prisoner had received from the firm £15, and had ordered from Mr. Clegg a large quantity of goods to go to Liberia, and that they had reason to believe that he was an impostor. Finding that the prisoner had gone to the office (Mr Beswick,) sent Sub-inspector Nea[illegible] to apprehend him.—Sub-inspector Seaves stated that he overtook the prisoner in Leverpool, & that after he was taken to the police office there, he [illegible] in consequence of which he (Seaves) took possession of all his papers. Mr Beswick said that when the prisoner was taken to the Manchester Town Hall, he said that he received the letter of introduction signed by Mr Roberts while he was in Liverpool, but that he did not know for whom it had come. He also said that he had come from Liverpool in a short time after he landed at Plymouth, and went to Plymouth to London, to Bristol, to Liverpool, to Leeds, and he had got goods to the amount £200. He had been in custody in Plymouth and London, and also at Leicester. He was employed by a firm at Liberia called the Commercial Banking Co which consisted of J. C. Minor and Gill and Co.; and he expected them to send him some money to pay his accounts in a short time. He had shipped a quantity of goods in the Pearl Ely and other vessels. He had been to some of the warehouses in Manchester.—The prisoner, in his defence, said that his tearing up the paper at the Liverpool police office was owing to his nervous system being affected in consequence of his having had the ague there.—There being no evidence to prove that the document purporting to be a letter of introduction from President Roberts was not actually signed by him, the prisoner was discharged.—Wood, on leaving the prisoner stated that he was a minister connected with the independent body of church, and that he had preached in Hoxton-street, London, and East Norwood Chapel, five miles from London. He also said that he had other appointments to preach, but had been prevented by sickness from fulfilling them. In his possession was found a letter addressed to a Baptist minister in Manchester, and requesting that he would allow him (Wood) to preach in his chapel, as he wanted to raise £5 to take him back to Liberia. This letter was sealed, but had not been delivered. Wood's manner, while at the bar at the Borough Court, was such as to convey the impression that he has been used to speaking either as a native preacher or in a similar capacity; and it also is recollected that of the coloured preachers who are frequently to be met with on our missionary platforms.

The above slip from the Manchester Guardian was forwarded from England to a gentleman here, for the purpose we presume, of enlightening the people of Liberia as to the character, and person employed from Alfred T. Wood [illegible] of the Providence Baptist Church," in this place. The thanks of the community are due to the gentleman who so kindly furnished this proof of Wood's fraudulent and criminal proceedings—and it is our duty—we owe it to ourselves, as well as to the British public, to caution them against the fraudulent transactions of the said Wood. Wood came to this Country in 1850. He brought with him toys, highly recommended for sale and sold them at extravagant prices, then he was employed to preach to the people, that he was educated for the ministry and graduated at Cambridge.

But he did not come to preach the gospel, and he did what good he could do preaching he was paid. Very soon after his arrival here he was employed by the above named church. He had not been invested with the church longer than nine months before he persuaded it, to take him over to England, where, he told them, he could collect funds for its purposes. A majority of the members left in with his views, and he left here in the bark "Clyde" and safely arrived under, in Liverpool. We are positively assured that he received no letters of recommendation to persons in England or elsewhere, unless, indeed, the authority granted him by the Church, to receive donations for it, be considered as such. Nor had he any authority to draw for monies on any individual in Liberia, or on any church. Any monies or merchandize, that Wood may have received on documents purporting to be signed by any individual or individuals in Liberia are rank forgeries. Nor has Wood sent any merchandize to Liberia as stated by him before the Borough Court—nor has President Roberts written, or authorized any letter recommending him or establishment to be a respectable man and worthy of credit" nor is there in Liberia any such institution, or firm as "Commercial Banking Co" consisting of J. C. Minor, and Gill and Co;"—all such representations are false—and all documents purporting to establish such declarations of Wood, are forgeries. Wood left here, having asserted several accounts—and owing several accounts for money, which he had borrowed under promises faithfully made to repay. It is supposed, by many persons, that Wood obtained, while here, several sums of money under false representations—but as he has written to a gentleman here, that he will pay all his accounts if bills are drawn on him for them we will say nothing about it. This may be some consolation to his creditors.

POETRY.

THE HOURS.

BY WILLIAM C. BRYANT.

The hours are viewless angels,
They still go gliding by,
And bear each moment's record up
To him who sits on high.

The poison or the nectar,
Our heart's deep flower cups yield,
A sample still they gather swift,
And leave us in the field.

And some fly by on pinions
Of gorgeous gold and blue;
And some fly on with drooping wing,
Of sorrow's darker hue.

And as we spend each minute
That God to us hath given,
The deeds are known before His throne,
The tale is told in heaven.

And we who walk among them,
As one by one depart,
Think not that they are hovering
Forever round our heart.

Like summer bees that hover
Around the idle flowers,
They gather every act and thought,
These viewless angel hours.

And still they steal the record,
And bear it far away
This mission right by day or night,
No magic power can stay.

So teach me, Heavenly Father!
To spend each flying hour,
That as they go, they may not show
My heart a poison flower.

The Ploughboy and the President

The President of a well known College in Kentuckey, was one morning, while sitting in his study, astonished by the entrance of a stranger.

The visitor was a boy of some seventeen years, rough and uncouth in his appearance, dressed in coarse homespun, with thick clumsy shoes on his feet, and a tattered felt hat on his head, surmounting a mass of uncombed hair, which relieved sweetly and somberest features, irradiated by eyes quick and sparkling, but vacant and inexpressive from want of education. The whole appearance of the youth, was that of an awkward, uncultivated ploughboy.

The President, an affable and venerable man, inquired into the business of the person who stood before him.

"If your please, sir," said the ploughboy with all the hesitancy of an uneducated rustic—"If you please, sir, I'd like to get some larnin." I heard you had a college in these parts, and I thought if I would work a spell for you, you would help me now and then in gittin an education."

"Well, my young friend," replied the President, "I scarcely see any way in which you might be useful to us. The request is something singular."

"Why, I can bring water, cut wood, or black boots," interrupted the boy, his eyes brightening with eagerness, "I want to get an education. I want to make something of myself. I don't care how hard I work, only so as I get an education. I want——"

He paused, at a loss for words to express his ideas, but there was a language in the expressive lip and glowing eye; there was a language in his manner—a tone in which these words were spoken that revealed at once to the President's feelings. He determined to try the sincerity of the youth. "I am afraid, my young friend, I can do nothing for you. I would like to assist you. I know of no way in which you can be useful to us," he said.

The President resumed his book. For a moment he glanced at the ploughboy who stood before him, working the brim of his hat. His forehead was rough but manfully worn one hand across his eyes were downcast, and his upper lip quivered and trembled as though he were endeavoring to repress strong and sudden feelings of disappointment. The effort was but half successful. A tear, emerging from the downcast eyelid, rolled over his sunburnt cheek, and with a quick, nervous action, the ploughboy dashed it away with his hardened hand and brushed away the sign of regret. He made a well-meant, but awkward mark of obeisance, and opening the door, had one foot across the threshold, when the President called him back.

The ploughboy was in a few minutes hired as a man of all work and boot-black to the ——— College.

The next scene which we give the reader, was in a new and magnificent church, rich with the beauties of architecture, and thronged by an immense crowd, who listened in deathlike stillness to the burning eloquence of the minister of heaven, who delivered the mission of his Master from the altar. The speaker was a man in the full glow of middle age, of striking and impressive appearance, piercing and intellectual eye, and high and intellectual forehead.

Every eye is fixed on him—every lip hushed, and every ear, with nervous intensity, drinks in the eloquent teaching of the orator.

Who, in all that throng, would recognize in the famed, the learned, the eloquent President of ——— College, Pennsylvania, the humble boot-black of ——— college, in Kentucky?—Southern Baptist.

Turn of Life.

From forty to sixty, a man who has properly regulated himself, may be considered as in the prime of life. His matured strength of constitution renders him almost impervious to the attacks of disease, and experience has given his judgment the soundness of almost infallibity. His mind is resolute, firm, and equal; all his functions are in the highest order; he assumes the mastery over business; builds upon competence on the foundation he has formed in early manhood, and passes through a period of life attended by many gratifications. Having gone a year or two past sixty, he arrives at a critical period in the road of existence; the river of death flows before him, and he remains at a stand-still. But athwart this river is a dam, called "The Turn of Life," which, if crossed in safety, leads to the valley of "old age," beyond which the river winds, and then flows beyond, without a boat or causeway to effect its passage. The bridge is, however, constructed of fragile materials, and it depends upon how it is trodden whether it bend or break. Gout, apoplexy, and other bad characters, also, are in the vicinity, to waylay the traveler, and thrust him from the pass; but let him gird up his loins, provide himself with a fitting staff, and he may trudge on in safety with perfect composure. To quit metaphor, the "Turn of Life," is a turn either into a prolonged walk, or into the grave. The system and powers having reached their utmost expansion, now begin either to close like flowers at sunset, or break down at once. One injudious stimulant—a single fatal excitement, may force it beyond its strength; while a careful supply of props and the withdrawal of all that tends to force a plant, will sustain it in beauty and vigor until night has entirely set.—Southern Baptist

The Wife's influence on her Husband's fortune.

A woman has her husband's fortunes in her power, because she may, or she may not, as she pleases, conform to his circumstances. This is her first duty, and it ought to be her pride. No passion for luxury or display ought for a moment to tempt her to deviate in the least degree from this line of conduct. She will find her respectability in it. Any other course is wretchedness itself, and inevitably leads to ruin. Nothing can be more miserable than the struggle to keep up appearance. If it could succeed it would cost more than it is worth: as it never can, its future involves the deepest mortification. Some of the sublimest exhibitions of human virtue have been made by woman, who have been precipited suddenly from wealth and splendor to absolute want.

Then a man's fortune are in a manner in the hands of his wife, inasmuch as his own power of exertion depends on her. His moral strength is inconceivably increased by her sympathy, her counsel her aid. She can add immensely by relieving him of every care which she is capable of taking upon herself. His employments are usually such as to require his whole time and his whole mind. A good wife will never suffer her husband's attention to be disturbed by details to which her own time and talents are adequate. If she be prompted by true affection and good sense she will perceive when his spirits are borne down, and overwhelmed. She of all human beings, can best minister to his needs. For the sick soul her nursing is quite as sovereign as it is for corporeal ills. If the wear in her assibility, it finds repose and refreshment. If he be harrassed and worn to an morbid irritability, her gentle tones steal over it with a soothing more potent than the most exquisite music. If every enterprise be dark, and hopes itself almost extinguished, her patience and fortitude have the power to rekindle them in the heart, and he again goes forth to renew the encounter with the toils and troubles of life.—Southern Baptist

TRUE SPHERE OF WOMAN.

Much has been said in our day of the exaltation of the female sex. Woman's highest glory is, after all, not in the far ringed arena, and jostling crowds of public life; but in those scenes where she shines unrivalled and indispensable, as the sister, the daughter, the wife and the mother; the guardian of weakness, the attendant of sickness, and the instructor of childhood. And the same law of heaven, irrepealable by all the vaunting philosophy of the times, that made her the mother made her influence on the outer fields and walks of society the most powerful when it was the least direct. It is the child that was borne and nursed at her heart, which reveals the character and portraiture of that heart to the age and the world. And thus it is, that woman's heart, as presented in the habits it has molded, and the graces it has fostered, and the charities it has taught, shines out from its own quiet and retired sphere of the household life, with a steady untroubled beam, on the dark and restless outer sea of public life. The great English statesman, Burke, alluding to the singular felicity of his own married life amid all the vexations and storms of his political career, said that all his cares deserted him the moment his foot crossed his own threshold. Thus indirectly, and by her influence on her husband, in soothing and sustaining him, the wife of the great English orator was most fully and most beautifully influencing the circles of political activity, through which Burke moved with such dazzling radiance. Was not the place thus filled by her a more womanly position, and the influence shed by her, indirectly and remotely, on the great revolutionary era, a more feminine and graceful influence than were claimed & assumed by her distinguished contemporaries, Mary Wollstoncraft in England and Madame Roland in France?—Such is, we conceive, by the law of Nature and Revelation, the part assigned to woman in the great drama of society. It is, on the inner world of the home, large, direct, and absorbing influence; it is, on the outer sphere of public life, less, and indirect and remoter influence. This isolation is for her own peace and honor. Like the Queen of Night she looks down as she "walk in her brightness," on the stormy ocean, not reached or blotted by the tempest below. They who would unsphere her hence would rob her of more than they add; and whilst claiming, like the tempter of old, to be both wiser and kinder to the sex than the God who made her, would lure Eve from the congenial shades of her native Eden of home, into scenes of strife, toil, and contamination; and leave that Eden dark, by the withdrawal of its gentle guardian, whom her Maker formed for retirement, and called alike to attend and adorn that fragment, yet spared of man's forfeited Paradise—that garden of the Lord—a prayerful and devout household—Rev W. R. Williams

CANINE INSTINCT.

We know nothing finer in story than that is better than a good dog story. The following if not the very best of the kind, is certainly a very excellent one, and may be relied on as strictly true. We give the well known names of the parties as vouchers:

Some three weeks since, Mr. Theo. Holbrook, of Milk street, broke up house keeping in Roxbury, and sent three of his children to S. Hadley, Mass., to attend school. On leaving home the children took with them their favorite spaniel dog, that had been their companion and playmate for eight years. He rode in the car with them to Hadley, and remained with the children during the afternoon, but the next morning was missing, and no where be found. The only trace that could be found of him was, that he had been seen crossing a toll bridge. Twelve days after the dog left Hadley, he arrived at his old home in Roxbury. But not finding his old friends there, he next called at Mr. William Whiting's, his master's next door neighbor, and sough admittance by scratching on the door. Mr. Whitings's family at once recognized him, and admitted him. He was very much exhausted, and very poor in flesh, and very hungry. Mr. Whiting's little girl immediately undertook the work of a nurse to the poor travel-worn spaniel. He rapidly improved under her care, and in a day or two commenced following her, and would not allow her to go ten steps without him. He insisted on following her even to school, and lying at her feet during school hours. And it was not until his old master came for him that he could be induced to leave his little friend.

The great question now for the curious to answer is: How could this dog find his way to Roxbury from South Hadley, a distance of 105 miles? He was carried all the way in the cars; & of course had no opportunity to see the road. And then again it is evident from the length of time occupied in the journey (twelve days,) that he did not come directly, for he probably would have travelled that distance in a day. He must have wandered many hundreds of miles before he struck some trail by which he could make his way homeward.—Boston Traveller.

HYMN.

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY

It is not meet for man, O Lord,
Who dwells in tents of clay,
To plant his hope upon the sands,
That waves may wash away.

Nor twine his love round broken reeds,
Or fix the thankless thorn.
Nor cast it on the frozen waste
Of falsehood and of scorn;

Nor gather gold in secret heaps,
Insatiate still for more,
To work the ruin of his hears,
Or swell a stranger's store:

But rather, while on earth below,
His fleeting life is lent,
In whatsoever state he is
Therewith to be content;

Place hope and love supreme on Thee,
To Thee confide his care;
And lay his treasure up in heaven,
And seek a mansion there.

CUFFEE TAKING NOTES.

A great many years ago, says the "Carpet Bag," when there were slaves in Massachusetts, and some of the best men in the community owned them, there was a clergyman in a town in Essex country, whom we may call Mr. Gogswell, who had a colored servant by the name of Cuffee. As was often the case, Cuffee had as much liberty to do as he pleased as any body else in the house; and he probably entertained a high respect for himself.

Cuffee, on the Sabbath, might have been seen in the minister's pew, looking round with a grand air, and, so far as appearances indicated, profiting quite as much by his master's preaching as many others about him.

Cuffee not ced, one Sunday morning, that several gentlemen were taking notes of the sermon; and he determined to do the same thing. So in the afternoon, he brought a sheet of paper, and pen and ink. The minister, happening to look down upon his pew, could hardly maintain his gravity when he saw Cuffee "spread out" before him, with one side of his face nearly buried in his jaw, and his tongue thrust out of the mouth. Cuffee kept at his task as busily as though the sermon was concluded, for he was nothing, and cared as little, about the amendment of his master.

When the minister returned home, he sent for Cuffee to come into his study.

"Well, Cuffee," said he, "what were you doing in meeting this afternoon?"

Doing, Massa! Taking notes!" was his reply.

"You taking notes!" exclaimed his master.

"Sartin, Massa; all the gentlemen take notes."

"Well let me see them," said Mr. Gogswell.

Cuffee thereupon produced his sheet of paper, and his master found it scrawled all over with all sorts of marks and lines, as though a dozen spiders, dipped in ink, had marched over it.

"Why, this is all nonsense," said the minister, as he looked at the "notes."

Well, Massa," Cuffee replied, "I thought so all the time you was preaching!

TO TAKE INK OUT OF LINEN.—Take a piece of tallow, melt it, and rub the spotted part of the linen into the melted tallow; the linen may be washed, and the spots will disappear, without injuring the linen.—Exchange paper.

A LITTLE TOO LATE

There is a class of persons who appear to be born or brought up under the sad fatality of being always a little too late. This seems to be the rule of their life, for it takes place with surprising regularity. It would almost appear that the clock by which they regulated their actions could not be made to keep pace with the common time-piece, and they were fated to a laxity by its tardy movement. They are not found to be occasionally late, but are invariably so many minutes behind the proper hour. After careful examination, we have discovered that the space of ten minutes is the common degree of difference between this order of men and the rest of mankind. Among them are some of the most diligent, laborious, and calculating of our species, yet they are ten minutes too late for every occupation.

A gentleman of our acquaintance, who is subject to this mental affection, if so it may be termed, is one of the most shrewd and active persons of the neighborhood; but nobody who knows him expects him to be in time for any engagement at home or abroad. Ten minutes are always allowed for his appearance. His friends have always rallied him on the subject, and he takes their banters with the utmost good humor, knowing himself to be in fault, although this consciousness does nothing towards curing him of the malady. He has sometimes suffered great inconvenience in his transactions with strangers, and even sustained pecuniary loss through his tardiness; but he seems to have no moral power to step over the little chasm by which he is seperated from the marching hour of the world. He was advised by an acquaintance to rise a little earlier than usual one fine summer morning, that he might overtake Father Time, and keep beside him all the day. With considerable effort he did raise at half-past seven instead of twenty minutes to eight, but he was not at his business till ten minutes past nine. His friend did not understand the nature of the disease, but thought it originated from sloth: no such thing—he is a most industrious man. We found however, upon very careful investigation, that there is a tincture of carelessness about his habits; not only a tincture. In all he does, one small flaw may be detected by a minute observer. He forgets to say something though it is a mere trifle; he omits one of his engagements, but one of no importance; he narrates an incident very accurately, but leaves out one of the circumstances. He dresses in a neat style, but probably goes out without a handkerchief (it is in one pocket of his other coat), or there is a hole in one of his gloves which he has neglected to have repaired; and he sometimes dines home having done all his business, but without his umbrella or walking-stick.

We hoped that the punctuality of railways might possibly cure our neighbor, as frequently had occasion to travel on a particular road. He used seldom to take a place in the stage coach lest he might be too late, but trusted to there being a vacant seat inside or outside, with which he was content. But when the business was important, and he had previously secured a place in the conveyance, the guard knew his haunts, and for the expected sixpence compensated the loss of starting by finding some cause for five minutes' delay; and if this did not suffice, the coach would drive wildly through the streets till the passenger overtook them in a "Hansom's patent" at full gallop. But the "fair-trader" was knocked up by the railway. Many were the warnings he now received that the steam-trains, like time and tide, wait for no man, and he buckled up his courage for the next occasion. Being advised that he should be at London Bridge ten minutes before the time of starting, he made a desperate effort to be punctual. He rose before half-past seven, but was not ready for breakfast till five minutes past eight. He lost the other five minutes in opening his portmanteau to put in a small article which he had forgotten. Still he was ready to enter the cab at ten minutes to nine, and it was not a full mile to the station. He congratulated himself upon the ease with which the distance would be cleared, and already began to bless the railway for curing him of his inveterate lateness. Mr. Cabdriver lustily and reached the north end of London Bridge at precisely five minutes to nine. Two or three minutes were amply sufficient to find him at the booking office. He had never missed a train in his life, for he would have two hours to spare rather than be late. But some cart-wagons blocked up the way, and the cab was brought to a stop, and the driver, getting down, not only had extricated his vehicle and horse speedily into the station, only finished his cigar's whistle while paying for the ticket. He was told to run; and he gained the platform to see the train move off majestically before him, like a ship in full sail. "Stop, stop!" To be sure they had often stopped for him; but steam engines have no ears, and the engineer is deaf to every sound but that of the whistle. So he had to wait two hours for another train. When he reached his destination, his friends who were to wait at the station with a carriage had gone home, not expecting him to come that day; so he hired a coach and drove to their residence, entering the parlor just as the servant was clearing away the dinner things. Though much mortified, he laid the whole blame of his disaster upon the thoughtless wagoners who obstructed the bridge; and next time, instead of being ten minutes earlier in starting, he went round by a different way. We have consulted several physicians, physiologists, and natural philosophers on the subject, asking them to explain the phenomena of this habitual lateness; but we cannot learn the cause of the complaint, nor obtain a remedy for our very worthy friend; so that we fear he must continue to the end of his life "a little too late."

A Hasty Pudding Coonoat,

BY GILMORE SIMMS.

Lieut. PORGY, was a man of some education, not deficient in conduct and courage befitting a soldier, but—as his name implies—overmuch given to the flesh-pots of Egypt.

Porgy and his companion during the war of 1812, had been out on an excursion, and being surprised by the enemy at a friend's house, made their escape, and taking with them several cooking utensils and their contents, made preparations to give the bold dragoons a warm reception. They separated. Porgy, with the pot-hooks with pot depending still in one hand, and the hominy stick in the other, looked up only to discover a dragoon leisurely marching down upon him, and but a few steps off. He cast his eyes about him for his sword, but it lay where he had been sitting, to the windward of the fire, fully ten paces off. Here was a quandary. The dragoon was in the act of picking his teeth when he first saw him; he had now deliberately drawn out his sabre. Porgy's glanced at his sword, and a slight slip backward, moved the Scotchman to suspect a case of flight; to prevent which the latter rushed directly upon him, his weapon now flourishing in the air.—The bulk of Porgy, the nearness of the enemy, and the distance at which his sword lay, forbade the hope of recovering it in season for his defence, and as the dragoon darted on him, obeying a fresh impulse, our epicure raised the pot by the rangers with the left hand, cauger one of its still burning feet in the right, and with a desperate whirl, sent the entire contents of the vessel, scalding hot, directly into the face of his assailant. The effect was equally awful and instantaneous. The dragoon droped the mutilated sabre, and set up the wildest yell of agony, while he danced about as if under direct spells of Saint Vitus. The hominy stuck on his face and neck like a plaster, and the efforts to remove it with his hand only tore away the skin with it. Porgy was disposed to follow up his success; and knocking the fellow on the head with the empty vessel, was a performance which was totally unresisted. In the agony of the dragoon, his approach for this purpose was totally unseen. Down he rolled, under the wild shock of the iron kettle; and our hero, congratulating himself with his narrow escape, seized upon the frying-pan, not disposed to lose his bacon as well as his bread, and was wheeling to make off to the woods, when another dragoon made his appearance on the brow of the hill, making swift tracks in pursuit.

"Long coat fellow, Lance," muttered Porgy to himself "he has left me to be butchered."

He girth'ed up his sword as a point of honor, but still held a fond gripe upon the frying pan.

There was but one dragoon in the chase, and if he could draw him yet further into the woods, the noise of the strife would probably alarm to other—that is, if the howlings of the first had not given the alarm already. Our epicure, as we know, had sword and frying-pan in his hands, he made very awkward headway.

The Porgy was already preparing to wheel about for the purpose of defence, when his feet tripped in some root that was along the surface, and over he went, headlong, the contents of the frying-pan flying forward in all directions. In another moment, and when only half recovering—on his knees still, and painfully rising to his feet—the dragoon stood above him.

"Surrender you miserable ribil, or I shortin you by the shoulders!

Furious at the loss of both meat and bread, Porgy roared out his defence:

"Surrender be hanged! Do I look like the man to cry peccavi to such a sawney as you! Do your best, bowlegs, and see what you'll make of it!"

With unexpected agility, unable to rise, he rolled over at these words, and now lay upon his back, his sword thrust upwards, and prepared to parry that of the assailant, after a new fashion of defence. In this situation no defence could well be made. The exhibition was, in fact rather ridiculous than otherwise. The abdomen of Porgy rose up like a mountain, seeming to invite the attack. The dragoon, however, did not appear to see anything amusing in the spectacle. He showed himself in sober earnest. His brother soldier groaned hideously at this moment, and he had no reason to doubt that his hurt was mortal. He straddled the prostrate Porgy, and to reply to his defiance, prepared to strike with his broad claymore, the head of the epicure. His sabre was thrown up, that of Porgy was thrown out to receive it, when suddenly the dragoon drooped lifeless upon our partisan, and the next instant the report of a rifle was heard from the neighboring woods.

"Ah?" cried Porgy, throwing off the incumbent body of his assailant, "that dog, Lance; he has not abandoned me, and I should be—knows that he owes would. "he rascal, how I do love him!"

Deacon Smith's Bull—or Mike Fink in a Tight Place.

Mike Fink, a notorious Buckeye hunter, was contemporary with the celebrated Davy Crockett, and his equal in all things appertaining to human prowess. It is even said that on one occasion in his neighborhood I know the creek of his rifle, and would take to the second 'nother places on the first intimation that Mike was 'bout. Yet, strange though it is true, he was on little known beyond his immediate settlement."

When we knew him, he was an old man—the frosts of seventy winters had silvered o'er his head, and taken the elasticity from his limbs; yet in the whole of his life, was Mike never worsted except on one occasion. To use his own language he never 'gin in, 'usaid us, to any 'that traveled on two legs or four," but once.

"That once, we want," said Bill Slasher as some dozen of us sat in the bar-room of the old tavern in the settlement.

"Gin it to us, now, Mike—you've promised long enough, and you're old now, and needn't care," continued Bill.

"Right, right! But," said Mike, 'but we'll open with a licker all round, fust, it'll kind o, save me fechin's I reckon"——

"Thar, that's good Better than t'other barrel, if anything!"

"Well boys," commenced Mike, "you may talk o' your scrimages, tight places, and sich like, and sarcumstances alogies in one 'mighty big'n and they ain't no more to be compared to the one I war in, than a dead kitten to an old shebar. I've fout all kinds o' varmints, from an Injin down to a rattlesnake; and never was will'n to quit fust, but this one—and I was with a Bull!

"You see, boys, it was an awful hot day in August, and I war much runnin' off into parsile, when I war thinkin' that a dip in the creek mout save me. Well, there was a mighty nice place in old Deacon Smith's medder for that partic'lar bizzaess. So I went down amongst the bushes to unharness. I just rolled the old red shirt over my head, and was thinkin' how scrumptious a feller of any size would fell a wallerin' round in that ar water, and was just 'bout goin' in, when I seed the old Deacon's bull a makin a B-line to whar I stood.

"I know'd the old cuss, for he'n shar'd more people than all the persons o' the 'settlement,' and come mighty near killin' a few. Thinks I, Mike, you're in rather a tight place—get your fixins on, or he'll be a drivin' them big horns o' his in yer bowels afore that time! Well, you'll hev to try the old varmint naked' I reck'n.

"The Bull were on one side o' the creek and I on t'other, and the way he made the sile fly for a while, as if he war a diggin' my grave, war distress'.

"Come on, ye bellerin old heathen, said I, and don't be standin' thar; for as the old Deacon says of the devil, yer not comely to look on.

"This kind o' reached his understanding,' and made him more wishious; for he hoofed a little like; and made a dreve. And as I don't like to stand in anybody's way I gin him plenty o' searoom! So he kin'd o' passed by me and come out on t'other side; and, as the captain o' th Mat Swamp Rangers would say—'bout face for nother charge."

"I'hough I war ready for 'im this time, he come mighty nigh runnin" foul o' me! So I, made up my mind the next time he went out he wou'at be alone. So when he passed, I grappled his tail, and he pull me out on the sile,' and as soon as we war both a' top of the bank, old Brindle stopp'd and war about commin' round again, when I begin pull'n t'other way.

"Well, I reck'n this kind o'riled him, for he first stood stock still and looked at me for a spell, and then commenced pawin; and bellerin,' and the way he made his hind gearin play in the air, was beautiful.

"But it warn't no use, he could'at fetch me so he kind o' stopped to get wind for southin' devilish, as I jedged by the way he started! By this time, I had made up my mind to stick to his tail as long as it stuck to his backbone! I didn't like to holler for help nuther, kase it war agin my principle, and the Deacon had preachin' at his house, and it warn't far off nuther.

"I know'd if he heern the noise, the hull congregation would come down; and as I warn't a married man and had a kind o'hankerin arter a gal that was thar, I did'at feel as if I would like to be seed in that ar predicament.

"So says I' you old serpent, do your cussedest, And so he did, for he drug me over every bitter and stump in the field, until I war sw—t and bleedin' like a fat bear with a pack o' hounds at his heels. And my name a'n't Mike Fink, if the old critter's tail and I didn't blow out some time at a dead level with the varmint's back.

"So you may kalkelate we made good time—Brindle, he reckoned a little, and then I arter him for a spell, for I jest dropped behind a stump and tore snubbed the critter! Now, says I, you'll mount up this ere white oake—break all yer tail!—or jest hold on a bit till I blow!

"Well, while I war sittin thar, an idea struck me that I had better be gettin out o' this in some way. But how adzackly, was the pint. If I let go and run, he'd be foul o' me sure.

"So lookin' at the matter in all its bearings, I came to the conclusion that I'd better let somebody know whar I was. So I gin a yell loud'er than a locomotive whistle, and it warn't long afore I seed the Deacon's two dogs a comin' like as if they war seein which could get thar fust.

"I know'd who they war arter—they'd jine in and agin me, I wor sartain, for they war orful venemous and had a spite agin me.

"So says I, old Brindle, as ridin is as cheap as walkin' on this route, if you've no objections, I'll jest take a deck passage on that ar back o'yourn. So I warn't long getten' astride o'him, then if you'd bin thar you'd 'ave sworn thar warn't nothin' human in that ar mix! the sile flew so orfully as the critter and I rolled round the field—one dog on one side and one t'other, try'n to clinch my feet.

"Well, I reck'n I rid about an hour this way, when old Brindle thought it was time to stop and get a supply of wind and cool off a little!—So when we got round to a tree that stood thar, he nat'rally halted.

"Now, says I, old boy, you'll lose one passenger sartain. So I just clum upon a branch kalkelatin to roost thar till I starved, afore I'd be rid round in that ar way any longer.

"I war a makin tracks for the top o' the tree, when I heard suthin a makin an orful buzzin over head. I kinder look' up, and if thar warn't—well ther's no use a swearin now, but it was the biggest hornet's nest ever built!

"You'll 'gin m' now, I reck'n, Mike, case thar's no help for you. But an idea struck me then, that I'd stand a heap better chance a ridin the bull than whar I was. Says I, old feller, if you'll hold on I'll ride to the next station, unyow, let that be whar it will.

"So I just drapped aboard him agin, and looked aloft to see what I'd gain'd in changin quarters; and, gentlemen, I'm a liar if thar warn't nigh a half a bushel of the stingin' varmints ready to pitch into me when the word 'go' was gin.

"Well, I reck'n they got it, for 'all hands' started for our company. Some on 'em bit the dogs—about a quart stuck on me, and the rest charged on old Brindle.

"This time, the dogs led off first, dead bent for the old Deacon's, and as soon as old Brindle and I could get under way we followed! And as I war only a deck passenger and had notnin to do with steerin the craft, I swore if I had we shouldn't have had run that channel any how.

"But, as I said afore, the dogs took the lead, Brindle and I next, and the hornets dre'kly arter. The dogs yellen'—Brindle bellerin, and the hornets buzzin and stingin! I didn't say nothin, for it warn't no use.

"Well, we'd got about two hundred yards from the house, and the Deacon hern us and come out. I seed him hold up his hand and turn white. I reckoned he was prayin, then for he didn't expect to be called for so soon, and it warn't long before the hull congregation, men women and children, cum out, and then all hands went to yellin.

"None of 'em had the fust notion that Brindle and I belonged to this world. I just turned my head and passed the whole congregation. I see the run would be up soon; for Brindle couldn't turn an inch from a fence that stood dead ahead.

"Well we reached that fence, and I went ashore, over the old critter's head, landing on 'tother side, and lay thar stunned. It wan't long afore some o' 'em as was scared, cum round to see what I war. For all hands kalkelated that the Ball and I belonged together. But when Brindle walked off by himself they seed how it war, and one o' 'em said—Mike Fink has got the wust of the scrimmage once in his life!'

"Gentlemen, from that day I dropped the courting bizzines, and never spoke to a gal since. An I when my hunt is up on this yearth, thar won't be no more FINKS. And it is all owin to Deacon Smith's Brindle Bull!"

WESTERN AFRICA.

The Westmins'er Review, contains an article of great interest, and considering the subject of great importance, having reference to the Western or slave coast of Africa. It affords the clearest and fullest insight into the interior life and habits of this great nursery of slavery, in which Christian civilization remorselessly trafficked for so many successive ages that has yet met the public gaze. An intimate and accurate knowledge of the subject treated of is as legible and as intelligent on these pages, as the nervous and racy language in which it is revoled. The writer wins your admiration until it become a belief, and you feel not alone that he speaks of things within his knowledge, and that his delineation is but the expression of his convictions.

The existing condition of things; the state of the people mental and social, their actual being as a people, are the first inquiries which naturally suggest themselves when we get a glimpse at the original sources of this enslaved race with whom we are so fatally associated. And in this instance we see what we were not prepared for by any previous account. Settled habitations, owner-ship and cultivation of the soil, manufacture of iron, gold and cotton goods, fortified towns, grades in society, responsible government, and even the institution of domestic slavery, that truest type of an advanced civilization, present themselves to our astonished view. The fortifications are rude; mud walls and stockades, and the huts nearly as bad as some of those of the poorer Irish, but more cleanly. Of the fortifications it may be observed, that they are adapted to their use, and perhaps more tenible, considering the means of attack, than the fortifications of Paris when assailed by all the modern appliances of civilized warfare; and as to the huts, their superiority over the Irish depends in a great measure, we opine on the fact that the climate is intolerable, and has saved them from English dominion. A more intimate connection with the Government would adjust the equation of the social destiny of Irishman and African.

This description applies to the African nations or tribes on the coast, some of which are far in advance of others, and all of which are in advance of the tribes in the interior, who are inaccessible in general to Europeans. The former are divided into several distinct nations. Most of them are Mohammedans, forbidden by their religion from holding or selling Mohammedan slaves, and therefore, as a general rule, the powerful tribes of that religion, and even the weak ones, cannot be enslaved. The principal tribes at the Gambia are the Joliffes, the Mandingoes, the Foolahs or Felatans. The Mandingoes are the landed class—the proprietary, as they would be called in England. They rent out their lands to the Foolahs to feed their flocks, and to other neighboring tribes for agricultural purposes.—For themselves, they are addicted to aristocratic pursuits—war, excess and idleness. The Joliffes, the remaining tribe, are said to be intelligent and well-looking, and are generally mechanics.

The Foolahs are not all engaged in herding; one section of them are given to war, and perhaps a little plunder. But the great agricultural section forms a very interesting nation. Their traditions, habits, sports, festivals, &c., are no doubt national and characteristic, but approach European nations so closely in refinement, and a view to taste in dress, as to become interesting to the traveler.

In their religious opinion, the whole of the Mohammedan population is divided into two great sects—the Marabouts, who adhere strictly to the laws of the Prophet, and the Sonnachee who eat swine's flesh and get as drunk as Christians. We are not told whether they have any martyrs, or, in fact, whether a Sonnachees is proscribed. The intelligent reviewer does not enlighten us on this branch of African politics.

The responsibility and constitutionality of Government is exemplified in an account of an interesting discussion which took place in reference to an innovation proposed by the English surgeon, namely, vaccinating children for the purpose of averting the fatality of the small-pox, whose ravages had been very general. More than one king called together his council to submit the proposal to the concrete wisdom. They usually assembled under a great tree, perhaps of a thousand years' growth. The chiefs and sages here debated the question, and, singular to say, in every instance the popular opposition to the innovation was based on the privilege of the council to control the regal power. The argument somewhat resembled the canal opposition reasoning. They were partially indifferent to the issue—whether vaccination was good or bad, safe or dangerous—but whether it did not infringe on the constitutional right of the council. We find, however, that the logic did not prevail; nor are we informed whether the Sonnachees—the patriotic rum-drinkers—resigned the dodge or not. In one instance this extreme sacrifice was rendered unnecessary; for as soon as the council had king, after grave deliberation, decided in favor of the sanatary reform, the lady mammas scampered off to the woods with their sable angels to save them from the profanation. Perhaps, indeed, the opposition was pushed to extremes with the view of showing the English, who did everything, and said everything, concluding their prayers, in the name of her gracious Majesty, how much more circumscribed were their rulers, and how much more securely their liberties were guarded. However that may be, the reform is progressing, and by degrees the mammas and the patriots are yielding to its salutary influence.

The laws of the Africans in respect to debtors are stringent and severe, and here is the fountain and spring of the domestic institution of slavery. If the debtor fail to satisfy his obligation he becomes the chattel of his creditor, and once a slave, he and his offspring are slaves for ever. Not alone this, but in many instances, if the debtor himself escape, any of his family or relations, or even tribe, can be sold to "serve out" with his progeny for ever. These are cruel laws, but they are scarcely more cruel than hanging a man or woman for petty larceny, stealing 2-6d. worth, and such was the laws of England within our memory. Further, the African law has had a far more salutary effect, for there prevails among the mercantile community on the Gambia the most perfect sense of security and no where in the world is property more secured than among the African population.

We have mentioned one source of slavery. Another and a more fruitful one is war. Every captive taken in war becomes thereby a slave forever. The victor can hold him or sell him at his pleasure. And in general the idea that he is a Mohammedan will not avail him. In the din and tumult of war, there as elsewhere, the voice of justice, mercy and truth is unheard.

The commerce of these settlements is rapidly increasing, and promises a rich return to those who engage in it. The demand of the natives for various articles of wear, with them articles of virtu, is scarcely to be satisfied, and there is no doubt but the productions of the country, which are absolutely without limit, can be had in exchange on terms most profitable. On this head we let the article before us speak for itself.

"The palm oil alone imported into England, is now of the value of more than $800,000. In 1835 forty-seven bushels of ground nuts were exported from the Gambia; at present between 8,000,000 and 9,000,000 bushels are annually exported. The palm ceases to flourish two miles from the sea, but the Shea Butter tree is to be found throughout the whole of the interior. The Shea Oil is worth from £1 to £1 a ton more than the Palm Oil, but as soon as water communication exists, it can be sold as cheaply as the Palm Oil.

The produce of Indigo and Cotton can be increased ad libitum. Skill and proper direction and enterprise, and facilities of transit can be so arranged and provided as to make the cost price less than one fifth. A great country is there, and needs only care and cultivation. That it will receive them, the success of Englishmen is a sufficient guarantee. We agree, however, with the writer, that if trade and Christianity were made a little more dependent on one another, both would prosper better. They do not seem to travel pari passu, for while the former is flourishing the latter seems sadly unprosperous, and the native strikes a balance between the sailor and the missionary, somewhat neutralizing in its effects. The association is, he thinks, a bad one, & while he wishes ardently, for cheap cotton, beads and trinkets, they would be acceptable to him on their own merits, while no doubt, when he comes to appreciate the Word of God, he will find it sufficiently convincing and consoling without the other adjunct.

The reviewer furnishes a sublime picture of brute nature in all the untamed majesty of the clime, softened by a back ground of verdure and forest grandeur in repose. But we have considered the paper in a different point of view, and shall not follow the writer into this agreeable field of inquiry.

DUELING ANECDOTES AGAIN.

From Bentley's Miscellany.

There is a trait in Irish character which I have always considered to be naturally convivalous, and that is to generally dislike to seek in courts of law a satisfactory compensation for honor outraged through woman's folly. In England, reparation for loss of services is considered a thing as correctly reclamable as loss of profit on a broken contract for a cargo of seal-oil or guano, while in her sister kingdom, in nine cases out of ten, the man who works upon the weakness of a wife, or trifles with the affections of a sister, is not subjected to the assessment or amounts of injury by the computation of a jury, but summoned to give personal satisfaction in the field. Many a fatal case, recorded in the annals of Irish dueling, will tell how frequently profligate success has paid, in turn, a bloody penalty.

In caricaturing Milesian manners and feelings, it has been asserted that you could not look at a Cork lady at a supper-table but she graciously murmured, "Port, if you please!" or dance a second time with a man's sister, that he was not certain to drop in next morning before you dressed, to inquire whether your intentions to the young lady were matrimonial. That a number of unhappy marriages have been effected by pistol-intervention, is too true; and I recollect one sad case where the love was on the lady's side, and a fine-spirited and honorable young fellow, with all before him that could promise happiness was suddenly removed from existence ere the third week closed that followed his flight as soon as could be effected.

R—— was remarkably handsome, and those personal advantages were enhanced by the total unconsciousness that he possessed them. A young lady saw, loved—and remembering what Viva's friends suffered from concealment, she avowed the dawn of her attachment, and interested in the slightest degree the state of his affections. In reply, poor R—— coldly confessed his devotion to [illegible] and would [illegible] Mercury, would [illegible]

He was [illegible] handsome, self-willed, [illegible] R——, in fortune, was dependent, but [illegible] The [illegible] her refusal—and [illegible] to a man now fearfully [illegible] this woman who, perverting [illegible] should be [illegible] solicitudes, what she would conceal, and is rejected!

"Heaven has no rage like love to hatred turned Or hell a fury like a woman spurned."

And for whom had her hand and fortune been declined? The daughter of a village curate; rich in nothing but youth, and innocence, and beauty.

The devil never prompts a delinquency, that he does not manage to supply a tool. George Pemberton was Harriette's kinsman, a Lieutenant in the—th, wretchedly poor, and his regiment an expensive one. His manners were assuming; and, with an empty purse, how many slights will an ill tempered individual experience should he have the misfortune of being gazetted to crack corps! George Pemberton was returning, on leave between returns, to raise a small sum of money; or, failing, to sell out; and he found his cousin Harriette all alone, five minutes after the——Chronicle had been received, detailing, in glowing language, the beauty of the bride, as being in perfect keeping with that of the handsomest man who for years, had sworn conjugal allegiance at the altar. "The happy couple," the paper added, "had gone to——to spend the honeymoon."

I [illegible] frames of men [illegible] circumstances, the [illegible] on right of [illegible] and have [illegible] her [illegible] and drew me face away and, [illegible] your [illegible] and sympathetic [illegible] observe —

"[illegible] George; for [illegible] you [illegible] to kiss!"

A [illegible] "Way Ha[illegible] to [illegible] you [illegible] you [illegible]"

The lady's nerves contracted a [illegible] roughly [illegible]

"Enough! no more of this. I know your business here. You want two hundred pounds, and my father will not advance as many pence, were it to save your neck, and not your commission."

"Then I must send in my papers, and leave the—th."

"Unless some fool is found who will lend money to a gentleman, who, on six shillings a day, keeps a pair of hunters!" observed the lady.

Pemberton looked sulky and displeased.

"Nay, George, on my conscience, thou art ill-favored enough without knitting those beetle-brows together. I have the money. Would you earn it?"

"'would go to the devil,' was the reply, "rather than quite the—th from sheer poverty. What shall I do?"

She turned her dark and lighting eyes on his, and, after a pause of half a minute, pointed with her finger to the paragraph which announced the hated marriage. Then, dropping her voice to an emphatic whisper, she laid her lips close to her kinsman's ear—

"Read—Spoil me that honeymoon—the money's thine!"

And without waiting a reply, she hurried to her own apartment.

Never did the arch-enemy of man select a better agent than George Pemberton. To a currish temper, he united a sufficiency of animal courage to make him dangerous; and secret influences, with which his revengeful kinswoman was totally unacquainted, fitted him for the task. He knew that his retirement from a regiment, officered by men of property, and to whom he had made himself obnoxious by the idle attempt of veiling poverty under insolence, would be felt a triumph. But deadlier feelings towards the husband of Lucy Meadows, urged him on to vengeance. He had secretly, but passionately, loved her; and she had neither tact nor prudence to conceal a personal dislike, amounting to aversion. Keeping in the back ground the real causes which induced him to attempt the life of one—to whom he could plead no injury—an alleged slight to his fair cousin would form a very pretty quarrel," and with a congenial spirit as dauntless as his own, he set off, without delay, to the retired watering place, where the Lord sometimes of the manor that Connaught could produce, were, in their own belief, entering on an elysian existence.

The barbarous punctilio of the times—provided a man could boast gentle lineage—almost prohibited an appeal to his call for satisfaction, no matter how flimsy the pretext might be, under which he declined a hostile meeting, and Pemberton availed himself of it.

It was even so. R—— had been engaged in answering congratulatory letters, and had proceeded with his billet to the post. Lucy watched him from the parlor window, and thought her husband never looked so handsome as when, in turning the corner, he smiled and kissed his hand. She gazed at the sun, sinking gloriously in the far west, and in a flood of gold hiding his broad disc in the boundless waters of the Atlantic. Alas! she little dreamed, poor girl, that

"The noon that rose
An hour promised rapture in the close"

was fated to usher in a night on whose deep, deep darkness, a ray of hope should never break again.

Pemberton and his companion waylaid their intended victim; but R—— felt himself too blessed with Lucy to risk aught that could interrupt his happiness. Against the imputed offense, he temperately remonstrated, and repudiated all intention of wounding the feelings of the lady, whose imaginary wrongs were made the basis to rest a quarrel on. A meeting he declined; at least until he could send for and consult a friend. From insolence, Pemberton proceeded to verbal and at last to personal insult. R——'s was a brave and manly spirit. Good Heaven! to feel the ruffian's whip upon his shoulders, and not resent the outrage! His temper yielded; he longed to wipe disgrace away in blood. He urged delay no longer: demanded instant satisfaction; hurried into the inn garden, and, within ten minutes from the time he waved a passing—little did he fancy it a last—adieu, R——was stretched, in death, upon the bowling green!

What Lucy suffered may be readily conceived. Human misery could not go farther: in one sheer plunge, to reach, from the very pinnacle of mortal happines, the darkest abyss of despair. The imagination must fill out what fancy cannot pencil.

And how did she feel—she, that guilty woman, when

"The ruin that her rashness wrought" was told her?

Before her emissary had accomplished half his journey, Harriette's better feelings had regained ascendency, and, when too late, she would have given thousands to have recalled her hireling kinsman. In charity, we will hope that her wounded pride sought vengeance short of destruction. Indeed, the effect of the sad intelligence, when it arrived, would go far to prove that such was the case. She was convulsed, fevered, delirious for two months after, and recovered strength only by the loss of reason; and in a few years after closed her wretched existence in an asylum.

I often called to memory the truth of Father Malachi's dooling deductions—for the finale to the careers of Messieurs Andrews and Pemberton, proved them correct to the letter. Both died violent but inglorious deaths

Frank Andrews, some half-dozen years after he had placed the house of Sneivë-nagarrew in mourning, repaired to the metropolis on business. The evening he arrived in Dublin he contrived to fasten a quarrel on a linendraper, whose sister he had insulted at the theater, and hurried the devoted tradesman by the first dawn of day to "the twelve acres." The hour of retribution had come—for a man whose hand never clasped before a deadlier implement than a cloth-yard, contrived to pop, par accidens, a quarter of an ounce of lead into the pericardium of Mr Francis Andrews.

Well, though he fell in the bar of honor, still, the artiste who sped him was a linendraper; that was certainly a sad drawback: but, if Mr Andrew's exit was not the thing, Mr. Pemberton's was even less destingue

Never had homicide the permission of Irish gentlemen, promised more satisfactory results to its perpetrator. The transmission of Harriette and her father—the former to a madhouse and the latter to a grave—occurred within the month &, as heir-at-law Mr George Pemberton succeeded to the armigerent of the estates and custody of the lunatic. Mr Pemberton determined that during his life his fair cousin should continue in seclusion, and for years kept his word.

It was a gray Autumnal evening, when Pemberton, who had taken formal possession of his uncle's house, was carrying two strangers home to supper, whose acquaintance he had made that morning at the fair of——. I may here necessary to remark, that R—— had a natural brother, to whom he had been generous & kind, and who had been often overheard vowing eternal vengeance on the destroyer of his kinsman. He took his mother's surname—was called "Gilligin Galligin, but, by the country people was better known by the sobriquet of Liaume Vaddagh (Long William) Eight months had elapsed since ——was killed by Pemberton, and people began to say that George was safely seated in his saddle." To this opinion those dissented. Liaume Vaddagh," before his kinsman's death, had been held in light estimation. He drank freely, headed faction-fights, & more than once, had been hinted at in chapel as a gay deceiver. But a marvelous change since his brother's death had come over his wild youth—whiskey never passed his lips; no inducement, at fair or market, could sink him in a faction-fight—his youthful companions declared he was bewitched—but older men shook their heads and hinted that the young Liaume Vaddagh under a quiet exterior, was of "more risk than a loaded blunderbuss." The old folks were right for "Long William" only took his time like the red Kirkpatrick, to strike surer.

Pemberton, although several monitions had been given him; remained in fancied security; and yet there were times that the aliened features of this wild young man, when coupled with his omnipresence in fair or market, or wherever else the place he frequented might be, cost some length in creating suspicion in the mind of Pemberton. At the fair on this day, he encountered Long William" more than once, and each time was struck with a more strange expression in his hits and appearance. Liaume Vaddagh had hitherto worn the dress of a peasant, and avoided spirits as he would poison. On this day his cable was a blood-red and he was more frequently seen with his "cinky" in his mouth. Whilst appeared to have departed. He drank deep to his brother's memory, maintaining that this was the birth day of the deceased.

One other circumstance requires a passing notice. Lucy had frequently requested that "Long William" would come to see her, aware how strong the attachment was, which had existed between her murdered husband and his wild half-brother. To every invitation the same answer was gratefully returned—"He would dutifully wait upon her, when his vow should be accomplished"—what the vow was none knew.

When evening came, and M. Pemberton had ordered his horses to the inn door, Liaume Vaddagh was seen, wrapped in his catamore, riding briskly from the market-town. The distance to

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, APRIL 22nd, 1852.

The brig "Julia Ford," George Drinkwater, master, arrived in our port from New Orleans, via Sinoe, on the 1st. instant. She brought out 47 immigrants—thirty eight of them, were landed at Sinoe, and nine at this place. The "Julia Ford" had a passage to Sinoe of 45 days.

This notice should have appeared in our last number, but through some inadverteney, it was left out.

At our latest dates, affairs in the leeward Counties were progressing in their usual quiet way. Nothing had transpired to disturb the peace and tranquility of the people. It is to be regretted however that the immigrants by the "Morgan Dix," continue to suffer severely in passing through their quarantine. They were landed in January last—not a very desirable period, for foreigners to land on our shores, with the intention of remaining.

The Brick making business is being carried on by quite a number of enterprising individuals. We hope that the price, in consequence of the great competition, will be considerably reduced.

We are anxiously waiting to learn if the proprietors of the Sawmills in Grand Bassa and Sinoe, have commenced operations. They will find a profitable market in Monrovia for large quanties of lumber. There are nearly a score of buildings in this town, which cannot be completed, until a supply of lumber comes from some quarter.

The French Republic and the Republic of Liberia.

We are happy to have the pleasure of informing our readers, that a Treaty of Amity and Commerce, has just been concluded between the Government of the French Republic and that of the Government of the Republic of Liberia. We are justified in stating, that the provisions of the Treaty are on the most liberal principles of a just reciprocity. Nothing was asked for on the part of the French Republic, that was not scrupulously just and correct—nor did the Republic of Liberia, express a wish that was not readily acceded to.

Prince Louis Napoleon Bonaparte was represented on this occasion by Monsieur Auguste Baudin, Knight Commander of the National order of the Legion of Honor—Post Captain and Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station, on the West Coast of Africa; and the President of the Republic of Liberia; commissioned on the part of this Government, the Honorable Hilary Teage, Secretary of State of this Republic.

Death of Commander Mc Donnell, Esqr.—J. J. Mc Donnal, Esqr. late Commander of Her Britannic Majesty's Sloop "Crane," expired on board his ship in this port, on the evening of the 16th, inst.—The deceased left England, we understand, in feeble health, and contrary to the advice of his medical advisers and friends. He had been on the coast but a very few months. His remains were landed the following day for interment: the funeral was well attended. Officers from the French flag ship "Thunder," and the U. S. ship "Dale"—the Brazillian Charge de Affairs—the President of Liberia and his suite,—and other civil and military officers joined the funeral procession, which was formed on the beach.

NAVAL.

April 3rd: Arrived H. B. M. Sloop Crane, J. J. Mc Donnall, Esqr. Commander, from Sierra Leone. On the morning of the 13th she came got under weigh and stood to sea—she returned to port the next day. She sailed on the 21st. for Sierra Leone.

On the 13th, The French steam ship of war Thunder, captain from France, bearing the broad pendant of Monsieur Auguste Baudin, Commodore & Commander-in-Chief of the French squadron on the West coast of Africa. She sailed on the 21st, for the leeward.

On the 14th. The United States Ship Dale, Captain J. L. Lardner, from a cruise to the leeward: all well.

On the 17th. H. B. M. Ship Penelope, Captain St. Lyster, 2 days from Sierra Leone, bearing the broad pendant of Commodore H. W. Bruce, Commander-in-Chief of H. B. M. squadron on the West Coast of Africa. She sailed on the 20th for the leeward.

On the arrival of the Penelope, she was saluted by the Dale, which was promptly returned. The Penelope saluted the Flag of the Republic which was promptly responded to. The French Ship Thunder exchanged salutes with the Republic and H. B. M. Ship Penelope.

Wilson and lady, and Rev. J. W. Roberts and lady.

POETRY.

STAR OF THE TWILIGHT.

By Mrs. Carlan.

Star of the twilight eve! oh I would stay
And gaze in you pure heaven on the calm light
I love thee more than all the beams o' day,
Or all the golden orbs that gem the night.

For always while thus beaming sweetly there
Over the dewy earth and breezy sea.
I know that my dear mother knelt in prayer,
And I wa blest, for then she prayed for me.

Then I have paused amid the fair and gay,
'Mid tones of mirth and music thrilling high,
And tured mine eyes to hail thy brightning ray,
When evening sunlight aded from the sky.

For always then, whether I was apart
From the gay throng or with the young and fair
A sacred awe came o'er my joyous heart,
Which gave an echo to that faithful prayer.

And when a stranger from my home far.
Exposed to danger, peril, gloom, and storm,
I felt secure for I believed her prayer
Would shield my trusting spirit from all harm

And when disease laid low my aching head
Upon a couch of pain, I felt no care;
I know all would be well, alive or dead,
In answer to that faithful mother's prayer.

But now my mother in her grave is laid,
Thy pensive beams rest on her place of sleep,
When soft winds sigh beneath the lonely shade
And twilight dews around her silent weep.

And I'm a wanderer thro a world of care,
For socials friends to glad my pilgrim way—
And when I look on thee, lone evening star,
I know I have no mother now to pray.

Yet from the sacred joy that thrills my heart,
As thus I gaze on thee, bri lit star of even,
I know in answer to those prayers I m lest—
Yes; ever blest since she went home to heaven.

THE BRITISH QUEEN AND PRINCE ALBERT.

The recent visit of Queen Victoria at nighting banquet of the Lord Mayor, with the sim. plicity of a subject without guard or parade, is quite a matter of exultation in the English prints; "it has shown to foreign strangers," says the European Times, "what a constitutional sovereign reigns in the heart of a free people and can go abroad amidst their rejoicings unprotected by glittering bayonets and military parade. The events of Wednesday will make an abiding impression on the thousands of continental visitors who are now in the British metropolis. A great gathering like this, where hundreds of thousands loaded the midnight air with vociferous virats that sprang from the hearts in favor of the ruler of a great people, and that ruler a woman, is one of the recognitions of her mild and gentle sway, which is at once complimentary to the sovereign herself, and to the intelligence and gallantry of the Queen, a bundant evidence was furnished before this great gathering of all nations at the Crystal Palace. Indeed, she has been the idol of the people from the first, and under no sovereign have they been seemingly more prosperous and happy; and could the oppressive burden of the establishmon be removed, perhaps no government would sui them better than the one under which they live. The husband of Her Majesty evidently stands nigh in public favor likewise, and the nation is well satisfied with both. The Times speaks thus of the Prince:

"Apart from the personal popularity of the Queen, much of the success of this gathering of the nations is undoubtedly to be attributed to Prince Albert, who from the first moment tha the project was entertained has devoted his mind and his energies to its accomplishment with a continuity of purpose, which shows at least that he is no laggard. The Prince is a man of large and comprehensive mind, with a sufficient dash of the cosmopolitan in his nature to square with the feelings and sympathies of the people of this sea girt isle. On the few occasions when he has appeared in public, his speeches have displayed a power and a depth of thought which show that even the highest station can be ennobled by the possession of the intellectual graces. With such a husband, the Queen of these realms is happy, and with the manly traits of his character, our preserving countrymen find their ambitions nobly and characteristically stimulated."

Should Prince Albert now set about an enterprise for the melioration of the condition of the great mass in wretchedness and pauperism in this opulent realm with the same energy and zeal that have marked his course in regard to the Crystal Palace with the aid he would receive from the Queen, what a great blessing he would be to the English nation, and how exalted would be his fame in the future annals of the world. A small portion of the overgrown wealth of the aristocracy wisely appropriated, would work wonders for the poor of Great Britain, whose condition is enough to give the Prince and the Queen daily the heart ache.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE HERALD

I was happy to see, in your paper of the 22nd inst, that there was at least one woman bold enough to stand forward and denounce the meetings held at Worcester, termed "Women's Rights Convention." I have read all your reports on that subject, and blush to think that any of my sex, of the gentle sex, as the "lords of creation" are pleased to name us, should so far forget themselves and their duties as to stand up and publicly acknowledge such unfeminine opinions. Tell me in what capacity, in what station, does a woman appear more honorable, more loveable, and more engaging, than in that of wife and mother! Behold her, hiding her little, helpless infant to rest with a low, sweet voice, the babe's eyes upturned to hers, with such loving, trusting confidence! See how smile is returned for smile; with what fondness the little one watches its mother's face, there to see approval or disapproval of its actions! And when, at last, it sweetly & softly lisps that dearest of all names, "Mother," who can express that fond parent's delight—who can tell how her heart palpitates with joy, and how, in her inmost soul, she blesses God for that treasure!

Again, behold the wife, the mother, at the couch of the sick. With what careful hand she smooths the pillow, bathes the aching, feverish brow, cools the parched lips, gently and soothingly replies to the impatient calls of the loved one helplessly prostrated there! With what anxiety, with what unremitting care and patience, she watches and awaits for returning consciousness, and how blest, how more than repaid, she feels when once again that pale face turns to her, the eye undimmed by fever, and the mouth now wreathed in grateful smiles. Women who stand up at those disgraceful meetings know not the pleasure of awaiting a husband's return to his cheerful fireside. They have never properly fulfilled the duties of a wife, or they would never wish to give up the delight of welcoming the father of their children at night, after his laborious duties of the day. What would man do if he returned to his home, knowing that there would be no wife to make his evening pass pleasantly, no sweet voice to soothe him when he is in trouble, no smile of affection to cheer him?

For what would woman renounce these, and many, many other pleasant occupations and duties, which I will not at present name, but which every right-minded woman must feel? To usurp man's place? Does she expect to shine brighter in court as a lawyer, in the pulpit as a preacher, or in the ranks as a soldier, than in the domestic circle? Does woman fear that man can do without her? Let her cast aside such fears—God created woman for man. Let us therefore remember this, and as the presiding deity of our homes, let us shine forth as bright and brilliant stars to guide our husbands to their abodes of peace and happiness. "Margaret" says truly, that "the names of wife and home are inseparable and equally sacred;" and, as long as man continues to look forward to home as his haven of rest after the toils of the day, so long will wife be a sacred name, that will ever be pronounced with feelings of love and reverence by him for whom we were created. I cannot help a feeling of dislike stealing over me when I think of our sex adopting the "Bloomer costume," or, to speak more plainly "wearing the breeches," which, in my opinion, is the incipient step to the election booths, gin shops, and gambling houses &c., &c., all of which must follow if she once usurps man's place. Then, tell me where will the respect be due to our sex, or, rather, will there be any respect due to them? Instead of our looking up to man as our protector, we shall have to stand by ourselves, act as firemen, or rather firewomen, perform military duty, chew tobacco, and drink rum as sailors. Our sons, our daughters, will become degraded beings, instead of noble men and gentlewomen. Farewell, then, to virtue, honor, peace, and happiness.

Women can hold no holier, no more sacred office, than that of wife and mother—let us then, endeavor to feel the responsibility of our station, and by fulfilling our duties to our husbands, in setting pure and virtuous examples to our sons and daughters, in early teaching them their several duties to their God, their fellow creatures, & themselves, let us place ourselves on a pedestal to which man will ever point with feelings of the holiest love and reverence.

CLARA.

A Congress of Republics.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK HERALD

BOSTON, Oct 25 1851.

The speech of Mr. Corey of Ohio upon our foreign policy, the Tammany Hall resolution, and your remarks thereon, as they appeared in the HERALD of Thursday, are causing some sensation here; and the matter is one which should, and doubtless very soon will, command the deep attention of every portion of our country.

The despots of the Old World are holding conclaves to weigh the danger they stand in from democracy, and to devise the best methods of suppressing it; and short sighted, indeed, must he be who supposes their efforts will be confined to the eastern continent. Roused by the brilliant example which our country affords of self government, and the happiness resulting therefrom, the oppressed millions of Europe have determined to cast off their fetters. From all its nations representatives are constantly reaching our shores, to swell our ranks and taste the blessings of liberty; every return mail bears back to their friends confirmation of the tidings which have excited the Old World—thus enlarging and fanning the discontent; while each steamship built, every improvement made in the same, widens and shortens the ocean bridge destined, ere long, to bear to their rescue American knighterrants of liberty.

With these facts before the world, is it reasonable to suppose that the monarchies of Europe will be content to combat the disease now sapping their vitals, and make no effort to reach the exciting cause? And in view of the avowed combination they have formed for the suppression of republicanism; of the far sighted craft, cunning and knavery, which have in all modern times marked their course, and the hellish disregard of justice, mercy and truth, evinced by them whenever they have an end to accomplish, is it wise, is it safe, to await at their hands a blow, before even thinking of preparation? Or, is it our nation's duty, as the most prominent & powerful of liberty's children, generously to shield the weaker, and prudently seek to fraternize with and unite all the republics of both continents?—in other words, send forth a call for a congress or republics?

The necessity for action of this kind may soon openly appear; Switzerland and the free cities of Germany are already threatened. The former, apprehensive of her danger, has already stretched forth to us her hand; though limited in extent, she presents, despite all secret attempts to produce anarchy and confusion within her borders, too successful an example of democratic government to be longer tolerated in the heart of Europe; and the sea ports of the latter present also a terminus for our republican steamers, of which absolutism will always be jealous, until they obtain the control of. In fact, if commercial and financial interests did not forbid, they would gladly see every ocean steamer sunk or buried, that the old and new world might be kept apart as of yore; for well they know that the wish of the republicans of Europe, as expressed in the words used by Kossuth in his address to the United States—"O, that you had been a neighboring nation"—will yet be, to all intents, fulfilled, through the thousand lines by which our Collinses will reach every seaport in Europe; and then Italy, Hungary, and well deserving Turkey even, will not want for backers.

The absorption of Switzerland and the Free Cities is but the first step of the despotic combination. France of course is to follow; and with reference to her a cunning move seems already making; a sort of second edition to Prince President Napoleon's Roman one,—that is, the uttering of the Gallic Cock against the American Eagle, out of pretended sympathy for Spain. This would be a master stroke, could it be effected; but the people of the two countries are too wise, too fraternal, to be hoodwinked into any serious collision, whatever the French ministry may attempt; and though the English aristocracy, who would prefer the rule of the Russian Czar to that of an English President, might second the movement, never would the British people, despite their commercial interests.

Let us watch and pray, that a brilliant scene may open upon the world in 1852. The despots of Europe have, at Warsaw, thrown down the gauntlet. Let a Congress of Republics speedily take it up.

DEATH OF JAMES MONTGOMERY.

This poet, a great and good man, who has lived to hear the verdict of posterity upon his works, has just been permitted to rest from his labors. The eldest son of a Moravian clergyman, he was born at Irvine, Scotland, Nov. 4, 1771. It was his own desire, and that of his parents, that he should become a minister of the Gospel, and he studied with reference to that profession. But, at the early age of sixteen he made his appearance in London with a manuscript volume of poems, instead of sermons, of which he vainly endeavored to procure the publication. In 1792 he went to Sheffield, and soon after became the editor of a weekly newspaper. While thus engaged, he was prosecuted for printing a song commemorative of the destruction of the Bastile. He was imprisoned three months in New York Castle, and fined twenty pounds. He was again imprisoned for inserting a passage offensive to the Government. During his second confinement he wrote "Prison Amusements," which appeared in 1797. After his imprisonment, he devoted himself to seek for fame as a poet, but being unsuccessful, he sunk down into apathy and gloom.—About the year 1792, his sympathies were deeply enlisted in behalf of Switzerland, whose independence had been virtually destroyed by France; and his poem, the Wanderer of Switzerland," was shortly afterwards composed. It reached a third edition in the course of a year, and was soon made immortal by an attack upon it in the Edinburg Review. Twenty eight years afterwards, the Review confessed that, in spite of its own prophesy, the poem had taken its place among the classics of the nation.

In 1818 he published the "World before the Flood," a poem in nine cantos; and one of the most finished, beautiful, and long living poems in the religious literature of the English language. It has never enjoyed the popularity that is its due, and praise is not always meted justly to poetry, but this poem will never lack admirers. The description of the creation is, in our view, one of the finest passages in the language, and the death of Adam and Eve has a tenderness of power and exquisite beauty that is rarely excelled.

In 1852 he published the "Songs of Zion." In these and many other lyrical compositions, he has shown that he is equal, in this sphere, to Watts and Cowper, while there is a peculiar feeling in his hymns that does not belong to either of them. He will be held in lasting and honored remembrance by the lovers of devotion verse; and in the praises of the sanctuary, successive generations will regard him as one of the sweetest contributors to the various collections of divine songs that will be used to the end of time.

He had just completed his fourth score of years; and, full of usefulness and fame, with a name already hallowed in the hearts of millions on both sides of the ocean, he lies down to die in peace. Again and again he has received special tokens of regard from his countrymen, and by his admirers in various parts of the world, his name will be held in lasting remembrance.—Frederick Douglass' Paper.

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS.—One of the most extraordinary illustrations of the freedom of the press which we have ever seen, was exhibited at the late Kossuth dinner, when, in response to a toast to the free press Col. Webb, the representatives of a free press, was not allowed to utter a syllable, because his opinions differed from those of the majority! Talk of freedom of the press with a vengeance. There is a good deal of clap trap humbug in the use of that word freedom in these times. Freedom of the press, freedom of speech, freedom of conscience, all mean—freedom to think and speak as the majority do, or to be gagged and excommunicated.—The New Orleans Weekly True Delta

AN APPROPRIATE SIGN.—A man who had established a traveling house, being about to erect his sign, requested his friend Taylor's advice as to a suitable inscription for it. His friend replied, 'I advise you to write on it—Dry Goods and Boots and Shoes here.'—The Presbyterian Home And Foreign Record.

STEAMERS ON THE NILE.—The Egyptian government has determined to establish steamers regularly every fortnight from Cairo up the Nile to Assouan, making stoppages at the places of interest on the way. This will be a great accommodation to travellers visiting Egypt, and a great saving of time and expense.—I be dem.

THE CUBAN PRISONERS.—Through the kindness of Dr. Cook we have been shown a letter to him from our minister at the Court of Madrid, Mr. Barringer, in relation to his unfortunate son, who, as our readers will recollect, was among the prisoners captured in the late Cuban expedition, and who is now in Spain. The letter throughout breathes the most earnest feelings of kindness and condolence; and gives every assurance that no effort will be spared to procure the release of our unfortunate young countrymen. The New Orleans disturbances, he says, are the most serious, and in fact almost the only difficulty in the way of the release of all the prisoners.

THE MILITARY DISPLAY in New York on the reception of KOSSUTH, was the finest ever seen in that city.

Intemperance and Taxation.

There never has been a time in the history of this country, probably, when the subject of intemperance, in its social and civil aspects, has awakened a deeper or more general interest than at present. Legislation is beginning to recognise its importance as a great political mischief, and a disturber of the social economy. In several of our State Legislatures, measures have been in agitation for its suppression. Winconsin took the lead some year or two since. Main has followed in the same track, and to-day the sale of liquor within the State is a crime against her laws. Ohio has incorporated her condemnation of the traffic in her constitution. Connecticut and New Hampshire have had the subject before them, and probably will soon take their place in the ranks. This general movement is indicative of one thing, and that is, that sensible men, in the community are beginning to feel that it will not do to ignore and neglect a great social and civil evil, so long as reaching and suppressing it by statute is a probability. It is a simple act of self-defence. Society is constituted for the common welfare; and whatever wars with this, strikes a blow at the rights and security of every member of the whole body. No man has a right to injure another—to seize on his lands or purse or good name—to disturb his peace or threaten his life, and we make laws to prevent doing it. To carry this out we frame our constitution, and devise our legislation, and elect our rulers. But intemperance thrust itself upon this arrangement, and in the person both of the vender and the buyer, says, it shall not be so. I will compound my brutifying poisonous mixture as I please—I will label them as I please.—I will dispose of them as I please. For a satisfaction in gold or siver, I will take your young men, full of hope and promise, and turn them into paupers, and tax you so much a week to support them. I will take your strong framed artisan and make a beast of him, and lay him in the gutter, that you may look at him with disgust and shame and horror, as you walk the streets. I will go into the quiet of the family circle, and rob those happy homes of their grace and ornament; I will make that son a sot and a disgrace to his name I will put a burning blush on that sister's cheek when she turns and calls him brother. I will wring that mother's heart till every pulse throbs with agony, as she says—my son. Nay, more; I will take that group yonder, now talking together in the greatest good humor, and of one, I make a leering fool; of another a loathsome lump of debauchery; of another an insulting, noisy bully—of another a hair-brained maniac, and of still another a reckless murderer; and if one must be tried, and another imprisoned, and another hung, you shall pay the judge; and build the prison, and erect the gallows. On the ground of my rights, I claim and demand of you—Society—to do all this, and leave me unmolested.

Who can deny that this is the attitude in which intemperance stands towards the great social and civil interests of the community? It levies black mail as will. There is no interest too precious for its sacrilege to spare. More than two thirds of our taxes for crime are due, directly or indirectly, to its pernicious influence. It is hard to find a murder or a deed of violence which did not owe to it the inspiration with which it was perpetrated. It does more probably than any other single evil to injure the community—to render life unsafe, and property insecure; and law nugatory, and society itself a burden. The question in regard to how it shall be treated, is simplified into this—that society take a living viper to its bosom, even though torpid now, and warm it into his? Shall she lay her heart bare to the deadly fang that strikes at it? Shall she submit to the imposition that claims as a right the privilege of murdering her piecemeal, and defeating every end for which she was constituted? "By what right," any man might ask of our legislation "by what right do you open the sluices of the deluge, and then demand of me toiling for my bread in the sweat of my brow, that I with bucket in hand, shall bail it back by pailfulls? Why do you take it upon you to license the making of paupers and thieves and murderers, and then tax the hard gains of my industry to pay for taking care of them? When one man strikes another, you levy damages on the aggressor. But here, you tax my innocence, as well as my security, that the offender may pocket his gains, and continue his piracy. Is this right? Is this the end for which society was constituted? In the name of law and justice where do your find the principle that justifies it? I pay my tax. It is large; it is exorbitant. I pay it for causes of expense which Society should legitimately suppress. I pay it to society when the individual, who should demand my purse under no better pretext than that which taxes me for the rum sellers' profit, or the drunkard's lust, should be met merely by a knock down argument. And now I demand protection, and what do I receive? My own father, brother, or child, goes out in street, and seduced within the reach of a man, who would sell his own soul, as he does others, for sixpence a glass is persuaded to drink what I should have preferred to have been Prussic Acid, and I have no help for it. If he had felled him with a blow, I could have recovered damages. If he had stabbed him to the heart, I could have borne him to the grave and found some consolation, in thinking that my tears fell not upon a thing that rum had tainted. But he does for my peace what a midnight assassin never could—he robs me of that hope for the departed, which will plant flowers on the sod of any grave but that of—a drunkard. Where is my protection? Am I not entitled to it? Is justice dead that she does not hear, or has the circle of a groggery transformed her to a brute?

There may be what some might consider an undue degree of warmth in such language as this, and yet the objection which it sets forth is plain and palpable. Every man has a right to be protected in his proper and useful calling. To tax him for that from which he receives no benefit is extortion. Every citizen under a free government has a right, moreover, to know why he is taxed, and for what objects. He has a right to investigate the character of those objects, and see and judge for himself whether he contributes to those that are worthy. We believe that such an investigation as this is demanded of us as citizens and patriots, and shall hail the day when we can feel that society protects as well as taxes us.—N Y. Sun

HOW A POOR BOY BECAME A LORD.

There lived in the city of Boston, some years ago, a portrait painter whose name was Copley. He did not succeed very well in business, and he concluded to go to England and try his fortune there. He had a little son whom he took with him, whose name was John Singleton Copley.

John was a very studious boy, and made such rapid progress in his studies that his father sent him to college. There he applied himself so closely to his books, & became so distinguished a scholar, that his instructors predicted that he would make a very eminent man.

After he left college he studied law: and when he entered upon the practice of his profession his mind was so richly disciplined by his previous diligence, that he almost immediately obtained great reputation. One or two causes of very importance being intrusted to him, he managed them with so much wisdom and skill as to attract the admiration of the whole British nation.

The king and his court seeing what a learned man he was, and how much influence he had acquired, felt it to be important to secure his services for the government. They therefore raised him from one post of honor to another till he was created Lord High-Chancellor of Engand—the very highest post of honor to which any subject can attain; so that John Singleton Copley became Lord Lyndhurst.—About sixty years ago he was a little boy in Boston. His father was a poor portrait painter, hardly able to get his daily bread. Now, John is one of the most distinguished men in talent and power in the House of Lords and regarded with reverence and respect, by the whole civilized world. This is the reward of industry. The studious boy becomes the useful and respected man.

Had John Singleton Copley spent his school boy days in idleness, he would probably have passed his manhood in poverty and shame. But he studied in school when other young men were wasting their time; he ever adopted for his motto, Press onward and how rich has been his reward!—Tenn Baptist.

Duration of the Earth

The following views, by a correspondent of the Puritan Recorder, upon the "Duration of the Earth," as indicated by astronomy, will be read, we think, with interest:

The evidence which geology affords of the great antiquity of the earth, turns thought to the evidence which astronomy furnishes of its striking continuance. From the many striking resemblances between the bodies that compose the solar system, we infer from them a common origin and a common destiny. The earth, then, will probably live while the system lives, and no longer. What its particular destiny may be, and by what means brought about, we stop not here to inquire. Our only purpose now is to conside, some intimations furnished us by the system itself, that it is fashioned for a long duration. This is indicated by the immense length of some of the periods involved in this system. According to the commonly received chronology, the planet Neptune has had but thirty six of his years since the creation of our race. If the analogy between the earth and that planet holds good, then the first generation of his inhabitants has hardly passed away. Some comets have not yet had one year since the date of Adam's creation. But there are periods of greater length still. The earth's perihelion is slowly creeping around the orbit from west to east, at a rate which will require 111,000 years to complete the circuit. The perihelion of Mercury is moving in a similar manner, at a rate which will require two hundred thousand years to complete it. Other planets exhibit the same movement. Now if all the planets in the system were arranged along in a line, on the same side of the sun, and all in their perihelion, i. e, all in that point of their orbits which is neares the sun, and then all their orbits are set revolving according to their present laws of motion, millions of years must elapse ere all of them would meet again under the same circumstances to hold their family festival, preparatory to another revolution of the same length. The earth's orbit is now an ellipse, but is slowly becoming circular; and its present rate of change, will become a perfect circle in about half a million of years from this time. Then it will begin to resume its elliptical form, becoming more and more elliptical for some millions of years, when—having obtained the maximum of ellipticity—it will begin again to shape itself into a circle. Corresponing with its change and caused by it, is a change of the period of the moon's revolution. Its period is now slowly shortening; its motion in revolution, of course, increasing; and this rate of increase is such as will make it gain a little more than its diameter in a thousand years. This shortening of her period and increase of velocity will continue until the earth's orbit becomes a perfect circle, and then she will slowly reverse her movements and gradually return to her former condition. From this mutual retraction of Jupiter and Saturn, their orbits are passing through similar changes, the orbit of one becomes more and more circular, in consequence of which motions, the period of one is lengthening while that of the other is shortening. This oscillation requires more than 70,000 years for its completion.

The sun has what is called a proper motion, i, e, the sun, with all its dependant household, is sweeping through space at the rate of 22,000 miles per day, or nearly half its own diameter. It is supposed by good astronomers that all the stars have a similar movement, all revolving together in the plane of the milky way, about some common center; that the orbit described by our sun in this grand march is so large that this inconceivably rapid motion, continued for years, forms practically a straight line; in other words, the orbit is so large that the arc of it described since this motion was first observed is so short in comparison with the whole orbit, as to seem to be no arc at all; at least, no instruments are, as yet, accurate enough to detect and measure its rate of deviation from a straight line. Herschell intimates that the elements of this orbit may perhaps be determined after thirty or forty years' observation, with the nicest instruments. Of course, many millions of years must pass ere this vast circuit can be fully described by the sun. We grant there is some little of conjecture attaching to this last illustration, which belongs not to any of the previous ones; and yet it is so much in keeping with those demonstrated facts, that it can hardly be called improbable. Although these periods are inconceivably long, still they are none the less periods. They are as truly periods, as if they were completed in one day or hour. The fact that our life is short in comparison, and that we cannot in our best estate have any adequate conception of them, is any more of an objection to their existence, that it is an objection to Neptune's period that insects die after a few hours' existence.

DUELING ANECDOTES AGAIN.

Concluded.

The distance to reach the principal entrance to the park, would require a detour of at least two miles, while a back gate opened upon the road that William took. There was no lodge, but Liaume Waddagh was seen to gain admission by a key, and carefully lock the gate afterward. The scene that followed was thus described by one of the strangers.

On reaching the back entrance of the park, Mr. Pemberton unlocked the gate, and when he had again secured it, he turned to his guests, and bade them a courteous welcome.

"This is the first time I have had the honor, gentlemen, to receive you at Mount Hazle.—May I hope it will not be the last? The strangers bowed; while a voice that seemed an echo, repeated in hollow and distinct tones "the last!" A gun exploded—Mr. Pemberton staggered and fell—the strangers' horses went off at speed—one rider managed to keep his saddle, while the other was roughly dismounted. The fallen horseman rolled into the ditch, and there, in mortal agony, he viewed the denouement of the tragedy.

A tall man, wrapped in a frieze great-coat, stepped leisurely from the back of the hedge, and quietly approached the body. He looked for a moment at the glassy eye and bloodless lips: "One barrel did the business!" he muttered, and laid the gun in a slanting direction across the corpse. Then taking a written paper from his pocket, he affixed it to the dead man's breast. All was methodically done; a pin secured every corner of the placard, and these pins were placed carefully in the cuff of the murder's catamore. This done he coolly reloaded the discharged barrel. The stranger remarked that the gun had been prepared for concealment and assassination, for the barrels had been shortened by a foot. The murderer gazed on the dead body for a minute, his hand never approached the pockets of his victim except when he drew a gold watch from the fob, muttered it was "half-past seven," and carelessly returned the time-piece. The murder being done to his satisfaction, he led a horse into the avenue, unlocked and refastened the gate, and rode off leisurely. Half dead with fear the stranger listened to the retiring horsetramps, and crept cautiously from the ditch. He shuddered as he looked at the body, for, on the breast of the dead man a paper, written in bold characters, bore the single sentence of "BLOOD FOR BLOOD!"

Lucy R——, in widow's weeds, was sitting in her drawing room; the gloom of twilight accorded with her "soul's sadness;" for the period was approaching, when a being, orphaned long before it saw the light, was to claim a mother's care. Her past was frightful to recall, her future fearful to look forward to. What should she be were her hour of trial safely over? A widowed mother at twenty! Wrapped in somber meditation, she did not hear the opening door, until, moving across the light, a tall figure arrested her attention, when standing within two yards,

"Who are you?" demanded the startled mourner.

"William Halligan, lady, come to bid you an eternal farewell!" A deep low voice responded.

"Brother of him in whom every feeling of this young heart was centered, and ever will be, I give you a widow's welcome—sit down. William."

"Lady, I dare not, for time is precious."

"How often have I sent for you, William!"

"And think you, lady, that a whisper from you would not have brought me here at midnight! Bound, however, by a secret vow, I dared not see you until I came to-night to say farewell.

"Where are you going, William?"

"That Heaven and accident only can decide. The money, which he whom we both lament bequeathed me was, months ago, transmitted to America, and there I sail to claim it."

"I need protection, William. That hardened wretch—he who robbed me of my husband, rode past my window yesterday."

"He will never repeat the offense," returned Long William, calmly. "But time hurries forward, and upon a few minutes, with me, life and death may depend. Should the promised infant be a boy, give him this, as a dear memento," and he took a gun from beneath his great-coat, and laid it on the table—"Tell him that a cross is filed deeply in the barrel that sped—"

"Whom—in the name of heaven?" exclaimed the lady, in alarm.

"The slayer of his father! And now, farewell, forever!"

He fell upon his knees, caught the lady's hand in his, and covered it with kisses. A low shrill whistle was heard beneath the window.

"It is the signal. May Heaven bless and comfort you! Farewell, forever!"

Before the words were heard distinctly, he vanished as he entered. All knew that the homicide of George Pemberton was Liaume Vaddagh, and, in a wild community, his memory is still handed down as one who did "the State some service." He sought the backwoods of the Illinois, led a hunter's life, and died in an Indian wigwam.

"With whom revenge is virtue,"

It is only necessary to add, that the family of the unscrupulous duelist have been extinct for thirty years, while the descendant of the victimized bridegroom is prosperous in worldly circumstances.

The circumstances under which I witnessed this fatal encounter were purely accidental. I had been stopping at the same inn where poor R——was passing his honeymoon, and had often admired a couple, whom nature, it would seem, had created for each other. The evening when the wicked deed took place—for Pemberton's friend gave the false signal, and R——was shot before he raised his pistol—I was in my bed room, making a trifling change in my toilet, preparatory to an excursion along the cliffs, when, without the customary knock upon the door, in rushed the chambermaid—

"Sir! sir!" she exclaimed, in a voice of wild alarm; "run down stairs, for God's sake! They are going to shoot the handsome gentleman!"

Before I could ask a question, or comprehend what the frightened girl meant, pop went a pistol in the garden. I jumped to the window—it overlooked the bowling-green—and there, upheld by the gardener and a boy, I saw a gentleman in the agonies of death. Half undressed, I hurried down stairs, and saw the two men mount their horses and ride coolly from the yard, and on reaching the scene of action, found that with poor R——, suffering was at an end, and life was extinct.

Thirty years after the sad event, I was marching a wing of the—d through Johnstown, where we were to halt for the night, when I received a visit from the squire, to invite me to dinner, and offer me a bed. Both were willingly accepted; for the village hostleric was ill-kept and sadly overcrowded. On inquiry, I found that the gentleman to whose hospitality I was about to be indebted, was the son of poor R——, whom I had seen shot at East Port; and, as the reminiscence might be unpleasant, I kept it to myself. I was most kindly entertained, and after supper—in those days a favorite meal in Ireland—was conducted by a gray-haired attendant to my sleeping chamber.

"Have you been long in the family?" I inquired.

"I have lived in Johnstown under three generations."

"Then you remember some family changes in your time, John?"

"Ah, many," said the old man; "some for the better, and others for the worse."

"You lived with the father of Mr. R——?"

"I lived with the best master, and the handsomest man that ever fell in a wicked duel.

"I saw him shot."

The old man started, crossed himself devoutly, and poured out a supplication for mercy to the departed. "May I ask your name, sir?"

I told it.

I remember it well. You were the young officer who held the poor master in your arms, when you sent the gardener and his boy to fetch the doctors."

"I am that person, and would have acted as your master's second, could I have reached the bowling-green in time. But they made short work of it."

"Ah, they did, indeed," said the old man, "but the vengeance of the Almighty has pursued them hard."

"Did he who killed your master come to an untimely end?" I demanded.

"Come into the next room, and I will tell you, sir."

He lifted the candles from the table, and led me into an adjoining apartment. It seemed a sort of private room or study. There were a couple of book-cases, whose shelves were tolerably filled, a collection of stuffed birds, and a glass press above the mantel-piece, to which, when he had placed the lights on the marble pigs within lifted down an antiquated weapon. I took the gun and examined it carefully. In its day it was, no doubt, held in high estimation. The pans and touch-holes were bushed with gold, and the mountings of the stock were elaborately finished, the finishings being silver. But the barrels were shortened by a foot.

"Why, John, these barrels have been razeed. How short they are!"

"They were found long enough to do the work of vengeance!" returned the old man, drily. See ye, sir, this cross?"

"Yes; the file has deeply indented it."

"Through that barrel a summons to eternity was carried to a ruthless heart. May God be gracious to your soul, Liaume Vaddagh! You took time to do your work, and did it well."

The old man replaced the weapon on its pegs, locked the glass cases, conducted me to my room, bade me "good night," and left me to sleep perchance to dream.—New York Daily Tribune.

THE TRAGEDY OF HELEN ABERCROMBIE.

An old gentleman of Builth, in South Wales, to whom the death of a celebrated literary character, the notorious Wainwright, mentioned a month since in the 'Athenæum," and copied into various journals, has only now found its way, gives an account of his personal knowledge of that individual, from which we take some details; as they may be new to the present generation of readers, who only know him as the prototype of Sir Edward Bulwer's hero, the father of Lucretia. After stating that he had been twice in the company of Wainwright in the year 1820, not long before Miss Abercrombie's death, the writer proceeds to describe the appearance of Wainwright and his literary position when the "London Magazine" was first published:—

About the year 1820, started the "London Magazine," enlisting among its contributors the most gifted of the literature of the time. Sergeant (Judge) Talfourd has done justice, in the "Memorials of Lamb," to the merits of that periodical. Hazlitt, (the only one with whom the writer of this had much acquaintance,) Shelley, Godwin, Leigh Hunt, De Quincy, Mr. Proctor, (Berry Cornwall,) Reynolds friend of Keats, formed the corps. John Scott, the editor, fell in a duel springing out of a literary quarrel, not long after the magazine commenced. It was at the house of this gentleman, in York street, during an "official" breakfast, (that is, a sort of cabinet council in the magazine administration,) that the writer fell in with the miscreant in question. Conceive among the plain, low-voiced, diffident young men, soon retiring from the breakfast table to one of greater attractions, piled with all works of the day, fresh from the press, or to the loaded book-shelves of their short lived "great captain," whose days were about drawing to the close, a figure, so ostentatiously "well-dressed," with excess of "toggery," frogged coat, jewelled fingers, (not gold chained vest, for at that time displayed watchguards were not,) evidently affecting the military dash, a form so incongruous as to almost seem an apparition in that calm and pensive atmosphere. He was of middle height; but as to his features, what with the gloom of a London street in winter, added to that of curtains, and, more than all, a certain disgust that led the writer to rather avoid than court acquaintance with the self-complacent dandy, I have not the least recollection. All I heard of him, being (at Taylor and Hessey's, Fleet Street, publishers then of the "London") "that's the nephew of Dr. Griffites, of Turnham Green, the young man who writes the articles signed 'Janus Weathercock.' The portfolio of drawings that was on the side table was his own execution." He appeared about twenty-five, or rather more, and seemed to be regarded as a fashionable roue by the real literateures, on the strength of his supposed connection with Fashion; it seemed that modest genius almost cowered under the pretender's condescending hauteur. Newspaper dramatic critics, (such as Leigh Hunt,) artistical critics, (such as Hazlitt,) were poor studious canaille about him—he to attend a bookseller's soiree, and stoop to accept 20*l*. a sheet for his articles!—it was a striking proof of the meekness as well as the whimsicality of a man of high fashion; he held himself aloof from Hazlitt, who was a painter by profession, from secret fear of Hazlitt's sturdy intolerance of foppery in every shape, and was never deceived into respect for him, as Lamb was into some degree of regard. In fact, Wainwright, by cool effrontery, had somehow almost usurped the proper function of Hazlitt, by giving a showy sort of exterior to criticism on the Fine Arts, which, fascinating mere readers, superseded the sterling merit of that most original thinker, and the booksellers tacitly acquiesced in this preference of flippant cleverness to sober judgment.

The dark story of the cold-blooded murder of his sister-in-law is thus (correctly) told:—

He married and settled at Turnham Green, in the hours of his deceased uncle. His wife had two half sisters, each with 10*l*. per annum, as their sole means of subsistence. They came to reside with the young couple. Wainwright obtained a small sum by the death of his uncle; his extravagant habits were already ruining him, yet he expended a great part, if not the whole, of this windfall, in a manner not to be accounted for with the belief of his sanity, but on the supposition of a foul and inhuman purpose; that admitted quite rational, and the whole is as clear as the sun at noon-day. One of the sisters, Miss Helen Abercrombie, was then in the twentieth year, in health, and happiness, and beauty. So uniform had been her good health, and so strongly was that depicted in her blooming face, that a gentleman, casually looking at her from his post in a life-insurance! We might take her by only looking at her!" Yet this fresh and lute girl, by whose death no loss was to arise to any one, as by her life no gain, (both girls being almost penniless,) did her brother-in-law persuade to insure her life (or rather, to let him insure, for the payment he was to make) at many offices, to an immense amount, concealing from each establishment the fact of her being insured at many others. By what vile pretence poor Helen herself was induced to concur in the falsehoods told is not known. One inducement to tempt her was reversionary gain to her sister, but one large sum was expressly in his own favor, and the whole to come under his handing as her trustee. At some of the offices two years, at others three, was the term insured: so that in the event of her living but that little period, every farthing of the money paid for the policy would have been lost; yet in this wild speculation did this embarrassed man actually embark 200*l* ready money. This would have been madness; but taken with the untimely death of innocence and beauty—the madness disappears—the murderer looms dim, dreadful, and detestable in the mystery. No less than 30,000*l*. was to accrue by her death. So rapacious was his avarice, that other policies were attempted at other offices, but refused, not without kind and solemn hints of warning from one principal, to which the trusting, artless young creature replied only by laughing at the idea of any one plotting against her harmless life. Thus this cold-hearted wretch created for himself a lottery in the dark—in the shadow of death—of the friendless, fair, trusting being, whom he seemed to be protecting; the question was one of utter ruin, sacrifice of the whole sum paid, or affluence (the capital prize of 30,000*l*.!) Her domestication, her confidence, her youth, all conspired to give fatal facility to the execution of a horrid tragedy, without witness but God!—Little's Living Age.

To the New York Immigration and Agricultural Association, and to all whom it may concern.

Brethren and fellow Countrymen:

Being fully aware that it is expected of me to express myself, in regard to Liberia, and the subject of colonization, I have thought that the most efficient means of my doindg so, in a satisfactory manner would be through the columns of the Herald.

You are aware that in December of last year, I was appointed travelling Agent, of the Immigration and Agricultural Association. On the 30th, of said month I left New York for Baltimore;—on the 4th, of January I left Baltimore for Liberia, in the "Lib ria Packet," and on the 15th of March, I landed at Monrovia, where I was introduced to President Roberts, and made known to him my object in coming to Liberia. He then inquired what was my further pleasure; I told him that I wished him to grant to the New York Association sixty farm lots, of ten acres each, which he immediately granted; and gave me the liberty to select them from any unoccupied lands, that I liked. I commenced on the next day to look for the lands, and after a diligent search, through the country, I fell upon a beautiful spot, situated on the St. Paul's river. I then employed the surveyor forthwith, to survey the land for me, which was done with promptness, the cost of which was $3 00 per lot;—the survey of sixty lots cost $180 00.

I was then introduced to Mr. Hooper, as an assistant, who I accepted in that capacity, a man in whom I place great confidence, and during my sickness, he has acted in my stead. I am now quite recovered from the effects of the fever, and can attend to my own business. I have already cleared about ten acres of land, which is now being planted. I have built one large house for a store house, and there is now in the course of erection, three houses for emmigrants, which are nearly finished.

I shall diligently pursue my labors, and endeavor to accomplish the object for which I came here.

The lots are laid off nearly square, and in consequence of there not being enough vacant land on the river, I have had 30 farms laid off on the river, and 30 immediately in the rear of them, though the rear lands are little more than a quarter of a mile from the river.

Immediately in the rear of the lots already laid off, the President will allow me to purchase more land in the same way that public lands are disposed of by law. The law sets the price of rear lands at 50 cents per acre, as a commencement of bids—and one cent advance would be considered legal at a land auction. The land that I have obtained is a beautiful, elevated and fertile spot, a vast tract of table land, well timbered, is immediately in our rear, and extends back a considerable distance, and contains several mill streams—abounding with excellent water: a most beautiful and healthy location.

I am highly in favor of immigration, but the immigrants are sent out too short handed, (though I am not disposed to complain), which I am persuaded the society is not fully acquainted with. The immigrants have no houses built for them, as was said, they have no farming utensils, as was said to have been furnished them, at Cape Palmas, as they are furnished with both houses and farming utensils tho. they have to pay for their houses, when they become able, the original cost. If it was so here it would, be much better, and they would do well, but now the disadvantages under which they labor on arriving here discourages them. as soon as they use their six months rations, and at the time when they leave the public, they are generally weak and feeble, and seldom have anything planted to eat when their six months provisions are gone.—Their land frequently being at a distance from the receptacle, makes it inconvenient for them to cultivate it without means which few have. If the society would build their houses and take payment from them in produce as soon as they are able to work, it would tend greatly to their advantage, and my word for it you would not hear a sing'e murmer from an immigrant, and the wild desert would bloom as a rose and the sons and daughters of Africa would shout for joy at hearing the name of the Colonization Society.

You will please tell our home agent Mr. Elias G Jones, to send me out means,—as means come, trees fall, houses go up, snakes leave, wild cows tremble, deers flee, and birds sing for joy.

Bretheren, come, and taste of the rich treasures of Africa.—If you have money come and enjoy the luxuries of Africa, if you have no money you may come & set down in one of the houses, it is prepared for you without money and without price. I go to prepare a place for for you that where I am ve may be also. Come, God help you to come I know the good people of the State of New York will help you. The Common Council will help you, the Corporation will help you, the christain will help you, every philanthropist will help you The New York Immigration Agricultural Association will help you. Come and enjoy the blessings that God has intended for you. I know that the Colonization Society will help you for she has and still continues to help you, and God is with her, or at least in the work she does.—The people of the U. S. labor under wrong impressions, they think they can't get the luxuries of life in Liberia. I had an invitation yesterday to breakfast with Mr. R. Moore, I have never enjoyed a better one though it was of African productions. I returned home, and had not well seated myself before another invitation came requesting me to dine—with Mr. G. Moore the first thing that caught my eye upon entering the house was a beautiful & large roasted turkey as any I ever saw in America, roasted chickens—beef—pork—cabbage—sweet potatoes, plantains—rice, all of African productions; I have determined to encourage Africa's good enough for me.

Ladies, I will tell you what to do, just step into Mrs. Cauldwell's, No. 34, Mulbury St New York, and she will let you taste some of the best sweet meats you ever tasted, sent to her by the ladies of Liberia. Don't let her know that I told you. The rivers abound with fish, & the forest with game. Here the man grants have had the fever, and are well; at Sinoe and Bassa, they are yet sick, and there have been five deaths among them, two of fever only: well say you, you have given us the good, now give us the bad. I will; if you come here you will have to work and get your bread out of the ground. Adam had to do so, and if you go to work for others, wages are very low, if a mechanic, you must come prepared to take contracts,—if as a merchant, bring goods; if as a teacher or ruler, take care the Liberians don't make you get your lesson over. All the cry is among the ladies, I am afraid that Mr. Cauldwell will get sick and die,—that will just break up the whole society. Send me axes and I will cause the wilderness to bow before them, and the desert to blossom as the rose, and the sons and daughters of Africa to shout

The missionary society is the life of this county, together with the colonization society.

Most excellent laws and regulations are made and strictly observed. I have not seen a man drunk nor heard an oath since my arrival here. Don't let me forget Mr. Pinney, & Mr. Phelps, who so kindly made me a present of a $958 63 to start with, besides my passage free; God bless them, and may He help me to lay it out to the best advantage.

There, I was just going to close without saying a word to the ladies—ladies you that like pretty gardens, now is your chance; come on, you can have green peas, green beans, sweet potatoes, cabbages, cucumbers, onions radishes, and every thing fresh for dinner, every day in the year, besides your rose beds fetch your hoe with you and you all like to raise chickens, turkeys, ducks and gees, and have plenty of eggs; now is your time:—come on, I have got a house built for you, and two acres of land cleared for your garden: don't forget the hoe, all the good things you have to spare, you can sell at Monrovia; you know colored people like to eat, they will buy them, as they have the means; most of them being merchants. Mr. Ball is of opinion that the Colonization Society does too much for immigrants but I do not think so. They do pretty well by them. You had better call on Mr. Jones in New York No 6 Pell St. and he will pay your passage to Liberia

There, I declare I must stop, it will take every cent I have to pay the Editor of the Liberia Herald, for publishing this, I expect he will want me to pay for it, as he is not like the Editors in Baltimore, Philadelphia and New York, they will give it an insertion in their paper for nothing; if you are too stiff to ask them I am not.

☞ Messers Editors in the United States please give the same, one insertion in your honerable paper, and you will oblige your humble servant and traveling agent of the New York Immigration Agricultering Association.

For the "Liberia Herald"

Monrovia May 5th, 1852.

MR HERALD:—I beg a space in your paper, ot rectify a mistake which has caused some misrepresentation It was thought by some persons, that I had written a calumnious letter to America, reflecting injuriously on the country and people of Liberia. I wish to inform you sir, together with all whom it may concern, that I never have written any such letter, nor was I certain, till to day, that I was really accused of such; I remember some month or two since, to have been told by my little boy whom I send to school in this town, that he, (the boy) was interrogated by a gentleman, in reference to some letter, concerning which neither the boy, nor myself could understand, but Mr. Hall, informed me to day, that he had all the time thought, that I was a blacksmith by trade, that I had gone to Sinoe on my first arrival in Liberia had now left Sinoe, was going back to the U. S. and of course I was the man who wrote the letter. Now Mr. H. you perhaps see where the cause of the mistake lies; it is in the simularity of the arrival, and proceedure of Mr. Aaron Key, (the blacksmith,) and myself. We did not come together to this country, but both of us went to Sinoe, and both removed to Monrovia, both spoke of going to the U. S.—were both nearly the same height and complextion, only I am no smith, but live in Monrovia. Mr. Key is a smith and is gone to Sierra Leone, the inference is plain

REWARD OFFERED.

The Journal of the Liberia Mission Council Conference, between two and three years ago, was mislaid. This as every intelligent man knows, is a serious loss to the body of ministers whose property it is, and of whose doings, for the last nineteen years, it preserves a faithful account. We have looked and inquired in different directions, but without success hitherto.

By the authority of the above named Conference, through the columns of your paper, Mr. Herald, we would try to awaken a more general interest in our favor, by saying that. Five dollars will be awarded to any one who shall find this Journal. and restore it to the subscriber.

The book is of the size of an ordinary counting-house journal, and bound in a similar manner.

Monrovia 4th, May 1852.

F. BURNS,

For the Liberia Herald.

HAS SHE ANY TIN?

Oh! do not paint her charmes to me,
I know that she is fair!
I know her lips might tempt the bee,
Her eyes with stars compare,
Such transient gi.ts I ne'er could prize.
My heart they could not win,
I do not scorn my Mary's eyes,
But, has she any 'tin?'"

"The fairest cheek, alas! may fade,
Beneath the touch of years;
The eyes where light and gladness played,
May soon grow dim with tears,
I would love's fires should to the last
Still burn, as they begin;
But beauty's reign too soon is past;
So, has she any 'tin!'"

Mr. Herald—will please give the above lines a place in your interesting paper and oblige yours &c.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, MAY 6th, 1852.

Departure of President Roberts.—The Liberia Government schooner "Lark," Ried Cooper, Esqr. Commanding, left on the evening of the first inst: for Sierra Leone, via. Grand Cape Mount and the Gallenas. President Robers & Lady, & Mrs. David Moore were passengers in the "Lark." The President, who has enjoyed feeble health, for some months past, proposed to extend his visit to the Island of Maderia; and will take passage in one of the steam Packets which plies regularly between that Island and Sierra Leone. It has been strongly recommended to His Excellency, to visit England; and lay before the Government of Her Britanic Majesty the several subjects which have lately been discussed by Mr. Hanson, the British Consul, and which he attempted to make appear, were in opposition to the interests of the Government and people of England. It is hoped that the President will find it convenient to extend his visit to the British Capital; and lay before that Government a true statement of all matters. The people of Liberia feel confident, that when correct representations are laid before Her Majesty's Government, there will be found no just cause of complaint against the Government and people of Liberia.

We learn, by the arrival of the sloop "Nathan Bangs," from the leeward, that Palm oil is plentiful. Indeed it is said, that the supply is equal to the demand; and but for the early commencement of the rains, a cargo could be procured without much delay. Traders should be careful not to appear in opposition to each other, such a course will have a tendency, to induce the natives, to keep back their oil, with a hope of obtaining an advance price.

Bassa Cove.—This cite is rapidly undergoing a great change. A few months ago, as our readers well know, Grando attacked it, and murdered inoffensive women and children, and laid the place in ruins. The last session of the Legislature named all that part of Grand Bassa, known as Bassa Cove, "Buchanan," in memory of the late Governor Thomas "Buchanan," who succeeded in planting a prosperous settlement near the mouth of the river. The cite selected for a town, but destroyed by Grando, is now being well improved; and we hope no interruption will prevent the enterprising people, from continuing to build up a flourishing settlement, where so much of the blood of their fellow citizens has been shed. We feel pretty certain that no fears need now be apprehended from the notorious Grando and his allies. It is hoped, that the immigrants expected soon from New York, will be located in this new settlement. We say now, what we have said a thousand times, that those settling at Bassa Cove proper, will have many advantages over citizens in most any other part of Liberia, from trade and the facilities for communication with the shipping in the harbor,

Little Cape Mount.—We learn that the Chieftains in this territory are again, bent on disturbing the quietness of the country. But a few months have passed by, since they assembled in this town, and their differences listened to; and we thought amicably arranged. Indeed, they expressed themselves to this effect, and adopted a fashion of their country, that of swearing, to be friends. It was fully understood that all disputes, that should occur in future, and which they were unable to settle, should be referred to the Government of Liberia. Dwalarbay, one of the Chieftains, has sent messengers to say, that Boombo, another of the Chiefs, has treacherously violated the compact, in attacking one of his towns; and calls on the President to bring Boombo to account. It is no easy matter to learn the true state of the case, at the onset, and, therefore, it is not probable that every feature of Boombo's transgression will not be understood for a month or two at least.

It is hoped, however, that the Government will adopt severe measures with the guilty parties—if this is not done, there is no telling, to what extent the country may be disturbed. We believed, and with reason too, that for years to come, Little Cape Mount would be spoken of, for its quietness.

Prince Salt-Water of Little Bassa, visited Monrovia on the 5th, inst. He waited on the President to speak on the affairs of his country; and to express a desire, that the Government would give him a certificate certifying that he conducts himself as becomes a good citizen. Since the arrangements of the difficulties with the Chieftains of Little Bassa, there has been no cause of complaint; and the President acceded to the request. He also, requested to be authorised to hold communication with the the interior Chiefs, for the purpose of opening a commercial intercourse with them. He obtained, in conjunction with his brother Chieftains, such an authorization. Many of our readers will remember that Salt-Water lived for years in Monrovia; and that he left it under circumstances of an unpleasant nature. He was convicted of slave trading, and punished accordingly. He boasted of being a Prince, and was foolish enough to believe, that he would not be punished, to the extent of the law,—He remained but a few days after the punishment—declaring he would not come to Monrovia again—this was some 15 yerrs ago.

Way to get rid of Jealous Husband.

A married couple, M. and Madam Lanier, kept a curiosity shop in the quarter near the house. The husband had got, to the wrong side of fifty; the wife was scarcely twenty-four. She found her spouse a jealous tyrant' who watched her actions, and refused her the most legitimate amusements. Buisness going badly, they thought it prudent to obtain a separation de biens. They, however, continued each in their own name to deal in more or less authentic curiosities but neither prospered, and they were obliged to shut up their respective shops. Their creditors were clamorous, and obtained warrants for their arrest.

"United by misfortune, the couple secreted themselves in the village of Boulogne, near Paris. The commercial misfortune of M. Lanier increased his bad humor and jealousy; and accordingly, violent quarrels ensued between them. These attracted the attention of the neighbors, and caused the bailiffs to find out their retreat. They were arrested finally, and taken off to the Debtors' Prison. The husband alighted first, and crossed the dreaded threshold. After he was duly inscribed on the books, he waited, expecting his wife to join him to be inscribed also. But she drew forth a small pocket book, and said tranquilly to the bailiffs 'An instant, gentlemen, and I will pay you.' This coup de theatre plunged every one into astonishment. She however, calmly demanded the amount of her own debt and costs, and paid the whole. She then, with a look of scorn at her husband, said, "That is the way, sir, to get rid of a jealous husband." and started triumphantly away.

POETRY.

THE NIGHT OF THE NATIVITY.

A COMMEMORATION.

Silence, deep and solemn and unbroken,
Lay on a death-hush fallen from the sky:
As of some dread mystery the token,
Seem'd that silence, breathless and unbroken—
Pale and wan the stars looked out on high.

'Twas as though, unseen, some mighty spirit,
High dispenser of Heaven's ministrings,
Had come down a mission to inherit,
And that earth, awe of that great spirit,
Struck to torpor all her vocal things.

"True" I said, "that standest ghostly, hushing
All thy thousand pulses, and thou stream,
Through the misty meadows mutely rushing,
Say, what means this ominous strange hushing?
Is earth trance-bound in some mystic dream?"

Then a sound, so low it was scarce spoken,
Blended voice of wind and stream and tree,
Answered, "Leave our quiet still unbroken;—
At this hallowed hour no word be spoken;
Silence suiteth best its sanctity.

For on night like this—O, love eternal!—
Wafted downward 'mid ecstatic strains,
Came the angels from their courts supernal,
Came on all their tale of love eternal,
To the shepherds on the Syrian plains.

In the moonlight hovered the white legion,
Heaven revealing to the mortal ken,
And the echoes of the lonely region
Kept e'en yet the words of that bright legion—
'Peace on earth,' they said, 'good will to men!'

Ay, and not the Syrian echoes solely;
All earth holds that memory undefiled;
So each time rings round, in advent holy,
That sweet strove, we hear those accents solely,
Angel accents, murmuring meek and mild.

And the stars shine pale and wan with wonder,
For they hear afresh such melody,
Ring, wave on wave, a rhythmic thunder,
Deep and deeper, sound of awe and wonder—
All God's seraphs shouting joyfully.

For this cause we keep mute watch, O mortal!
Duly hour by hour—to our task nerve;
Time straight shine heaven's unfolded portal,
Hush each clamoring utterance of Earth's Mortal,
Hearken only unto God's Divine!

Lusts of life, thy true vocation shaming,
Thrust them forth from consecrated ground!
Heaven's sound the angels still proclaiming—
Hear the glad, each angry passion shaming,
Peace on earth, good will!"—O, blessed sound!

Closed the voice. "Twas true—a mighty spirit,
High dispenser of God's gifts to men,
Had come down a mission to inherit,
And I bowed before that awful spirit,
And I wrestled with my nature then.

Watched, praying. God above the glory!
Still his tumult—let my soul take in
All the meaning of that old, old story,
All the simple truth, and chastened glory,
That the Christ-mass Babe I stride within.

And for this year only, but to ever,
me or his no old's memory fast,
May the spell to calm life's fever,
Lay the restless flame, dies out forever,
And the peace of heaven's won at last.

From Littell's Living Age

Early Times in Indiana.

Said Major Oudesly, as he casually dropped in on us yesterday morning and commenced talking away in his usual quiet, chatty, and peculiar manner—

"I'm sick and tired of this artificial way of doing things in these latter days."

"Why so, major?"

"There is quite too much parade about everything that is going on.

"I was at a wedding last night, the daughter of an old and much-esteemed friend was to be married, and I was so urgently invited, that I couldn't help going: there was so much fuss and parade that I was perfectly disgusted. I couldn't help comparing the proceedings where a couple was married in Lawrenceburg many years ago when Indiana formed part of the great North-western Territory. At that time the settlements of the emigrants were mostly confined to the rich bottom lands of the water courses. Lawrenceburg was a small village of a few log cabins. My father was acting magistrate for the district, and very promptly attended to all the various duties of that office, in addition to which he was in the habit of doing a good deal of inroad labor on his own hook."

"That was when you wasn't big enough to do much, major."

"Exactly, I was a two headed brat of some eight or ten years old when the incident I am about to relate occurred, but I remember all the particulars as well as if it occurred yesterday. You see it was about dinner time one day in the fall of the year, when the old man, being engaged in laying in a supply of wood for the winter, drove up his ox team with a pretty solid load of fuel.

Just then a young and unsophisticated couple entered the village, hand in hand, inquired for the Squire, and were duly directed to the house. The youth was barefooted, and wore a coarse but clean tow linen shirt and pants, and rough straw hat of home manufacture. His fair companion was dressed in a blue cotton frock, pink cotton apron, fine bonnet, and coarse brogan shoes without stockings.

These were their wedding dresses; and their severe simplicity and the thorough independence they manifested, made an impression upon my mind that will never be effaced.

"We come to get married," said the young man to the old lady, my mother, who was properly busy among the pots and kettles."

"That's very good business," said she, smiling graciously, "though you appear to look very young; but there's the Squire, just drove up; he'll splice you in less than no time." So out she bolted, to give the fortunate functionary due notice of the business in hand.

"I can't stop till I unload this wood," said the old man; "tell them to come out here."

Out they came.

The old man was on top of the cart, and every time he threw off a stick he asked a question. Before he was fairly unloaded, he had the youth's whole story, having ascertained the names, ages, and residence of the parties, how long he had known the young woman, if he really loved her, and was willing to labor honestly to promote her happiness, &c.

The youngster gave simple and satisfactory answers to all the questions propounded.

In the mean time, the old lady, perfectly understanding Dad's way of doing things, had sent out to say to the people that a wedding was coming off at the house; and by the time the wood was unloaded, quite a crowd had collected to witness the ceremony.

The old fellow, having pitched out the last stick, and picked up his long goad, stood up in the cart and commended the performance.

"Jest jine hands," said he to the young couple. It was done accordingly.

"I am satisfied with both of ye," continued he, "you've a perfect right to get married," and he united 'em in short order.

"As the rafters on this house are joined together, so I jine you—you are man and wife—salute your bride. I don't charge you anything for the operation.

"Whoa haw, Buck; get along Bright, he started for another load of wood, leaving the newly wedded pair amid the villagers, kissing each other with a very distinct and particular evidence of satisfaction.

"That was a wedding worth having," said Major Oudesley: "I knew the couple afterwards, and know them yet, for they are both living in a high state of prosperity. And I know their children after them, too, and mighty fine children they are, for one of them is at this very time Governor of the State of Indiana.—Religious Herald.

COMIC ESSAYS

Dangerous Fellow to be at Large.

There is a dangerous fellow somewhere Down East, or somewhere else, who ought out not to be allowed to run at large. He threatens to play the very deuce and break things, all in consequence of a faithless gal who hath broken her troth with him and married some one else. If he should put his threats into execution, the Lord have mercy on us. Here him:—

I'll grasp the loud thunder,
And with lightning I'll play
I'll rend the earth asunder,
And kick it away!

Now, that's attempting considerable for one man; however, if he is willing to assume the responsibility, and pay damages, why, let him smash away, we're not afraid. He next says:—

The rainbow I'll straddle,
And ride to the moon;
On the ocean I'll paddle,
In the bowl of a spoon.

Well, that won't hurt anybody. Go ahead old chap; we like to encourage a laudable spirit of adventure:

I'll set fire to the fountain,
And swallow up the rill,
I'll eat up the mountain,
And be hungry still.

Good gracious! what a destructive and voracious animal he is! Is there no way to appease his wrath and stay his stomach? Must we suffer this, just because his gal gave him the mitten, and took a notion to another? No, never. Down with him, we say, if he continues to conduct himself in this extravagant way.

The rain shall fall upward,
The smoke shall tumble down,
I'll dye the grass purple,
And paint the sky brown.

Here that! A pretty world this would be then! We might as well live in an old boot with a dirty sole for the earth beneath, and brown upper leather for the heavens above.

The sun I'll put out,
With the whirlwind I'll play,
Turn day into night,
And sleep it away.

There is no doubt that if he cuts that caper, the sun will feel as much put out about it as we shall. We leave it to the whirlwinds to say whether they are to be trifled with or not. And as for his turning day into night, and sleeping it away, we would just as soon he would do that as not, that is, if he can. But hear him again:

I'll flog the young earthquake,
The weather I'll be physic,
Volcanoes I'll s rangle,
Or choke them with pethisic.

Oh, ho! for shame now. He dare not clinch with the old earthquake, and so he threatens to flog a new one, and that of the neuter gender. Oh, you outrageous fellow, why don't you take one of your size? And then he says:

The moon I will smother
With nightmare and wo,
For sport, at each other,
The stars I will throw.

Serves 'em right—they have no business to be out when they might be in bed.

The rocks shall be preachers,
The trees do the singing,
The clouds shall be teachers,
And the comets go spreeing.

Well, that's all right enough, except getting the comets on a spree—we don't like that pretty much. Our hero concludes as follows:

I'll tie up the winds
In a bundle together,
And tickle their ribs
With a monstrous feather.

Oh, cracky! now he's done it. We did not think it in the gizzard of any man to do half so much. Really we think that such a desperate fellow ought to be caught and put in jail for half a week, and safely guarded by one flea, two musquitos, and a great wood-louse.

CURE FOR EXCITEMENT.

A young friend once told me, that among other symptoms of high nervous excitement, he had been painfully harrassed for the want of sleep. To such a degree had this proceeded, that if in the course of the day any occasion led him to his bed-chamber, the sight of his bed made him shudder at the idea of the restless hours he had passed upon it. In this case it was recommended to him to endeavor, when he lay down at night, to fix his thoughts upon something at the same time vast and simple, such as the wide expanse of ocean, or, the cloudless vault of heaven, that the little hurried and disturbing images that flitted before his mind might be charmed away, or hushed to rest; by the calming influence of one absorbing thought. Though not at all a religious man at the time, the advice suggested to his mind, that if an object at once vast and simple was to be selected, none could serve the purpose so well as that of God. He resolved then to make the trial, and to think of him. The result exceeded his most sanguine expectations; in thinking of God he fell asleep. Night after night he resorted to the same expedient. The process became delightful, so much so that he used to long for the usual hour of retiring, that he might fall asleep, as he termed it, in God. What began as a mere physical operation, grew by imperceptible degrees into a gracious influence. The same God who was his repose at night was in all his thoughts by day. At the same time this person spoke to me, God, as revealed in the gospel of his Son, was "all his salvation," so inscrutable are the ways by which God can "fetch home his banished."—The True Union.

A BIRD SEEKING LODGING.—During the cold storm of Monday night, at the late hour, a small bird knock for admittance at a window of a hotel which happend to be illuminated by the light within. The occupant, supposing the noise to be the pattering of hail against the pane gave it no attention. Presently the rapping commenced again, when the window was opened & in flew the little creature, apparently delighted to get into comfortable quaters, and confident of shelter and safety. After cruising about the room as if to bathe itself in the warm air, it quietly selected its place, and deposited its head under its wing, went to sleep. It is difficult to say which of the occupants of the same apartment felt better satisfied with themselves, or slept more peacefully through the night. As the day broke, out broke the bird's grateful acknowledgments to the Protector of us all in a song which, for so tiny a body and a stranger, was remakably loud and ecstatic. It was nearly famished and ate and drank with an enviable appetite, its breakfast. Being able to take care of itself, and not choosing to be dependent longer on charity, the litle fellow insisted on being released; the window was opened, and out he went, to share his fortune with his tribe, thanking his friends as well as he could for his hospitality.—The New Orleans Weekly True Delta.

Wisdom and understanding are synonymous words; they consist of two propositions, which are not distinct in sense, but one and the same thing variously expressed.

Mice may be expelled from drawers and cup boards, most effectually by placing fresh twigs of the elder bush within. The odor of the elder is intolerable to the animal.

ABOLITIONISM AND NULLIFICATION.—Both of these patent humbugs tend in the same directions to-wit: to a disturbance of the public peace, weakening the bonds of the Union, and the winding up of sectional parties and local prejudices. We recommend to their respective advocates, the following dialogue between a traveller and a country boy:

"Which of these roads lead to Waterford?"

"Any one on 'em."

"Which of those roads is the best, boy?"

"Aint nary one on 'em best?"

"Which is the nearest?"

"Aint much difference."

"Which do you think I had better take?"

"You may take any one on 'em' before you get half way thar you'll wish you had took tother one."

☞ The person who leased the right to sell refreshments in the Crystal Palace, is said to have realized the snug little bit of pocket money, of $500,000 by the operation. Encouraged, probably by the prosperity of this venture, a new speculator offers $25,000 for the right to pick up such lost articles as fell through the crevices of the floor upon the ground beneath.' The planks, it will be remembered, left with a space between them, and, don tless some valuable waifs sunk into the abyss. Several who have lost matters of considerable value, will station agents on the ground when the boards are removed to reclaim them.

OUR COUNTRY.

IN 1792, the corner stone of the present capitol at Washington was laid. At that time, General Washington, in whose honor the new seat of Government was named, officiated. Fifty eight years afterwards, viz: on the 4th day of July, 1851, the corner stone of an extension of the buildings was laid, and the Secretary of State made an address, in the course of which he presented a sketch of the comparative condition of our country at the two periods.

Then we had fifteen States, now we have thirty-one.

Then our whole population was three millions, now it is twenty-three.

Then Boston had 18,000 people, now it has 136,000.

Philadelphia had 42,000, now it has 409,000.

New York had 33,000, now it has 515,000.

Then our imports were 31,000,000, now they are 178,000,000.

The area of our territory was then 800,000 square miles, it is now 3,300,000.

Then we had no rail roads, now we have 8,500 miles of it.

Then we had no telegraph, now we have 12,000 miles of it.

Then we had 200 post offices, now we have 21,000.

Our revenue from postage then was $100,000 now it is $5,000,000.

These are only a few facts to show the rapid growth of the country; and what we and our children have to do to secure the continuance of its prosperity, is to love, fear and obey the God of our fathers; to avoid intemperance, pride, contention and greediness of gain, and cherish in all our hearts a true patriotism, and a just sense of obligation to those that shall come after us.—The True Union.

SCOLDING CHILDREN.—I will tell you what good it does to scold at your children for doing what you told them not to do, just as much good as to scold an unruly ox for jumping over the fence and eating green corn contrary to orders previously given him. Children are governed by two motives; the hope of reward, and the fear of unpleasant consequences. A stream of scolding as long as from sun to sun, never yet had any other effect upon children than to render them wholly regardless of what is said to them. If you wish to make your children troublesome, scold them occasionally. If you wish to make them bad, scold them a little harder, louder, and more frequently. If you wish to ruin them, and relinquish all hopes of conquering them, scold continually; you will be sure to gain your object.

REWARD OFFERED.

The Journal of the Liberia Mission Annual Conference, between two and three years ago, was mislaid. This as every intelligent man acknowledges, is a serious loss to the body of ministers whose property it is, and of whose doings, for the last nineteen years, it preserves a faithful account. We have looked and inquired in different directions, but without success hitherto.

By the authority of the above-named Conference, through the columns of your paper, Mr. Herald, we would try to awaken a more general interest in our favor, by saying that, Five dollars will be awarded to any one who shall find this Journal and restore it to the subscriber

The book is not worth any pecuniary consideration, but is important to every minister.

THE TRAGEDY OF HELEN ABERCROMBIE.

[Concluded.]

After expressing his doubts whether Mr Wainwright were cognizant of the dreadful crime, the writer says:

And now the curtain begins to rise, the tragedy to unfold its plot. The villain hero is expelled from his unpaid home and its contents by bailiffs. Yet we find him in good lodgings at the West-end, (Conduit street,) frequenting the theatre during all his troubles. And poor Helen, following his and her sister's fortunes, still under the same roof. At this (to him) critical time, a slight illness affected her. Medical aid was rather officiously called in—even a physician was sent for. Dr. Locock saw nothing at all serious, far less any death symptoms, but prescribed of course. Mr and Mrs. Wainwright, it was proved, administered to her a medicine in powder, apparently to his order, and directly went on a very long walk (in London streets). Very quickly Helen fell into convulsions. The doctor coming in haste pronounced her laboring under affection of the brain. He did not remember to have prescribed any medicine under the form of powder. In an interval of the fits she recovered sense enough to say, "O, doctor, these are the pains of death." On the return of her two protectors, from their long walk, Helen was a corpse. The doctor, however—hardly conceiving the possibility of foul play (they were all strangers to him) to a harmless young creature, seemingly cherished in the bosom of her family, even her medicines passing through no other hands but those of her only friends—imputed the death to natural causes. It is important here to observe that any progressive "pressure on the brain," reaching the stage of convulsions, could not have allowed an interval of reason; coma would have followed as the harbinger of death; but such struggle between reason and its invading destroyer, admitting even partial recovery of speech and intellect, is quite compatible with "affection of the brain" produced artificially—that is, by exhibition of a deadly narcotic, or such drugs as act on the sensorium entirely through the nervous system, the brain itself remaining without physical alteration. Now, such insidious destroyer is strychnine, an intense extract of the drug coccolus indicus (to connect the links of this terrible tale, we must here anticipate a little, in the course of events, to record that, some three years after, Wainwright, who had been long skulking abroad, was seized and carried (under circumstances to be presently told) before the Correctional Tribunal of Paris; secreted on his person was found (among those of fearfully secret activity—strychnine!) The return to poor Helen (hereinafter "under the grave") Wainwright claimed the enormous aggregate of all the sums due. Every one of the offices resisted his claim nominally, indeed, waiving the darker ground of defence, and relying on (too well proved fact of false representations having been made to effect the insurances. Wainwright, thus baffled, became a wanderer on the continent during three or four years, all the while prosecuting his suit against the assurance companies in the law courts. At last, after one trial unfinished, and one jury discharged, because they could not accede to Lord Abinger's direction, ("to throw out of their consideration the darker insinuation," a final trial ultimately blasted the hopes of the audacious claimant, who happily never touched a farthing of the long expected "price of blood." It was merely pro forma, as a legal technicality, that the judge excluded the criminal charge from a Nisi Prius cause, the defence being deemed perfect without it; yet so strong was the feeling of the first jury against even the appearance of acquitting him of the "darker" charge, that they separated without a verdict, as has just been related. Following the felon at large," we find him living under the roof of some half-pay English officer at Boulogne. This gentleman, at his instigation, insured his life at some London office, but survived to pay only one half year's policy. The sum insured was paid at his death; Mr. "Jones" "remembered" something to do in the case, but the circumstances have not reached the public. Suspicion, of course, had ample scope. Those who put faith in "particular providences" have found the interest of a solecism even in the respect. Shortly after we find Wainwright in Paris, on the charge of bearing a false name and being without a passport. This he contrived to get over, but there was found (among his personal effects, (that already mentioned,) which might (when within the category of persons charged with the means of destroying human life," subjected him to the law of France—six months' imprisonment. The English gentleman who had befriended him in Paris at concealing his real name, was Forrester, in Bow-street (Fleet which it was said to be in Paris and recognized him on the steps of the Opera-house, [illegible] ventured to show a English ground, he was [illegible] to appear at a London [illegible] were the first "old familiar face" in [illegible] Forrester against Wainwright [illegible] "You are my prisoner," [illegible] It was now seized on a [illegible] (though short of what he [illegible]—for ever. It was not the deepest dye consisting in [illegible] the names of some trustees to a trifling property accruing [illegible] death, when conscience-stricken flight and prudential exile prevented him from obtaining. "Transportation for life" was now his doom. Thus the fact of his merely carrying about the very poison which in all human probability destroyed the young unfortunate beauty, Helen Abercrombie, became the means of changing a slight trouble into a six months' misery—that again (through the strange ubiquity of Forrester) led to perpetual exile, chains, and the "death of the wicked," in fury, squalor, and despair. With the vanity, effrontery, and overweening self-love inherent in this "Celebrated Character," while yet awaiting in Newgate his dismal voyage, he petitioned the home secretary for certain relaxations of rules in his favor, and the inquiries made forced on the recollection of the government the whole history of the insurances, (that virtual conviction for murder by deduction,) and the only reply to his insolent complaint and claim of personal exemptions from penal rules, appeared in the shape of heavy irons; and, in convict dress, to the music of their clanking, the ci-devant "Sentimentalist on the Fine Arts," the dandy and he murderer, made his last appearance on English ground.—Littel's Living Age.

Debate of the Faculties

On the Pursuit of Life.

The members being assembled in the Rotundo, called Cranium, Order took the chair, by general consent, when Casuality introduced the following resolution:—

"Resolved,—That it is time to make a selection of a pursuit for life, and that this question be now discussed."

"In deciding upon the merits of this resolution," said Casuality, "I think it the part of wisdom to select something which will be useful to mankind, and which can always be relied upon for a support. Anything will satisfy me which will not fail with the change of fashion. Agriculture is good and can never fail to be needed, nor will it ever be over done. Besides, the king and clown alike need bread; so that the vibrations of fusion and fluctuation of opinions, religious or political, can never set it aside. The same is true of blacksmithing, carpentry, ship building, masonry and manufacturing cloth, leather, iron and lumber, and many other substantial trades. Legitimate commerce, and general trade, are likewise necessary, but very liable to be overdone;"

Ideality arose, and said, "I trust that great care will be taken in this selection; for really I can hardly perceive it possible for me to be contented with any of these common pursuits named by our venerable friend. I most earnestly implore that we may have something ornamental, like sculpture, painting, daguerreotype, selling fancy goods, or if we must manufacture, let it be watches, jewelry, or that which is decorative and beautiful."

Approbativeness addressed the chair: "I agree, in the main with the last member up, but some of the occupations he has named would not suit me. The idea of working in plaster and marble, and looking dusty like a miller, is horrible. True we might excel so as to obtain fame, like a Canova or a Powers, when we would be courted by the great, and our name sent down to posterity on the enduring statue and scroll of honor. But should we fail of achieving the highest honors of the art, I would by far prefer to be a genteel tradesman in an elegant store, with aristocratic customers, where we could dress finely, and live in style. This is the life and the business for me. I go for a business of the highest respectability, and one in which our efforts will not be regarded as labor."

Causality whispered a word to Calculation who rose, and said, Our friend who has just seated himself is perhaps not aware of the anxious cares, the searching pains and harassing duties which will devolve on us to keep such a concern as this business in successful operation. Financiering and calculating profit and loss, contriving to meet payments, posting books and making bills, running after bad debts, and managing a store full of clerks and selfish customers all day and half the night, is no trifle, but is so much like labor that it takes a world of vanity to twist it into any other name. One may bow and smile over a counter to fashionable customers, and be arrayed in mercantile, with hair perfumed, and lily white hands, loaded with sparkling rings, and perhaps reap a few bargains; but this is the poetry of the business. There are ten thousand annoyances and cares that the inexperienced little dream of, until they become sober realities. Look at the grey locks, careworn features, and anxious, agitated manner of merchants—old before their time—and it takes off some of the finest of the commercial parsons."

"I am informed," said Cautiousness, "that ninety out of every hundred who engage in the mercantile pursuits fail in business and die poor; and I shall take time to consider before I engage in so hazardous an enterprise, with the assurance, too, that he must work—yes, work—as hard as any mechanic, and that kind of work too which wears out the health, nerves, patience, and sometimes the honesty of the man. I had rather have the dust of the miller, or the soot of the forge, or the clamor & labor of the lumber mill, with the certainty of substantial competence, than to shine in gay colors a few years among fashionables, and run the risk of being kicked at last into the hovel of pinching poverty by the very cliques, for the gratification of whose pride and vanity we have lived and labored, and to which we had finally been sacrificed."

"But," responded Approbativeness, "I am informed by Hope, and believe it true, that we shall be of the fortunate class who get rich; and Self Esteem says, we can, without doubt, succeed, as he is quite confident that few possess the talent which we can bring into business. I don't care if we do have balance sheets to make and bank notes to pay, for every one knows it is respectable to be seen and known 'on' change' and as to the night watchings and drudgery of the business, so much feared by Cautiousness and magnified by Calculation, who cares so much for that, if one can be called a splendid merchant, and ride in his carriage, and live fashionably? But it should be remembered that a merchant does very little work; that is done by clerks and porters. It should not be forgotten that we are to be a merchant, the owner and proprietor. Then we can wear fine cloth, elegant ornaments, polished boots, and live in ease and respectability."

"Nonsense," said Combativeness, "give us a business coat is utterly disgusted with the soft twaddle of Approbativeness about elegance, gentility, and effeminacy. For a white hand, standing desky, flashy chains and rings, and fashionable dress, he would run the risk of protested notes, bankruptcy, a hungry stomach, and a hovel. I would a thousand fold prefer to grapple resolutely in stern effort, and force from the grasp of relentless fortune an honorable competence. Than to smile and bow to win the good graces of the fickle fame. He may rub his white hand, and whisper soft persuasive tones for success; but I prefer to seize the prize with my bold and and stalwart arm, and shout my name to it with the lion's voice.—I am ready, with Firmness, Destructiveness and Constructiveness, to plunge into the rugged wilds of the West, and redeem it from sterility; or to build ships, or in them rid the stormy ocean; or in the mine, forge or factory, force matter into useful forms anything of an industrial character, that will enable us to drive our way to prosperity, will suit me better than selling shirt buttons, needles, pins and tape. It is not in my nature to wait for a business to come to me. I desire to rush out into active life; and by main strength of muscle or machinery, force prosperity to yield her treasures."

"Well said" resounded Firmness, "give us a business whatever it may be, that requires; and I will repay manly energy and perseverance. I cannot endure fickleness and irregularity. 'Sure and steady wins the day,' is my friend Combativeness may rely upon my constancy to aiding his proposition."

Self-Esteem rose, with unbending dignity, and having surveyed each member very [illegible]ly, proceeded to say, "I have listened [illegible] several suggestions of members, [illegible] the choice of a pursuit ought to [illegible] any counsel from my [illegible] have the work to do with [illegible] as to the kind of business to be [illegible] to me merely the general [illegible] tendency of the business which [illegible] be it be understood, however, that I would prefer a dignified calling—[illegible]ness, I care not what is its character, whether tilling the soil, navigating the ocean, wielding the sledge, rearing the edifice, following the forest, or substantial merchandize. Give me aid, Conscientiousness, Firmness, Causality, Combativeness, Destructiveness, and Constructiveness, as right hand men, and I will engage to make honorable any business which a man ought to engage in. Inglorious idleness, and consequent dependence, I cannot tolerate. To pursue a course requiring us to cringe to public caprice is equally odious. I cannot eat the bread of dependence, nor wear garments spotted with dishonor. I would be a street scavenger rather, and ennoble my avocation by a character above reproach & an elevated intelligence. No labor which is useful is degrading; and if I could be hired to make a boot or rule a kingdom should neither elevate one man nor depress another. We lack true personal dignity when we suppose that the honest dust and sweat of useful toil degrades MAN, or that simpering gentility in ornamental occupations necessarily accompanies true HONOR.

ANECDOTE OF JOHN ADAMS

When John Adams was a young man he was invited to dine with the Court and Bar at the house of Judge Paine an eminent Loyalist, at Worcester. When the wine was circulated round the table, Judge Paine gave as a toast, "The King." Some of the Whigs were about to refuse to drink it. But Mr Adams whispered to them to comply, saying,—"We shall have an opportunity to return the compliment." At length, when John Adams was desired to give a toast, he gave "The Devil." As the host was about to resent the supposed indignity, his wife calmed him, and turned the laugh upon Mr. Adams by immediately saying, "My dear, as the gentleman has seen fit to drink to our friend, let us by no means refuse, in our turn, to drink to his."

HEAVEN FOR A PRAYERLESS MOTHER.

As a little boy sat looking at his mother one day, he said: "Grandpapa will be in heaven! Aunt will be in heaven! Mary will be in heaven! Baby is in heaven! But mamma!" Here the child paused, and looked very solemn. Well, dear," said the mother, "what about mamma? Will not mamma be in heaven?" The little fellow shook his head very gravely and replied, "No, no, no." "Why do you say so?" asked the mother, deeply affected. "Oh, you do not pray," he replied, "so you will not go to heaven." "Yes, my dear, I do; I often pray for you when you do not see me, very often indeed." "Ah, I never saw you then. Kneel down now, and let me hear if you can pray." The mother knelt by her child, and prayed aloud for herself and little one, and that day learned a lesson she will never forget.

Mother! Are you going to heaven! Do your little ones think you are going, by all they observe in your daily walk and conduct? Are you leading the way to heaven? Do they often hear your voice going up to the throne of God for them? Those who do not pray on earth, may pray when earth is passed, and their prayer then will not be answered. The rich man prayed for only a drop of water—a very small request—but he did not obtain the boon he asked. May you be anxious to pray now that your prayer may be heard and answered. Mother Friend.

For the Liberia Herald.

AN EXPLANATION.

Mr. Editor.

I observed in the Herald of the 6th instant, a communication from Mr. Abraham Cuthwell, in which he mentions my name, in such a connection, that it is proper, if not important that I should set myself right before the public. The following is the sentence in Mr. C's. communication, to which I reply. "Mr Ball is of opinion that the Colonization Society does too much for the immigrants, but I do not think so."

Should Mr. C's communication be published by Editors of papers in the U. S. as he requests, neither they nor any of their readers will know who Mr Ball is alluded to, as there are many by that name; nor will any reader of it form an idea of the point of difference between Mr. B. and Mr. C. The following brief explanation, will place this important difference of opinion in its true light before the public. In a conversation between Mr C. and myself, upon the subject of settling colonies in Africa, he expressed the opinion that the Colonization Society, that aided free colored people to come to this country from the U. S should build houses for them. I expressed the opinion that the sooner they were left to their own energies, after they were landed here, the better for them. I mentioned some instances in which I thought that the benevolent provisions of some Colonization Societies had paralized the energies of some emigrants. I referred to some facts that had come under my own observation. My opinion is founded upon what I have heard from many of the colonists. The industrious and thriving (of whom there are many in this Republic,) always spoke kindly of the Colonization Society that sent them out, and appeared perfectly satisfied with what the society had done for them. The indolent, (and it cannot be concealed that there are a few such), never failed to complain of the society for what it had not done for them! Some have expressed the opinion that the Am: Col: Society ought to provide for emmigrants for three years rather than for six months. Were this to be done it would, I have no doubt, be a serious detriment to the settlers.

Mr. C's. communication furnishes proof of the correctness of my opinion. He says, "The immigrants have no houses built for them, as was said, they have no farming utensils as was said to have been furnished them at Cape Palmas." Need any one be told where the people thrive the most, whether in Liberia, or at Cape Palmas? I certainly feel desirous that every encouragement should be held out to induce free colored people in the U. S. to come to Liberia, but if there are any who expect that their neglect to bring out an axe or a hoe to work with, will be supplied by the Col: Soc: they will be of little advantage to this country.

I am willing that Mr. C. should let the public know that he thinks better of his own opinion than of mine; and should circumstances prove that opinion to be more correct than mine, it would be a source of more gratification than regret.

I am dear sir,
Yours, truly &c.
ELI BALL

Monrovia, May 19th, 1852.

Editor of the Liberia Herald:

Dear Sir;

I should do injustice to my feelings were I to take my departure from these "sunny shores," without leaving behind me an expression of the high gratification which my short visit to your pleasant towns and counties has afforded me. I have been a constant reader of the history of the settlements, of the adversities & successes of this Republic, as well as a close observer of the glowing descriptions of your country; but I had formed no adequate idea of all I find that is attractive and inviting here. I have often said, and said sincerely to free colored people in America, "Africa offers a good home for you," but I knew not the beauty, the richness and the luxuries of the country. I was recommending. Now I see, and am delighted as I see this home, this delightful home for the free colored man, wherever he is found.

As my visit here was undertaken for the purpose of aiding the friends of missions in their labours, to advance the Saviour's cause in Africa, I have directed my thoughts and energies more to the spiritual than the temporal condition of the people; more to the cause of the Redeemer than to the products of the soil, and the wealth of the Republic.

The Baptist denomination in America planted the first church in this Republic, and undertook the first missionary work in this moral wilderness, and they have never withdrawn their hands from this noble undertaking.

As it is not improbable that some of the friends of missions on this shore may have thought that the Board of Foreign Missions was too backward to make appropriations for their missions in Africa, it may be proper for me to say a word in vindication of their cause.

For several years our Board sent white missionaries here; all of whom either died or returned in feeble health. Finding this an unsafe climate for white men, the Board used every proper means in their power to find well educated and devoted colored men for missionaries. Some were found and employed, but the number was small compared with the immense field to be occupied. They have availed themselves of every gift that has been presented to their notice, when the circumstances of the case have allowed them to do so.

The Board regards the funds placed in their hands, as a sacred deposit, and they will never pave the way to the pulpit for the gratification of a Demas, nor will they ever hold out to the natives the hope of earthly gain, to allure them to their communion. The history of modern missions particularly in the South Sea Islands, has taught all christians the folly of taking seed complicacy in nominal professors, where there is no piety.

The Board are anxious to be instructed in building up pure gospel churches in Africa. They may be deceived in the piety of both their missionaries & their churches; but they will never cease to labour for their piety.

The Board do not depend for success, upon the efficacy of their funds, but upon the piety of those whom they employ to preach the gospel. They will never be parsimonious on the one hand, nor prodigal on the other. They will cheerfully pay the required revenue to the government for all stores and supplies for their missionaries; but they will never enrich agents and pastors, for any service with which they can dispense.

In attempting to promote education in Liberia, the Board has to regret that they could not find more learned men for teachers;—but they have employed the best they could find. They hope soon to raise up a class of scholars that will carry up the work that has been commenced, to a higher grade of improvement.

We, in America, hope to see the cause of religion and learning advanced in this Republic and indeed, throughout all Africa, and are anxious to be instrumental in doing something to further the Redeemer's cause in this quarter of the globe; but our chief reliance for success is upon a pious and devoted ministry; a praying and labouring church and the blessing of God, upon our humble instrumentality.

During my short stay in Africa, I have had the pleasure to become acquainted with several missionaries of different denominations of christians, and have been politely invited to some of their families and mission stations. It is truly gratifying to see the devoted labourers in the vineyard of our common Lord, and to exchange views with those who are labouring to turn men from darkness to the light of the glorious gospel. May they all accomplish much good.

I am, dear sir,
Yours truly, &c.

Fishtown Movement.

At a meeting of the Volunteers and Immigrants for Fishtown, Buchanan; held at Benson's Country Seat Hon: S. A. Benson was called to the Chair and J. S. Smith M. D was appointed Secretary.

By motion the moderator was called upon to state the object of the meeting whereupon he stated that the permanent settlement of Fishtown had occasioned much anxiety throughout the County; that public meetings had been held to consider its utility and practicability, and to consult the most judicious plan of procedure to effect it.

That many persons, old settlers, had expressed their intention to settle there, provided they could enjoy the premium offered by the Legislature to Volunteers, and have the means of defence furnished them—Pres: Roberts in consequence of their arrivals offered to allow the Premium Lands to twenty Volunteers—since this information has been received the zeal of many have abated, and too much diffidence is manifested on the subject, many of the old settlers and the immigrants are anxious to have them move off. It is then for this meeting to determine what shall be done; shall we settle Fishtown without delay, or shall we defer it to a distant day? To foward its advancement proper Regulations should be drawn up and carefully observed and strict discipline enforced.—He then called for an expression of the house Mr. Dunn. proposed that the Volunteers build a comfortable house to stop in at night, whenever a rain prevented a return home, and that the volunteers appropriate their time principally to the clearing of the Busnes.

Mr. Jacob W. Williams urged to the same effect, and thought that much could be done in way of preparation toward its permanent settlement. Mr. Tytler was in favour of reoccupying the old garison without delay made a motion to that effect—the motion was not seconded however. But Mr. Dunn opposed the measure strongly, the number of Volunteers on the list were (8) to osmall to keep watch & work, but let them clear of the ground. Mr. Dungerford spoke to the same effect. Mr. D. V. Roach immigrant was for Fishtown in toto, it is the place of his destination, and whenever his health and strength permitted he was bound for Fishtown—he could that it could be said to him to morrow, "that you may plant your stake"—all, in his opinion necessary for the settlement of Fishtown is zeal and activity. Arise and declare it shall be done and it shall be even so—He spoke eloquently to Mr. Tytlers motion: Mr. Tytlers plan is indispensable, a storm may come, and if the garrison be rebuilt they would then have a covert, otherwise they would be exposed to its fury.—The immigrants are looking up to the Volunteers and asking, "when shall we be permitted to go with you."

On motion the house proceeded to the election of officers and the following officers were duly elected.

Ephraim Tytler—Captain,
Henry Johnson—Lieut.
Mathias D. Liberty—1st Sergt.
Ambrose Red—2nd.

Resolved; that Judge Benson be requested to draw up a set of laws and Regulations for the Government of Fishtown.

Query—Capt. Tytler enquired of the Chairman as commissary if he would furnish a good supply of ammunition for the defence of the Settlement—question answered in the affirmative, Resolved that the Volunteers proceed with all dispatch to clear away the Bush in the neighborhood of Fishtown, and that they set apart Monday, Wednesday, & Friday of each week following until that work be accomplished; and that all persons owning lands thereat shall be required to clear their lots and corresponding streets of Bush or give into the company an able bodied man three days for each lot to accomplish the purpose.

Resolved; that no less than eight armed men, volunteers and immigrants, shall be allowed to go at any time to Fishtown—and others are requested to observe this regulation.

Resolved that Lieut. Johnson be requested to solicit donation of our fellow citizens for the defence of the Settlement.

Judge Benson tendered as a donation for himself $10 00 and for the American Col: Society 30$

Resolved that the minutes of this meeting be posted and that it be published in the Liberia Herald.

OBITUARY.

Departed this life at her residence in this City on the 15th, March, Mrs. Martha Cheeseman widow of the late Rev. Abraham Cheeseman formerly of Norfolk Va. and who emigrated to this Country in 18.9.

Mrs. C. was born in Norfolk Va. in 1797 of respectable parents and in 1813 she embraced the religion of our Lord Jesus Christ, and united with the Baptist. She married the same year; and was permitted to spend thirty three years with the husband of her early choice. In 1846 she was left a widow, to mourn for one whom she so dearly loved, but she felt that it was the Lord who had taken her partner from her that he might be freed from the sorrows and afflictions incident to this life, she mourned, but not as those without hope. She often spoke of him, but never without evident marks of resignation to the Divine Will.

Shortly after the death of Rev. A. C. Mrs. Cheeseman's health began to decline she literally wasted away until she who was once remarkable for her size was reduced to a mere skeleton, at times she had some very severe attacks of disease, which she bore with the greatest degree of patience, and spoke with delight of the prospects of approaching dissolution. She would often remark that she would be called to join her dear husband in the paradise of God; when no one expected it. She waited patiently for her change.

During her last illness she was calm and entirely resigned to the will of God only expressed a wish to see two of her sons who were absent, this she was denied as they could not reach her in time. She resigned her soul without a struggle or a groan on the morning of the 15th, March.

Mrs. C. was an exemplary christian, an affectionate wife, a fared mother. She shall sorrow no more.

A. Son,

More liquor is drank on the sabbath, in Cincinnati, than on any other day of the week and the city police reports show conclusively that more crimes are committed on that day also than on any other two days of the week.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, MAY 19th, 1852.

Town Council.—According to the official returns of the election, lately held in this City, the following persons were elected members of the Town Council—viz:

Francis Payne,
Samuel Benedict,
John N. Lewis,
James B. Mc Gill,
David Moore,
B. V. P. James,
James C. Minor.

A company of merchants, in Monrovia, have agreed on a plan to import merchandize from England and the United States. One of the company will proceed to the United States, by the first opportunity, to enter into arrangements there: another will, in a month's time, leave for England, for the same purpose. We heartily favor the plan, and hope the company will succeed in making such arrangements as are desirable.

We also learn that a company of merchants in Grand Bassa, have made a similar movement, and intend commencing with a capital of twelve thousand dollars, which have already been subscribed. We wish them success.

Little Cal.....Since our last we have received no direct intelligence from this district of country. The messengers sent to the Chiefs have not yet returned. We expect to hear from them, in a few days.

It is now well known, that Prince Boyer of Trade town is in the states. Our readers will remember that he visited Monrovia, as the President, for an adjustment of all difficulties, and that the President visited Trade town to learn what proposals he had to make. Boyer desiring time to consult with the Chiefs and Headmen of the country, the President consented to adjourn the meeting. A few days after this, Boyer received a visit from Mr. Hanson, the British Consul, and after an interview with him, he again, assumed a hostile attitude, but he has now become fearful. He knows that he has a retreat;—even his headmen are censuring him for his breach of faith, and refuse to assist him with their advice, in making a second supplication to the President—they say, "we have already advised with you, and tho' the Liberians showed a disposition to be lenient with you,—you acted treacherously towards them—and you must act for yourself."—The natives of Grand Bassa, do not think that Boyer deserve the least consideration—that he ought to be made to leave the country—as there is no dependence to be placed on what he promises.

This is true—and we would sincerely regret to learn, that the least indulgence had been extended to him. He should be made to feel and that severely, the punishment, which should follow sedition & rebellion. Indeed, how can he expect to receive the least kindness from the Government and people of Liberia? What just excuse has he for his hostility to the Government? Did he ever utter a complaint, but received a favorable consideration? And after he had taken up arms to oppose the authority of the Government—and been happily defeated; the Government was willing to allow him to defend himself—this he seemed anxious, and was willing to do—in fact he petitioned for permission to do so, before the time for a second interview, he assumed an attitude which was unfavorable to a reconciliation with him. We say let the embargo on Trade town be maintained—and if it is necessary, let other steps be taken to restore a good understanding with the Headmen of Trade-town, independent of the will of Boyer. They are willing, and would readily consent to the adoption of any course, that would allow them the privileges enjoyed by the natives of other territories—they are heartily sick of Boyer and his treacherous policy and care not if he is offended at the freedom which they exercise in speech, when speaking of the policy which he has adopted, and which carries on its face, hostile intentions.

Can it be true?—Rumor says, that attemps are being made to revive the slave trade at the Gallenas—that three vessels are at sea off that place—and that two Spaniards, Don Chrispo & James Hermes are on shore collecting slaves, and as fast as they collect them, they are sent to the Sherbro, to be shipped on board the vessels. One of the vessels sails under Sardinian colors.

We suppose the President will adopt speedy measures to ascertain if there is any truth in the report.

The Fishmen of Pickanenny Cess tribe, scattered along the coast, are earnestly engaged in devising measures to free themselves from the difficulties they labor under, from the treachery of Grando, to the Government and people of Liberia. They have not yet come to a conclusion as to the best course to pursue. They are very much divided in their councils. One party which consist of old men strongly opposes the suggestion to deliver Grando up to the Liberian Authorities—they say, that tho' Grando has broken his faith, it is not the custom to deliver a Chief of their tribe to another people for punishment, and that they cannot consent to do so in the case of Grando;—but that they are willing to send him to their country, and make way with him by poison, or in some other way. The other party urges that he be delivered up without further delay. They say that Grando voluntarily made a treaty with the Liberian Government, and became amenainable to the laws of Liberia—that Grando in fighting the Liberians, did not consult with the Kings and Chiefs of his country, and in consequence, cannot claim the advantages which he would have a right to demand, if he had acted under the direction of the King and Headmen.

We have simply stated what the two parties have said:—and at present we will say nothing more. From reports, it is probable, that in a short time the result of the deliberations will be known.

Loss.—The cutter Expeditious, Joseph McGill, master, belonging to Daniel B. Warner Esqr. was wrecked on the 7th inst. in attempting to cross Grand Bassa bar—vessel and cargo total loss.

Our friends in Grand Bassa, are doing a prosperous business. It is said, that at no former period has there been more trade brought in by the natives, than has been purchased from them within the last three months. Indeed, they are making money—and it rejoices their hearts. They have had many difficulties to overcome—some of them of grave character—and their losses have been many and heavy, but they hope by the assistance of the Great Doner of the Universe, to be able to retrieve them in time. They are contented, with the present prospect of their affairs.

It is rumored that some unprincipled foreigner has smuggled large quantities of merchandize into Trade-town. If this report proves to be correct what kind of punishment does the miscreant deserve? If Boyer succeeds in obtaining supplies from foreigners, it will not be long, before he mar[illegible] standard of revolt. We hope in a few days, to obtain correct intelligence from Trade-town.

Cape Palmas.—We are informed, by good authority, that the people of Cape Palmas, are earnest in their conversation, for annexation to the Republic. It is to be regretted, however, that the views of some of the politicians can never be entertained by the Legislature of Liberia—they are unreasonable & unreasonable for. If annexation is ever asked for, it must be in the tone of solicitation. The petitioners only, is to be advantaged by annexation—the Republic, it is more than probable, will greatly add to its heavy responsibilities, by annexation. It has nothing to gain by it.

Our Palm Oil traders especially those in Grand Bassa, are severely pressed for the want of oil casks. In several instances, they have been compelled to refuse to purchase oil from the natives, for want of casks to put it in. In Monrovia, the case is quite the same, not a puncheon can be purchased. Our friends in Bassa have sent up a vessel which they wish loaded with casks, but there is none to be had. This conditon of things must not be permitted to remain, our merchants must begin to order shooks and casks from England and America, as they do other articles of merchandize.

MUSIC

BY REV. HENRY GILES.

The grandest office of music is that in which, no doubt, it originated—that in which, early, it had its first culture; in which latest it has its best—I mean its office in religion. In the sanctuary it was born, and in the service of God it arose with a sublimity with which it could never have been inspired in the service of pleasure. More assimilated than any other art to the spiritual nature of man, it affords a medium of expression the most congenial to that of nature. Compared with tones that breathe out from a profound, a spiritually musical soul, how poor is an allegory which painting can present or that symbol can indicate. The soul is invisible; its emotions admit no more than itself of shape or limitation. The religious emotions can not always have even verbal utterance. They often seek an utterance yet nearer to the infinite; and such they find in music. You cannot delineate a feeling—at most you can by intonation directly give the feeling. Thus related to the unseen soul music is a voice for faith, which is itself the realization of things not seen. And awaiting as the soul is amidst troubles and toils, looking upward from the earth, and onward out of time, for a better world or a purer life, in its believing and glad expectancy, music is the voice of its hope. In the depression and despondency of conviction; in the struggles of repentance; in the worldless calm of internal peace, music answers to the mood, and soothingly breaks the dumbness of the heart. For every charity that can sanctify and bless humanity, music has its sacred measures; and well does goodness merit the richest harmony of sound, that is itself the richest harmony of heaven.—Sorrow, also, has its consecrated melody. The wounded spirit and the broken heart are attempered and assuaged by the murmurings of Divine song. A plaintive hymn soothes the departing soul. It mingles with weeping in the house of death. It benefits the solemn ritual of the grave.—The last supper was closed with a hymn, and many a martyr for Him who went from that supper to his agony, made their torture jubilant in songs of praise.

An essay equal to the subject on the vicissitudes and varieties of sacred music, would be one of the most interesting passages in the history of art. In their long wanderings to the land of promise, sacred music was among the hosts of Israel; and in that great temple of nature, and roofed by the sky, they chanted the song of Miriam and of Moses. It was in their Sabbath meeting—it resounded with the gladness of their jubiles. When Solomon built a house to the Lord, it was consecrated with symbols, and psalteries, and harps, with the sounds of trumpets and the swell of voices. As long as the temple stood, music hallowed its services, and that music must have been supremely grand which suited the divine poetry of the inspired and kingly lyrist. Israel was scattered—the temple was no more. Silence and desolation dwelt in the place of the sanctuary. Zion heard no longer the anthems of her Levites. A new word that was spoken first in Jerusalem had gone forth among nations, and that too had its music. At first it was a whisper among the dwellings of the poor. Stealthily it afterward was murmured in the place of the Cæsars. In the dead of night, in the depths of the catacombs, it trembled in subdued melodies filled with the love of Jesus. Sacred music has power without a ritual. In the rugged hymn which connects itself not alone with immortality, but also with the memory of brave saints, there is power.—There is power in the hymn in which our fathers joined. Grand were those rude psalms which once arose amidst the solitudes of the Alps. Grand were those religious songs, sung in brave devotion by the persecuted Scotch, in the depths of their moors and their glens. The hundreth psalm rising in the fulness of three thousand voices up into the clear sky, broken among rocks, prolonged and modulated through valleys, softened over the surface of mountain-guarded lake, had a grandeur and a majesty, with which mere art is poverty and meanness. And while thus reflecting on sacred music, we think with wonder on the christian church—on its power and on its compass. Less than nineteen centuries ago, its first hymn was sung in an upper chamber in Jerusalem; and those who sung it were quickly scattered. And now the Christian hymn is one that never ceases—one that is heard in every tongue; and the whisper of that upper chamber is now a chorus that fills the world.—Christian Chronicle.

THE PRESSED LEAF

BY SARA E. LEECHFORD.

A little leaf, and nothing more,
So others would thy beauty see
But fairer than all summer's green
This little leaf to me!

A tiny leaflet Autumn touched,
It hath not lost the purple hue,
It bore that day, we found the place
Where all alone it grew;

Nor other leaf, its kin, was there,
Though wide the woods, and all around
Long vines clung to the sturdy trees,
And close their tendrils wound.

And we were near each other then,
Knelt side by side with laugh and jest,
And sought the rare moss starry-eyed,
With aye rekindling zest.

And then, that little purple leaf,
With quiet smile, so all your own,
You clasped within my outstretched hand
That little leaf alone.

And now, whene'er I ope the book,
Where it has lain since that sweet eve—
My heart is filled with blissful thoughts,
Though half they make me grieve:

Of that long walk with those we loved,
How we did then together stray—
But the we pressed le flet minds me too,
Now thou art fair away!

PROGRESS OF THE TRUTH.

A colporteur in the south-west writes, "On my first trip to C——county, I was told that I had better take a load of whiskey there than books. I went discouraged, but succeeded better than I expected. Three of the neighborhoods I visited have been blessed with gracious revivals. In the first, 25 professed their faith in Christ. In the second, more than 20 were added to the church. In the third, we had no meeting-house, but a neighbor promised us an old waste house, at which great crowds attended. Some days we preached under the shade of trees, and sometimes in the house. Sinners were awakened, and about 30 hopefully converted. A church was organized, and regular monthly preaching appointed, and also a weekly prayer meeting. Thus in a very small circle of country, during August, near 80 souls tasted the joys of religion.

"At one of the meetings, a youth, perhaps 15 years old, took a great interest in his sister's conversion. The next day I called at a country school house. They were glad to see the books, but neither the teacher nor the scholars had any money. This young man was there and told them that he had a five dollar bill, and that those who wanted books could have them. The school was thus supplied through an orphan boy's liberality."—Ib

THE GOVERNOR OF MISSOURI AND THE SABBATH.—A newly organized military company of Germans in St. Louis, desiring to take part in a grand Sabbath procession, urged the Governor of the State, to furnish them with arms by the 14th of September, "on which day the military companies will have a great parade." Governor Austin A. King unqualifiedly refused, giving as sufficient reason, that the 14th, was the Sabbath. He took occasion in his noble reply to advise those who had sought a home and an asylum here to adopt their habits to our moral, social, and law abiding habits. He expressed his regret at the disposition manifested by the Military companies of St. Louis to trample on Sabbath, and with praiseworthy decision added, that unless in future they observed the moral, social, religious, and legal rights of the community, he would use all his influence to disbanding them.

POETRY.

OH SPEAK NOT HARSHLY.

To Youth not harshly! since the wound
Upon the sapling green,
Still scars the ancient oak which hath
Its four-score winters seen.

Oh! soon—full soon doth sorrow chill—
Full soon the dark clouds lower;
Why shouldst thou tear thus ruthlessly
The pearls of the flower?

To Age not harshly!—age hath had
A weary weight to bear;
Troubles that well might pale the cheek,
And mark the brow with care.

Not harshly!—she is hearing now
Sweet tones she could once hear again;
Why shouldst thou rudely break upon
The dear, familiar strain?

Why shouldst thou wake her to the thought
That love and joy are fled?
Why dost thou make her long to share
The quiet of her dead?

Not harshly! He has erred, indeed—
And yet thou dost not know
The wearing strife—the tempter's power—
The bitterness of woe.

And when she fell—thou wast not there
To mark his victory;
To her could not reach the frenzied prayer—
The wild, imploreful cry.

Oh speak not harshly!—the dark clouds
Have not just rolled away,
And the gleam of sunset down
To gild Her changeful day.

Why so early check the [illegible]
When, ere to-morrow's [illegible]
The golden ray will [illegible]
Like those of April bowers?

Not harshly: thou art [illegible] too,
As those thou fain wouldst chide;
And would'st thou God's own deal with thee
As thou dost deal with them?

Then speak not harshly!—since a time
May be in store for thee,
When how for some kind word wouldst give
Treasures of land or sea.

LOANS.

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

A loan is an intrusted possession, to be returned, or repaid. When not limited by any stipulated term of continuance, it may be reclaimed at the volition of the owner; and its temporary use generally implies a favor or obligation of gratitude.

Strictly speaking, are not all our earthly gifts loans? We are accustomed to speak of them as if their title was inherent in ourselves, yet their unannounced departure often corrects this error, and discloses the tenure by which they are held.

All history is but a field to illustrate the shadowy nature of ambition's honors. Multitudes who, by virtue or valor, laborious service or hazardous enterprise, deemed themselves wealthy, or secure of popular favor, have been made examples of its uncertainty. Thus was Aristides in his banishment, and Socrates under the chill of the hemlock, and Columbus in his sequestration at Valladolid, and the fallen Wolsey in his remorseful confession:

"Had I but served my God with half the zeal
I served my king, He would not in mine old age
Have left me naked to mine enemies."

Still more touching was the execration of the noble Strafford, on his way to the scaffold: "Put not your trust in Princes, nor in the sons of men, with whom there is no help."

The strongest mockeries of fortune and of fate have been exhibited in different ages and climes, by those who have held the hereditary sway, and borne the envied insignia of royalty. Hippias and Hippiarchus might ancient Greece the frailty of pride and power, when vengeance, unsheathing her sword, by myrtle leaves concealed," struck with a lifeless corse, and drove the other a fugitive, to Persian wilds. The same lesson was given to iron-hearted Rome by the sons of Xenia Martius, who, when the secure citizens [illegible] had fain have fixed their youthful grasp to the rod of Aaron to reserve it, fled away, wrapped in peasant's weeds, leaving a stranger seated upon their father's throne. How mournful is the voice from England, our own ancestral clime, when the second of the Stuarts came forth beneath the shadow of his own palace at Whitehall, to die, and one of the meanest of the people reddened his axe in the life-blood of his anointed sovereign! France made her sixteenth Bourbon and his fearful Queen beacons amid the quick sands of pride and splendor, as she hurried them from the brilliant fetes of the Tuileries, the gorgeous gardens of Versailles, to the bar, the prison, the guillotine. Bonaparte read the fearful "Mene, Mene, Tekel," on the conquering banners of the allied Powers, in the capitulation at Paris, in the solitudes of Elba, on the rough face of the great grey rocks at St. Helena. There, the heavy surges, breaking against the shore, spoke hoarsely, day and night of the glory that was departed, as first the ghostly "majesty of buried Denmark" accosted the musing melancholy Hamlet.

Wealth, though one of the most coveted, is also among the most transitory of loans. It is unnecessary to revert to storied annals, or foreign lands, for a commentary on the inspired assertion that it taketh to itself wings, and flies away. It is subject to the sway of all the elements. Fire may devour it, water submerge it, earth swallow it, winds sweep it away. Its tendency to transition, to disappearance, without leaving a trace behind, is obvious to all; while the conscientious mind perceives yet another evil, the danger of abuse. "What way can Christians take," says the pious John Wesley, "that their money sink them not into perdition? There is but one way, and no other, under heaven. And this is it: let those who gain all they can, and save all they can, likewise give all they can. Then the more will they grow in grace, and the more treasure will they lay up in heaven."

Wealth unallied to benevolence and a sense of responsibility, is perilous to our eternal interests. Faithfully used as a means of influence of imparting happiness, relieving suffering, enlightening ignorance, it is one of the richest blessings. What an example have we of this truth, and on our own shores, of the noble adaptation of this gift to the highest purposes! The world has never seen in a female form such a union of rare endowments, unbounded liberality, and unostentatious goodness, as is now exhibited by our Swedish guest, Mademoiselle Lind. With the wonderful talents which, as the sister of the nightingale, she possesses, she covers, charms, and elevates, with a singular freedom from all selfishness and display; while, with the harvest of those exertions, she feeds the hungry, clothes the naked, comforts the desolate, rears the holy temple to uplift its spire, and the school to gather listening children under its brooding wings, in all future generations.

"O, there is, that doth inherit
A angel gifts and angel spirit,
Bidding streams of gladness flow
Through the realms of want and woe;
Many a home and misery's lot
Kindling at memories long forgot;
Seeking night oppressed with night,
And o'er the dark shedding light;
She the stranger's speech doth know,
She hath done their deed below,
And when o'er the misty strand,
She shall clasp the waiting hand,
They will fold her to their breast,
More a sister than a guest."

But to return to our subject—loans. Some of them, we perceive, expire by their own limitation. The season of youth is one of these. Its beauty, must pass away. Care, almost, resistance, regret are alike ineffectual. The rose and lily upon the cheek, like new pressed grass in the garden, must blight and fade. Let us not, on this account, bear in our hearts the murmur of ocean's tinted shell. Time will tarnish and shred away the shining, luxuriant tresses. Why should we dread or be ashamed of the snows that he showers upon the temples?

He will scarcely forget to furrow the forehead. Let us meet his ploughshare with an added smile. The eye must abate in its brilliance; the ear, its acuteness, forfeit its exquisite perceptions, and the limbs their elastic play. Since these possessions are fleeting, is there aught that can supply their place, or console us for their departure?

To every period of life, as to every changing season, there is a peculiar privilege, an appropriate charm. Grave autumn may not wear the buds of spring, but it hath the glory of harvest. There is a beauty that surmounteth age. We will therefore look, of advanced years are our portion, to the evergreen that crowns the winter of life; we will wear the perennial adornment of cheerful interest in the young and in passing events, and look forbearance, a broader charity, the spirit of those who, drawing nearer to a cloudless clime, should reflect its smile. We will take the beauty of heaven to exchange for that of earth, and be content.

Our most precious earthly loans, next to the salvation of the undying soul, are the partakers of kindred blood, the fellow objects of affection and friendship. Yet, by the tenure of this transitory existence, they can never go from us or we from them. The order of precedence is known only to the Eternal. Whether the silver haired grandsire or the cherished babe shall be first summoned. [illegible] of our strength, or the [illegible] like a pure violet beneath its [illegible], the mother in the tenderness of [illegible], the faltering boy, or the son upon whose young arm her weariness rested as a prop, is known only to Him who formed our frame, and remembereth that we are but dust. "For within a little while we return to that form from which we were taken, when the life that was lent us shall be demanded."

But in what manner should the heart's loans be restored? We return a book to its owner, with thanks for the privilege of its perusal; and repay money with interest for its use. How shall we render back our soul's chief jewels, when he who intrusted sees fit to claim them? Must it be without tears? No, the voice of nature may have utterance, and we are permitted to weep, but not to murmur or repine. We should resign our precious ones, unmurmuringly, with gratitude for so long a period of intercourse and enjoyment—with praise, if they were fitted for a higher state of existence, and called by the simple pa'a Father to his home of [illegible] in heaven.

Thus should we leave our dearest earthly treasures, and our own lives also, meekly in his hand whose infinite love and wisdom will do no wrong, either to them or to us. Our own lives are [illegible]? Have we aught that we can call our own, [illegible] hour or the next moment? The eloquent apostle answers us: "Ye are not your own. For ye are brought with a price. Therefore glorify God in your bodies, and in your spirits, which are God's."

May we, who have together contemplated the nature of our earthly loans, the uncertainty of their continuance, the suddenness of their flight, and the fitting modes of their restitution be thus assisted faithfully to use, or fortified quietly to resign them, and with an eye ever turned to Him who hath a right, when he will, to reclaim his own, revere Him, in the stillness of the soul."

SPIRITUAL INTOXICATION IN THE CONDEMNED CELL.

In dram shops there is a gin which bears the fine name of cream of the valley; in some of our gaols there is administered to persons under capital sentence a cream of the valley of death, which is not a whit less intoxicating than the other spirituous stimulus. The one is sometimes smuggled into prisons against law but the other cordial is not introduced in a bladder surreptitiously, but by the chaplain who thinks fit to supply it; and there are frequent instances of its producing a state of ecstasy in which the convict, going to death with rapture, appears an object more to be envied than commiserated, and presents an example far more for encouragement than warning. Chaplains who can work up the mind of the condemned to this ecstatic state, appear to derive much satisfaction and pride from their success; and they manifest an affection for the criminal proportionate to his susceptibility to their spiritual stimulus.

The last example of this class is that of Elias Lucas, who suffered for having poisoned his wife, in concert with his sister-in-law, with whom he had been carrying on an illicit intercourse, and who was likewise condemned to death for the murder. Both prisoners evinced perfect composure in meeting their fate, which it appears that the man had been taught to regard as a special grace, cutting short a life of sin, and speeding his soul, and dismissing him straight to sure to the joys of heaven.

The chaplain of the Cambridge gaol, the Rev. H. Roberts, having read the funeral service over the convicts immediately before they were turned off, cried out in a clear, loud voice, "God bless you; God bless you, sir;" and Lucas whispered to the executioner, "I am going to God—I am going to God."

He had written two letters in the condemned cell indicative of the state of mind to which he had been worked up. One is addressed to his parents, in which he assumes the character of a monitor, warning them to take care of their souls, which he seems to have thought in danger from [illegible] was free; as, not having committed murder, he had not had the misery of [illegible] which had been his lot. Having told his father to let the thought of [illegible] "rocky heart" be proceeds [illegible] —

"Dear [illegible] I hope to meet death with pleasure and [illegible] have [illegible] presence to take me from this world of snares, and sorrows and temptations, [illegible] a world of pleasure and comfort where to have no end; where tears shall be wiped from our eyes, and sorrows shall be no more. Remember this comes from the lips of a dying sinner, but you have Moses and the prophets; neither will you believe me till destruction cometh upon you as sorrow upon a woman in travail with child, and you will not escape. But I am in hopes of a better world above. I am in hopes that God has pardoned my sins and wickedness before I go hence, through Jesus Christ, my Lord."

Another letter to his fellow-prisoners he concludes thus—

"Turn then, turn away from the miserable path of sin; receive this as a voice from the dead, and when, my unhappy fellow-prisoners, we meet again, may it be with the happy spirits of those who are the children of God in heaven. I feel comfortable in looking forward to happy eternity, and when you receive this shall be no more your fellow-prisoner."

How few closing a life of virtue on a peaceful death-bed quit the world with this degree of confidence and elation! Addison, indeed, showed how calmly a Christian could die; but to see how more than calmly, how joyfully men can die, we must resort to those examples worked up by gaol chaplains out of the assassin-material.

The heads of the Church would do well to exercise some superintendence over [illegible] of these reverend gentlemen, and [illegible] any excesses of spiritual comfort in [illegible] Indulge in order to work up [illegible] off their conversion of the repentant [illegible] of grace. As for penitence in cases of the class we have in view, not a trace of its real nature is to be found. On the contrary, the criminal rejoices that he committed the crime, as through its consequences and chastisement his career of sin is cut short, and he is sped to the joys of heaven. This consolation and comfort is certainly the duty of the chaplain, but not to intoxicate—not to over stimulate with heated emotion, as we see in this example, to a state hardly short of ecstasy. The comforting which makes the death of the wretch as full of steadfast reliance and joyous hopefulness that of the most holy saints, for the sake of uniformity, must surely exceed the just measure of spiritual solace, and would render the modern Newgate Calendar a sort of supplement to Fox's Book of Martyrs.

The administration of the Sacrament to the Mannings was the subject of much animadversion, and in the present instance of Lucas and Mary Reeder there was not only the repetition of that rite, implying a state of grace, but also another example of a similar questionable sort. The report of the execution states:

"The bodies having been suspended the usual time, they were taken down and put into the coal, and placed within its precincts—and, what is rather unusual, the Rev. Mr. Roberts read the funeral service over them in the presence of the officers."

This was the reward after death for the state of ecstatic religious rapture to which the unfortunate had been wrought up, and for the chaplain to [illegible] excesses, and to judge whether they are for the honor of true religion, and for the interests of morality and justice.—Littel's Living Age.

THE WONDERS WROUGHT BY STEAM.—Amongst the many remarkable objects visited by Lord Russell and the Manchester, the large iron works of Messrs. Nasmyth and Patterson excited very great interest. Amongst the curious objects shown was an immense steam-hammer, upon Nasmyth's patent principle, which the firm have been constructing for a house in New York. It is the largest hammer on this principle that has yet been made, and falls with a weight of five tons. The entire weight of the ponderous machine, with the upright shafts between which the hammer moves, is about six tons. It was not, on the occasion of this visit, in a condition to be worked, but that the principle of its motion might be seen, and the nice exactness of [illegible] of with which that motion can be [illegible] from the breaking of an egg-shell to the [illegible] g and welding into shape of the [illegible] al, the party were taken to a small [illegible] manner how it was worked. [illegible] anvil-cast hammer. One [illegible] shown at it was the [illegible] an immense bar of iron [illegible] at red heat; and not less [illegible] was the case with which [illegible] iron, seven inches [illegible] means of an immense [illegible] ton of a punch to [illegible] through with the [illegible] the hammer dealt [illegible] cartridge dry wood [illegible] edge hammer with blows that did [illegible] the weight of the implement wield [illegible] human hand; and then with a single crushing stroke the block of wood was shattered, so that there was scarcely a fibre in it that clung to her, and the moisture or sap which it had retained flew out in all directions. Again, it was regulated to fall with the greatest nicety upon any object placed under it, and Mr. Nasmyth, placing on the bed of the machine a wine-glass containing an egg, the hammer fell only with the weight to crush the top part of the egg down till it was flush with the top of the brittle vessel containing it, and the glass was removed uninjured!—Littel's Living Age.

INDIANA.—This State, so rapidly improving in population and wealth, has a number of railroads, and on none of them is a car allowed to run on the Lord's-day for either freight or passengers. This speaks well for Indiana.

"WHAT HAS BECOME OF HER?"

A TALE OF NASSAU.

BY MRS. C. CORE.

THE vogue recently assigned by literary confederacy to the "Spas of Germany," and "Brunnens of Nassau," has been productive of numberless unforeseen results. Tunbridge Wells and Malvern have become bankrupts; and more than one jolly citizen, accustomed aforetime, to refresh himself with an autumnal trip to Ramsgate or Hastings, has extended his travels across the main, and died of sauerkraut and spleen.

Reckoning it among the rest, I arrived at Emmsbaden, last year, the first week in September,—setting out on a journey just as the rains set in. Nothing could be more cheerless than the aspect of the little valley. The Lahn ran heavy in its channel, and time as heavy as the Lahn. Reasonable people had abandoned the place; and nothing remained but a coterie of discontented English, astonished to find that the green curtain had fallen when they expected to be in time for the overture. It was perhaps owing to the want of better amusement, that one and all selected me as auditor of their several versions of an adventure which, towards the close of the season, had produced an unprecedented sensation in the place In the course of the three days I remained at Emms, I continued to sum up the various editions of the story; but in order to excite as strong an interest for the catastrophe as was expressed by my fair countrywomen, (who but for the timely incident, might have perished of ennui,) it will be necessary to begin (like the Belier, in the fairy tale) with the beginning.

It was on the day exceeding Mr Clifton's arrival in town, after a dreary winter in Ireland, that he was invited to a splendid fête, given by four rich and idle bachelors, at a villa on the banks of the Thames Walter Clifton was a guest eminently worthy of the entertainment Handsome, well-born, and accomplished, he had recently "come to his estate," which happened to lie in one of the disturbed districts of green island which seems bent upon eternally proving its greenness His mother, a widow lady of somewhat serious turn, resided in Dublin, where his youth and college vacations were chiefly passed; so that Clifton had none of the knowingness, nothing of the jargon of a London man. There are certain branches of useless knowledge and phrases of fashionable slang, with which Eton, Harrow, or Westminster renders the schoolboy as familiar as the most dowagerly of dowager dandies; but Walter's mind and conversation were pure from all these. He arrived in town a brilliant, animated, happy, sanguine creature; ready to be amused, willing to amuse; with truth on his lips and sunshine in his heart. When his Christ Church friend, Sir Robert Walmsley, offered him a ticket for the fête, he thought himself particularly lucky; and much to the amazement of the dandy baronet, who from affectation could scarcely allow himself to inhale the common air breathed by the rest of mankind, candidly admitted his delight.

"I'm afraid you will be miserably bored," was Sir Robert's apostrophe, on bestowing the ticket.

"I never was bored in my life," was Clifton's frank reply; "and should think it a reflection on myself not to be gratified at Ashbrook Farm."

With feelings attuned to enjoyment, therefore, he turned his cabriolet into the Fulham road, as the bright midsummer morning subsided into a delicious afternoon; and when, from a distance, he caught the sound of the military band, enlivening the fête, his light heart felt lighter than ever, and he quickened his horse's speed towards the gates. As it usually happens, where superfluous precautions are taken to secure the order of the day, disorder ensued. Such a superabundance of policemen were stationed in the vicinity of the spot to protect the plate and other valuable property contributed by the lordly fête givers, that having nothing else to do, they did mischief,—hectored the footmen in attendance, and set their coachmen squabbling with each other and slashing their horses. A London coachman is an animal peculiarly insubordinate to constituted authorities. There was one white-wigged, red-faced, irascible old gentleman, proceeding to the Ashbrook fête, who, on being reproved for impatience, (which was in fact the impatience of a pair of spirited blood horses,) whipped out of the line, produced a considerable smashing of panels, and eventually arrived at the gate with a policeman at each of his horses' heads—his brother whips cheering him on, the rabble shouting and swearing, the policemen looking wondrous blue, and the two ladies in the handsome chariot he was driving as pale as ashes.

The latter circumstances naturallly excited the sympathy of Walter Clifton. He was out of his cab in a moment, offering his aid to hasten them out of the carriage, now surrounded by a noisy, struggling multitude, among which the gentry in office were indiscrimiately dealing their blows. To escort them through the throng was the work of a moment; but it was not till they had arrived at an inner entrance, where tickets were received and shawls deposited, he had leisure to note that the elder of the two ladies was attired with unusual costliness, and the younger scarcely less lavishly adorned with the gifts of nature Both were warmly welcomed by the hospitable heroes of the day, with whom Clifton was unacquainted; and though his unknown friends turned towards him with eager acknowledgments, he had the mortification of being without the means of a formal introduction. It was a mortification; for the dark-haired girl who smiled upon him while her chaperon was pouring out her thanks, was one of the handsomest creatures he had ever beheld; with dark oriental eyes, the most graceful form, the most buoyant demeanour His sense of propriety scarcely sufficed to remind him that, till he had been introduced in form, there would be want of delicacy in presuming upon an acquaintance thus accidentally formed; and it was with some difficulty he tore himself from the contemplation of that fine intelligent countenance to go in search of a master of the ceremonies.

"My dear Walmsley," cried he, the moment he caught a glimpse of Sir Robert," can you tell me who it is that drives a very dark chariot with bay horses?"

Everybody drives a dark chariot with bay horses," drawled the dandy, trying to pass on.

"With white liveries?"

"My dear fellow, I know nobody—I never notice liveries."

"But you surely notice beautiful faces; and ——"

"I like beautiful faces to notice me. But, pray, excuse me. The duchess is waiting for me to take her into breakfast."

Equally unsuccessful were diverse other applications. Nobody listened—nobody cared—nobody knew anything about anbody. It is probable, however, that the objects of his inquiry succeeded on their part in ascertaining his name and condition; for as he stood overlooking a quadrille, in which one or two of his friends were engaged, the elder lady, approaching with her fair companion on her arm, addressed him with so much graciousness, that in the flurry of spirits excited by the animating scene, and almost before he knew what he was about, he engaged the beauty as a partner for the following dance.

All now went smoothly—more smoothly than his rashness deserved. They stood together—danced together—talked together—smiled together. Clifton readily discovered that his companion was a person moving in the best society, and commanding its courtesies; and with characteristic frankness, made her acquainted with his whole history in return.—Having loitered a few minutes near his fair partner, after returning her to the protection of her chaperon, he discovered that they were mother and daughter, and that the name of the latter was Rachel,—a homely designation; but when people are in the humour to be pleased, nothing comes amiss. To remain long by her side, however, was impossible. The ladies were too popular to be accessible to his assiduities. Rachel was beset with partners; and Rachel's mamma by half the fashionable dowagers of the day.

Meanwhile, the fête presented unprecedented brilliancy. It was a delicious day, and the lovely lawns of Ashbrook Farm were worthy of the weather. Every impression received by Clifton was agreeable, and tended to increase his hilarity. Never had he passed so enchanting a morning; and by the time that evening brought the fête to a close, and amid the trackling and sputtering of fireworks, his cousin, Lady Armagh, presented him in form to the ladies of the dark chariot with bay horses, as—"Mrs. De Bruyn. Mr. Clifton.—Mr. Clifton Mrs. and Miss De Bruyn," he had ceased to care about the ceremony. Accident had brought them together; and inclination kept them together nearly the whole of the day. They were already intimate.

At the opera the following night, nothing was so easy as for Mr. Clifton to visit Mrs. De Bruyn's box; at the Zoological next day, nothing so charming as to walk by Rachel's side. Finding that they were to be at Almack's and all the best balls of the ensuing week, he took measures for meeting them: and though they were on all occasions surrounded by the most fashionable men in town, Miss De Bruyn usually managed to make room for his approach. She evidently preferred his society. While he worshipped her beauty, Rachel evidently delighted in his frank and cordial character.

Amid the tittle-tattle of second-rate society, Walter Clifton would not have been a week acquainted with the De Bruyn's without learning every particular of their birth, perentage, and education—the name of Mrs. De B's great grandmother, and the amount of the value of her diamonds. But among those with whom they mutually associated, everybody is supposed to know everybody; because all are persons concerning whom everything is known. In process of time Mrs. De Bruyn invited Walter to her house in Berkley Square, where he was presented to a Mr John De Bruyn, a young man whom he took to be the son and brother of his friends. By the whole family he was cordially welcomed. He found them living in opulence. His beautiful Rachel displayed every accomplishment of a first-rate education, and he felt himself fortunate in having accidentally made his way into domestic circle which he was beginning to flatter himself might eventually become his own. With the exception of certain harsh peculiarities of manner on the part of the mother, there was nothing he could wish altered in the family.

A man less ingenious than Walter Clifton might in fact have been easily captivated by the attractions of such a girl as Rachel There was a nobleness and high-mindedness in her sentiments peculiarly consonant with the loftiness beauty of her person. Of all the women he had ever heard converse, not one approached her in studied eloquence, in information, in correctness of taste and judgment. He could no longer bear to talk with other girls. It was not only the liquid lustre of her dark eyes—the speaking expression of her finely formed mouth—which thrilled through his soul when he gazed upon her intelligent fact, It was that he believed in her preference; that she conversed with him far more unreservedly than with any other man of her acquaintance; and he only trembled least he might injure his cause by precipitancy, so difficult was it to restrain himself from declaring in form to Mrs De Bruyn his desire to be admitted as a suitor to her daughter. He felt that six weeks' acquaintance could not justify such a pretension; and contented himself with writing to his Irishman of business for a formal statement of the nature and condition of his property, that he might be prepared to meet the inquiries likely to arise on his proposals

Such was the happy state of Clifton's feelings while daily engaged in escorting the lady of his thoughts to exhibition, picnics, water-parties, breakfasts, reviews; dancing with her at every ball, and sitting entranced by her side at every opera No objection was formed to his attention. John De Bruyn, a dull, sullen young man, was in constant attendance on his sister, and on excellent terms with her admirer; and though their conversation was usually carried on in whispers, the single word of which from Rachel's lips reached the inmost recesses of the heart of Clifton, neither mother, nor brother, nor any present, could be unobservant of their increasing intimacy.

One morning the young lover, calling at an earlier hour than usual in Berkley Square, and finding Mrs. De Bruyn alone, naturally inquired for her daughter

"Rachel is gone to sit for her picture," was the reply.

"Her picture! to whom? Who, who, will do her justice?" cried Clifton eagerly.

"Chalon, I hope. The sketch promises extremely well. John saw it yesterday, and was delighted."

"The picture is intended then for a present to Mr. De Bruyn?" observed Walter.

"No; it is for myself. I shall want it as a remembrance when she is gone. Rachel will leave it with me on her marriage."

Clifton coloured deeply. The allusion appeared too explicit to be mistaken; and he was beginning to imagine of himself whether it might not be intended as a spur to his tardy explanation, when Mrs. De Bruyn calmly added, "Rachel's marriage takes place, you know in August."

"Her marriage!"

"I trust John has given you an invitation in form?"

Walter Clifton trembled from head to foot, as he inquired, with assumed composure, what happy man Miss De Bruyn was about to honour with her hand. The mother regarded him with unfeigned surprise.

"It is surely possible you can be unaware," said she, "that Rachel is about to marry her cousin John? The terms of the late Mr. De Bruyn's will (thanks to the officiousness of the newspapers) were made so very public, that I fancied all the world acquainted with my daughter's engagement, which has existed from her birth. It was, in fact, the only method by which poor Mr. De Bruyn could concentrate the affairs of his house. John will, henceforth, assume the sole control of the business. Among families of our persuasions such alliances are common."

"Persuasion!—business!"—Yes! Walter Clifton began to understand it all!—Rachel was doubtless the daughter of the great Jew banker, De Bruyn, defunct a few years before, the details of whose will had occupied three columns per day of the morning papers for nearly a week. He ought to have remembered all this—he ought to have inquired—he ought to have known, or rather, people ought to have warned him! Yet why, or wherefore? Was it not tacitly understood that all London, from the Regent's Park to St. James's, was familiar with the fortunes of the great heiress, the only daughter of the most famous of Jewish bankers?

Luckily for Walter, the announcement of a visitor at that moment afforded him an opportunity of escape from the house; and his horse being in waiting at the door, he galloped many miles into the country, before the stunning effects of the blow he had received in the slightest degree subsided.

His first impulse was to quit London that very night; not to Ireland—or only the preceding day he had despatched a letter to his mother explanatory of his happy expectations, and he had not courage enough to expose himself to the old lady's questions and condolence. No!—he would go abroad—to Turkey—to Egypt—the East; no matter where, so that he might escape all recurrence to the origin of his wretchedness. On Rachel De Bruyn he never wished to look again. One of the weaknesses of his moral nature was antipathy to Jews and all relating to them; and even were the prejudice surmounted, this member of the tribe—this one—this Jewess—had done him a deliberate injury,—had trifled with, for her wanton amusement, his affections. No!—he never wished to look on Rachel De Bruyn again!

On his return towards London, however, calmer feelings ensued. Though still determined to fly from England, he resolved, ere his departure, to indulge in a last view of that which was so eminently lovely, as if for the purpose of engraving still more indelibly in his bosom the image of its false idol. He could trust himself to look upon her without self-betrayal. He possessed an all-potent antidote to the power of her charms—to the magic of her voice. She was a Jewess!

According to previous engagement, they were to meet and dance together that evening, at one of the finest fetes of the season. He would go—he would confront her—he would fix his eyes for the last time upon the future Mrs. John De Bruyn.

From the smiling self-possession with which she accosted him, Clifton inferred with truth that his emotion of the morning had passed unnoticed by her mother. No suspicions were excited, they might part as calmly as they had met. Rachel should never know the anguish she had inflicted—never learn that he had quitted her with a breaking heart to bid an eternal farewell to the country wherein she abided. He began, therefore, to talk with indifference on indifferent subjects; and un-suspicious that any peculiar agitation was labouring in his breast, the lovely girl readily accepted his arm, to make the tour of the illuminated gardens of ——House. At length they sat down together, still talking with levity, and smiling with unconcern; till, after gazing in silence a moment or two upon the beautiful contour of her half-averted face, Clifton suddenly gave way to an uncontrolled burst of passionate exclamation. "No!—it cannot have proceeded from inadvertence," cried he, "you must have been aware of the cruel injury you were inflicting!—you must have seen how blindly I fell into an error, the results of which are to cleave to me as a curse for evermore."

Believing her companion to be attacked by sudden frenzy, Rachel started up, and proposed returning to her mother. But Clifton did not stir; and the tears that were now slowly rolling down his face appealed so forcibly to her sympathy, that, without uttering a syllable, she sat down again by his side.

"You cannot have been insensible to your influence over me," he resumed, in a broken voice; "and knowing the insuperable obstacles between us, why—why encourage my attachment for the wanton indulgence of a vanity which has withered every prospect of my life!"

"Obstacles!—attachment!" exclaimed Rachel, in grief and surprise, overpowered by the fervour of his address. "Dear Mr. Clifton, with what have you to reproach me? From the moment of your considerate kindness to us at Ashbrook you have been welcomed with warm friendship to our house—you must have seen how much we preferred your society—how truly flattered we were by your preference of ours."

"Then why not explain at once the impossibility of the expectations I was forming?"

"Expectations!"

"Of making you my wife—my own—my beloved and loving household companion."

Rachel grew pale as she listened to this earnest apostrophe.

"You cannot have meditated this," said she, at length, in a tremulous voice. "The difference of religion——"

"I knew it not—I guessed it not."

"Yet our name—our well known connexions——"

"I saw nothing but your beauty—your excellence. I asked nothing—I cared for nothing but to be near you, still and ever near you—near you as now, when, gazing for the last time upon your face, I feel that my earthly happiness is crushed for ever. Rachel! you must have seen that I loved you!"

"You did but offer me, in a more marked degree, the attention I have been in the habit of receiving from others; who, aware of my faith, my family, my betrothment to my cousin, show me the attentions due to my age, sex, and position in society."

"And has there been nothing then in your own feelings towards me, to war against your happiness in the step into which you are about to enter? You have a cold heart to—I imagined!" cried Walter Clifton.

"My cousin is no less partial to you than my mother and myself; I have always hoped our friendship would continue after my marriage," pleaded Miss De Bruyn, accustomed from childhood to regard the tie of wedlock as part of the ceremony of social life.

"Your cousin!" exclaimed Clifton. "Could you imagine that your husband would remain coldly insensible to my passionate ardours?"

"I never thought—I never considered. I have lived with John De Bruyn on the happiest terms so long as I can remember," replied Rachel. "Why should he begin to thwart me and interfere with my preferences, on the eternal union of our destinies.

"Rachel! Rachel! you will drive me mad," cried Clifton, perceiving how closely unfolded was her soul in the web of early associations and religious influence. "What is the meaning of this strange combination of simplicity and intelligence? of feeling and insensibility? Are you about to bestow yourself as a mere endowment—to give up your youth, your beauty, to one you regard only as a partner in your father's bank? Or do you—(tell me truly, I can bear it, Rachel, answer me for once honestly)—do you—can you love this man?"

"Of course I do! My cousin has never breathed in mine ears a word to me, or been guilty of an unkind action."

"But is that enough for the intimate—the exquisite tenderness of wedded life? Is it to his eyes your own can turn in unspeakable sympathy with all that is bright, and noble, and glorious? It is from him you will seek encouragement in your aspirations after knowledge—after truth? Is it towards him you will be conscious of that intense and fervent passion, which fills eternity itself insufficient for its prospects of happiness."

Miss De Bruyn had no reply for language so new, so overpowering. It was not thus she had been accustomed to contemplate her union with her impassive cousin. It was a family arrangement, unanimated as that which made her the child of her mother, or the daughter of her tribe; but it was nothing more.

"I must not listen to all this," said she, becoming conscious of the delicacy of her situation, and making a movement to rise.

"You will not have to listen to it long," was Clifton's calm rejoinder, resuming some control over his feelings. "I am here but to bid you farewell for ever. After this night, I shall behold your face no more. Be happy, Rachel, since you can content yourself with the monotonous calm of an existence unbrightened by tenderness—unendeared by the ties of spontaneous, fervent, passionate attachment."

"But you are a Christian," interrupted Miss De Bruyn. "Even had not my destiny been sealed by an eternal compact, I never could have been your wife."

It was now Walter's turn to remain silent; and Rachel mildly pursued her advantage.

"If, as you say," continued she in a faltering tone, "I am to blame in not having discovered your attachment and appreciation of the obstacles to our union why did not you who were satisfied of my affection, acquaint me with the objections that were to prevent my being honoured with your hand?"

"On my life—my soul—I new not of their existence!" cried Walter. What was there in your position in the world, or your establishment at home, to induce suspicion that you were otherwise than the society in which I found you? But even had I known it," cried he, struggling with contending emotions, "nay, deeply as I am imbued by birth and education with prejudices against your faith and its professors, I would have waived all objections—forgotten all scruples—for the rich compensation of calling you mine for ever!"

Rachel was silent. A deep impression had been made upon her feelings.

"By my father's will," said she at last in a low voice, "I forfeit my whole fortune by non-fulfilment of my contract with my cousin."

"Are you then so dearly attached to the things of this world?" exclaimed Clifton, with bitter contempt.

"As little as any human being," replied Rachel, unmoved by his sarcasm. "But how do I know that others—that you—might be equally indifferent?"

"Great God! can you be so little acquainted with human nature as to suppose that the man who would sacrifice the deepest prejudice of his soul for your sake, would not also resign the paltry temptation of a little miserable gross?"

Again Rachel was silent. But the impression upon her feelings was trebly profound.

"You would make me your wife then—poor, penniless—rejected by my family—abhorred by my people——"

Clifton's reply burst forth at once from the impetuosity of a generous heart.

"You are excited by the passion of the moment," said Rachel, a bright expression of newborn love and happiness beaming from her eyes. "Think calmly of it, Clifton. I give you till to-morrow for consideration."

"You mean that you desire to deliberate on such a sacrifice!"—Littell's Museum.

A Chinese Map of the World.—In knowledge of geography the Chinese have been till recently sadly deficient. Malcom describes a map of the world which he obtained there, as follows:—

"It is two feet wide by three and a half high, and is almost covered with China! In the left-hand corner, at the top, is a sea, in which are delineated, as small islands, Europe, England, France, Holland, Portugal, and Africa. Holland is as large as all the rest, and Africa is not so large as the end of one's little finger! The Northern frontier is Russia, very large. The right corner at the bottom is occupied by 'the western ocean,' as it is called, containing the Malay peninsula, pretty well defined. Along the bottom are Camboja Cochin-China, and, represented as moderate sized islands; and on the right is Formosa, larger than all the rest put together. Various other countries are shown, as small islands. I should have given an engraving of this curious map, but that a true reduction to the size of a page would have left out most of these countries altogether. The surrounding ocean is represented in huge waves, with smooth passages, or highways, branching off to different countries, or islands, as they represent them. They suppose that ships that keep along the highways go safely, but if they, through ignorance, or stress of weather, diverge, they soon get among these awful billows, and are lost."

On Mysterious Interpositions of Providence.

It may be presumed that all wise and religious men have come to the settled conclusion, that, in regard to supposed remarkable providential interpositions, we ought neither to believe lightly, nor to reject skeptically;—neither to admit unproved tales, nor to fight against well-supported facts. The general doctrine, that the all-powerful and all-wise Creator can and may afford extraordinary manifestations, is not doubted by any Christian; and that he occasionally does so, even in modern times, is both consistent with reason, and proveable by evidence. Such facts when fully substantiated, are too valuable to be overlooked; they form a link between the visible and the unseen world; and I am induced, therefore, to bring before your readers a remarkable narrative, which is seriously vouched for by "the author of Tremaine," and which, if true, must be capable of corroboration from other sources. I cannot suppose that the writer though anonymous, has fabricated the story, as Defoe did that of Mrs. Veal's ghost to recommend Drelincourt's work on death; but in so serious a matter I should wish for direct and well-authenticated testimony. The surviving friends of Sir Evan Nepean, or some gentleman in the public offices, must surely be able to vouch for the facts, if they really occurred. The narrative is as follows:

"At the memorable dinner at Mr. Andrew's which I have mentioned, his story naturally recalled many others of the same kind; and one valuable gentleman, who had a greater range than accuracy of memory, asserted that Sir Evan Nepean, when under-secretary of state, had been warned by a vision to save the lives of three or four persons, who, but for this appearance, would all of them have been hanged through Sir Evan's neglect.

"You may well suppose we did not give much credence to this; but knowing Sir Evan very well, I informed him of what he was charged with, and begged him to tell me what the ghost said. 'The gentleman,' said he, good humouredly, 'romances not a little; but what he alludes to is the most extraordinary thing that ever happened to me.'

"He went on to tell me that one night, several years before, he had the most unaccountable wakefulness that could be imagined. He was in perfect health; had dined early and moderately; had no care, nothing to brood over, and was perfectly self-possessed. Still he could not sleep, and from eleven to two in the morning had never closed an eye. It was summer, and twilight was far advanced; and to dissipate the ennui of his wakefulness, he resolved to rise and breathe the morning air in the Park. There he saw nothing but sleepy servants, whom he rather envied. He passed the Horse-Guards several times, and at last, without any particular object, resolved to let himself in with his passkey. The book of entries of the day before lay open upon the table, and in sheer listlessness he began to read. The first thing that struck him was 'A reprieve to be sent to York for the convict ordered for execution the next day.' It struck him that he had no return to an order to 'send the reprieve;' and he searched the minutes, but could not find it. In alarm he went to the house of the chief clerk who lived in Downing-street, knocked him up (it was then long past three,) and asked him if he knew anything of the reprieve being sent. In great alarm, the chief clerk could not remember. 'You are scarcely awake,' said Sir Evan: 'collect yourself; it must have been sent.' The chief clerk said he did now recollect he had sent it to the clerk of the crown, whose business it was to forward it to York. 'Good,' said Sir E., 'but have you his receipt and certificate that it is gone?' 'No!' 'Then come with me to his house; we must find him, it is so early.' It was now four, and the clerk of the crown lived in Chancery lane. There was no hackney coach, and they almost ran. The clerk of the crown had a country house, and meaning to have a long holiday, he was at that moment stepping into his gig to go to his villa. Astonished at the visit of the under-secretary at such an hour, he was still more so at his business.

"With an exclamation of horror, cried the clerk of the crown, 'The reprieve is locked up in my desk.' It was brought: Sir Evan sent to the post-office for the trustiest and fleetest express, and the reprieve reached York the next morning, at the moment the unhappy people were ascending the cart."

The above facts are so extraordinary that they require ample verification. The narrative may have been incorrectly transmitted; and if Sir Evan Nepean cannot be proved to have related it circumstantially as it is given above, it might be resolved into the more simple statement, that, not having received a return to his order to send the reprieve, he was uneasy, and went out in the night to his office to satisfy his mind. This takes away the most wonderful portion of the story, though it still leaves several remarkable circumstances which may be justly termed "providential," particularly the finding the crown clerk precisely as he was setting off for the country at four o'clock in the morning, so as just to allow time for the express to arrive at York before the execution.

But if Sir E. Nepean really asserted the facts to have been as above narrated, there is no just cause for setting them aside upon the allegation that they are contrary to reason, or Scripture, or experience. They are not contrary to reason; for what is there unreasonable in supposing that Divine Providence might specially interfere to save the life of these persons, who would otherwise have been launched into eternity, innocent perhaps of the crime they were condemned for, but, it may be with a weight of unrepented sins upon their heads! And if from unassisted reason we turn to the revealed word of God, we find it abounding with narratives of providential interference.

And as it is not unreasonable or unscriptural, so neither is it uncorroboated by similar facts, which, though related in uninspired narratives, rest upon undoubted testimony. There is, for example, a story mentioned by Mr. Newton, in his memoir of himself, which shows how a life, which Providence intended should be of great importance, was preserved by what seemed an unaccountable whim or fancy. The circumstance is related as follows by Mr. Cecil, whose transcript I give rather than Mr. Newton's own words,* as it adds Mr Cecil's testimony to its being a special interposition of Divine Providence.

"On finishing their trade, and being to sail to the west Indies, the only service Mr N. had to perform in the boat, was to assist in bringing the wood and water from the shore. They were then at Rio Cestors. He used to go into the river in the afternoon with the sea breeze, to procure his lading in the evening, in order to return on board in the morning with the land-wind. Several of these little voyages he had made; but the boat was grown old, and almost unfit for use; this service likewise was almost completed. One day, having dined on board, he was preparing to return to the river as formerly; he had taken leave of the captain, received his orders, was already in the boat, and just going to put off; in that instant the captain came up from the cabin, and called him on board again. Mr. N. went, expecting further orders, but the captain said, he had taken it into his head,' as he phrased it, that Mr. N. should remain that day in the ship, and accordingly ordered another man to go in his room. Mr. N. was surprised at this, as the boat had never been sent away without him before. He asked the captain the reason of his resolution, but none was assigned, except as above, that so he would have it. The boat therefore went without Mr. N., but returned no more: it sunk that night in the river: and the person who supplied Mr. N.'s place was drowned! Mr. N. was much struck when the news of the event was received the next morning. The captain himself, though quite a stranger to religion, even to the denying a particular providence, could not help being effected; but declared that he had no other reason for countermanding Mr. N. at that time, but that it came suddenly into his mind to detain him."

As regards Mr. Newton's preservation, the interposition of Divine Providence is equally conspicuous, whether we believe the captain's statement or not. He might have some reason for desiring Newton, which he did not think proper to avow. He was the captain of a slave vessel. Familiar with scenes of treachery, cruelty, rapine, and bloodshed; a man to whom by his diabolical profession human life was a trifle, when weighed against a lucrative adventure. Now it appears, by Mr. Newton's account, that the boat was so old and crazy, that it might well be expected to sink, as accordingly it did. The captain, seeing the state of the boat as it was about to sail, could not but forbode some disaster, and though the emergency of the occasion, or his recklessness of human life, might induce him to risk it, yet there were strong reasons why he might not wish to expose Newton to the danger. The reader of Newton's memoir will remember, that when he was an outcast and a slave in Africa, his father had applied to a friend, a merchant in Liverpool, to rescue him, and this friend gave directions to a captain of one of his vessels, who was setting sail for Africa, to find him out, and bring him home. He was at length discovered, but was so brutalized, that he scarcely desired deliverance; so that the captain, unwilling to lose him, invented a story about a person's having died, and left him £400 per annum. On the voyage homeward the ship was nearly wrecked, and the crew underwent the most appalling sufferings. —Newton being, throughout their labours, the foremost in every toil, and in cheering their drooping spirits. Upon their arrival in Liverpool, his father's friend received him with great tenderness; and Newton having now through the mercy of God, been, as he expresses it, "restored to his senses," and become desirous of leading a new and Christian life, his father's friend offered him the command of a ship bound on a slaving voyage, which he declined, not from any consciousness of the turpitude of that wicked commerce, but because he wished first to make another voyage in a subordinate capacity, in order to learn to obey, and to become acquainted with business, before he undertook the charge of a vessel. The mate of the very vessel which he came home in was in consequence appointed to the command, and Newton accepted the office of mate under him; and from his own modest account of his performances, was the very life and soul of the whole adventure. Nothing, therefore, can be more probable than that, if the captain foresaw that the boat was likely to incur serious danger, though he did not choose, for whatever reason, to countermand its sailing, he would wish not to expose Newton to the risk. He might cherish strong attachment to his old companion, the sharer with him of so many perils; and Newton was a man who called forth strong feelings of affection.—Littell's Museum.

Always Judge for Yourselves.

The justice of J. Roy's suit in the June court of Quarter Sessions, has since been acknowedged, from the fact that Mr. Straw has since given to Roye out of 205 gallons of oil due him, 100 gallons, which Roye immediately gave to the M. E. Church, now in course of completion; though he had before fully paid the amount of his subscription. To give the history of the whole matter from begining to end, would seem to be uncharitablike, uncharitable and ungentlemanly. It is therefore enough to give to the public the names of the gentlemen who know the whole matter, and will inform the public that Roye sought only his own, in his broken way, not by the use of any "Latin, save the os" abbreviation. Mr. Teage delivered 5 casks of oil for 1285 gallons. All they would hold was 1080 gallons.

Monrovia, July 21st, 1852.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, JULY 21th, 1852.

President Roberts left St. Vincent, Cape De Verds on or about the 20th June, in a steam packet, for England. Ere this, no doubt, he has safely arrived there. It is to be regretted that an earlier opportunity did not permit the President to reach England before he did. It is absolutely necessary that he should be there to defend his Government from the numerous false and mischievous representations that have been made against it, to Her Majesty's Government. We do not now deem it necessary to notice what these representations are, nor by whom they have been made. It is sufficient, that the people know that they and their Government have been vilely traduced, in the hope, that the British Cabinet may be less favorably disposed towards them, than it has hitherto been. We have yet to learn, that the British Government and people will receive for the truth every accusation which, malice and envy may invent to gratify deep seated prejudices. The people of Liberia are plain in their manners, and ignorant of the forms belonging to the brilliant courts of Europe—they are, nevertheless, mannerly and neighborly, and on all occasions will treat respectfully those who look on them with respect. Foreign officials on arriving in Liberia expect to be honored and caressed, more than do the official gentlemen of Liberia—and when the Government and people fail to worship these dignitaries, they speak with contempt of the Government and people—and the country, without once thinking that they may be rebuked for their impertinence. If, as some of them at times richly deserves, they are told to mind their business, they cry down Liberia and every thing in it, and if they had the power would destroy her existence. They forget that it is to Liberia, however contemptible they may speak of her, that they owe the little importance they may have gained, and that through her, they are indebted for the food they eat, and the raiment with which they are clothed. Presuming that all men are free, and can go and come when they choose, it is rather difficult for us to understand, why they remain in Liberia, or come to it, if the country and people do not suit their high notions.

Commodore Lavallette, the Commander-in-Chief, of the United States Naval forces on the Western coast of Africa, is, we regret to say, quite ill. We hope soon to hear of his convalesence. We have allways found the Commodore a true friend to the interests of Liberia, and hope it may be the will of Providence to restore him to health, that he may continue to exert his influence for the good of Africa, and to the honor of the Government whose commission he now, so honorably sustains.

It is reported that the cutter "Plunket" belonging to Gen. Lewis, was lost on the 10th, inst. a little to the southwest of Grand Cape Mount, and that H. L. Wall, the master, was drowned. We fear the report is true, and that the cutter and cargo will, be a total loss.

Why is the Naval Forces on the west coast of Africa, like the industrious missionary?

A—Because it rescues many a soul from degradation and slavery.—H.

POETRY.

I ONLY FEAR THE EYES OF LOVE.

[WRITTEN FOR THE OLIVE BRANCH, BY F. BENJAMIN GAGE.]

O, all things in the bounds of space,
Gifted with wondrous power and grace,
There's nought below, there's nought above,
So dangerous as the eyes of Love.

I fear no pestilential breath,
Nor in the battle shrink from death;
Of all below, of all above,
I only fear the eyes of Love.

There's nothing old, there's nothin new,
Nor wonderful, but love may do;
For e'en through gates of steel and brass
The wondrous eyes of Love will pass.

I cannot flee from Love away,
For love will go where'er I stray;
Go where I will, from sea to sea,
The eyes of Love will follow me.

Though many a country lies between,
Though Alpine mountains intervene.
Though ocean waves o'er distance roll,
The eye of Love will read my soul

The eye of Love is every where,
Through all the bounds of earth and air,
From north to south, from east to west,
Where thought may roam, or foot may rest.

Though love should come and break my peace,
'Twere vain in flight to seek release,
For Love will follow faster far,
Than bounding steed or roaring car,

Then shelter me from Love's dang'rous spell
Good Angels! all that dwells
In earth beneath, in Heaven above,
I only fear the eyes of Love!

EXTRACT FROM THE MESSAGE OF GOV: HUNT.

The position and ultimate destiny of the African race on this continent is a subject eminently worthy to engage the attention of the humane and benevolent. The highest motives of patriotism and religion prompt us to co-operate in all rational measures intended to improve their unfortunate condition. But it is of the first importance in considering a question of this magnitude, surrounded by so many embarrassments, that we should discard the passions and prejudices which are too ready to usurp the place of common sense; that the spirit of faction should yield to the higher sentiment of a wise and generous philosophy; and that in this, as in the ordinary concerns of life, we seek for a plan having some practical connection with the objects of our efforts. We are to inquire, not merely what may be desirable, but in view of the realities around us, how much is attainable, and what course of action will produce the most beneficial results? The colored race was brought to this continent almost as early as the white, and continued to be imported for nearly two hundred years. It is one of the most revolting features in the world's history, that during this entire period the most of the civilized nations participated in the slave trade. All of the thirteen colonies tolerated slavery within their borders.

The people of this State have furnished constant proofs of their aversion to slavery, and their abiding conviction that it is a moral and political evil, by abolishing it at home, and by their uniform opposition to its extension to territory acquired by the arms and treasure of the country.

In the Southern States of the Union, where a large part of the population cannot expect that the institution will cease in a single generation. It has become too closely interwoven with pecuniary interests to admit of any but gradual measures of relief. The progress of amelioration must, in the course of things, be gradual. It must be left to the calm reflection of the people more immediately concerned, experience having shown that we derive more to hope from their own inherent sense of justice and policy than from any interference that may be proposed by misdirected philanthropy, operating at a great distance from its object. The anomalous position of the free colored population, undoubtedly forms one of the most serious obstacles to the gradual liberation of the slaves. We cannot close our eyes to the fact, that although the free people of color enjoy a certain degree of liberty, they are commonly treated, both in the free and slave States, as an inferior race, and deprived of the social and political rights without which freedom is but an empty name. Even in our own State they are excluded from the most essential privileges of citizenship. Debarred from all participation in public employments, rejected from most of the institutions of learning and religion, governed by laws which they have no share in framing, having been denied the right of suffrage by a vast popular majority, shut out from social intercourse, and condemned to a life of servility and drudgery, their condition amongst us is deplorable in the extreme. Any great improvement of their condition under circumstances so calculated to crush the spirit of manhood, seems morally impossible.

The blighting effect of the inferiority to which they are subjected, is seen in the fact, that while every other class has rapidly increased, the colored population of this State has dwindled from 50,027, in 1840, to 47,937, 1850. A result so remarkable naturally excites apprehensions that the African, like the Indian race, cannot permanently co-exist on the same soil with the whites, and that a separation is necessary to prevent their ultimate extinction. However unjust the pervading prejudice which effects the public sentiment to ward the black race may appear, its existence and its unfavourable effect upon their welfare cannot be disputed. In several States, this antipathy is displayed in laws prohibiting the blacks from coming within their borders. The people of Indiana adopted a restriction of that character last year by an extraordinary majority. It is evident that every scheme for the elevation of the African to a position of equality & full citizenship in our country, must prove delusive until pride and the sense of superiority shall have been extirpated from the human heart. The instincts of nature, too powerful to be counteracted by the refinements of abstract reasoning, proclaim that the two races must sooner or later be separated.

The American Colonization Society presents the only organized agency which has contributed to accelerate this separation or produce practical results beneficial to the African race. This association was formed many years ago by benevolent citizens in different sections of the country, and has for its objects to rescue the free colored people of the United States from their social and political disadvantages, by placing them where they may enjoy the blessings of free government; to spread civilization and religion throughout the continent of Africa; to arrest and destroy the slave trade, to afford such owners as are willing to liberate their slaves, an asylum for their reception. For the accomplishment of these noble designs, a colony composed of free colored persons emigrating voluntarily from this country, has been established at Liberia on the western coast of Africa. For years the enterprise encountered many obstacles, but these have been overcome by persevering efforts. A careful examination has convinced me of the feasibility and immense advantage of the undertaking, and of its pre-eminent claims upon our support. Under the auspices of the Society, nearly 10,000 free colored persons have emigrated, many of them being slaves liberated on that condition. They have established a free republican government, and acquired, by a peaceful means, a large extent of country, embracing 200,000 people, and abounding in the elements of agricultural and commercial prosperity. They have shown themselves competent to make their own laws and administer their affairs with regularity and justice. Industry prospers, schools and churches have been established, and the people of this infant Republic, carrying with them the knowledge acquired in the scene of their former humiliation, are spreading Christianity and civilization over a portion of the earth which has been sunk for ages in moral barbarism. The value of this consideration will be felt when it is remembered that the population of Africa is computed at 150,000,000, of whom a majority are in the most abject slavery. By the efforts of the new republic the slave trade has been suppressed along several hundred miles of coast, and the extension of the settlements will extirpate that detestable traffic. Thus we perceive that this great work of humanity may claim the double merit of redeeming another continent from degradation, while it improves the condition of our own. It needs no prophetic vision to foresee that one of the great designs of a mysterious Providence is to be fulfilled by restoring the oppressed sons of Africa to their native soil after centuries of bondage.

A cause so beneficient, identified with the lasting welfare of two of the great races of mankind, rises high above the party contests of the day, and appeals with resistless force to the justice and humanity of the whole American people. I hope to see it sustained by the liberal action of the national government, seconded by contributions from several of the States. The employment of government steamers to transport colored emigrants from this country, would soon obviate the necessity for a naval squadron on the coast of Africa, which is now maintained there by the United States, at great expense and waste of life, for the suppression of the slave traffic. It may be objected to the claims of the Colonization Society that its operations are gradual, and that the consummation of its purposes will require a long series of years. But we should reflect that it is impossible to remove an evil of such magnitude by any human means within the period allotted to a single generation. It is not to be denied that the efforts of the association have secured the liberation of several thousand slaves, a result more practical and beneficial than has been produced by any other organization. Until some portion of this continent or of the West India Islands shall be set apart for the exclusive habitation of the colored race, African colonization must be regarded as the only effective auxiliary of voluntary emancipation.

A growing desire to emigrate is manifested by the black population, and many masters have declared their readiness to free their slaves when means can be found for their removal. Some of the States have made considerable appropriations to promote the object, and an increasing interest has been evinced to others. New York ought not to be behind her neighbors in the performance of a duty so important to her own welfare, and so beneficial to a large portion of the human family, now held in melancholy debasement. It is a work in which Christians and patriots of all parties and in all sections can unite their efforts without involving the country in political or geographical dissensions. I submit the whole subject to your enlightened consideration, in the firm belief that upon a full examination of its merits you will deem it in accordance with justice and policy, and an enlightened public sentiment, to manifest your approval of the cause by a liberal appropriation for the furtherance of its benevolent designs.

AFRICAN COLONIZATION.

[From the Baltimore American.]

For centuries—from the earliest period known to history, indeed—the great body of the African continent has been a terra incognita—an unknown region—shut out from the rest of the world, and secluded, as it were, within impassable barriers. Egypt and the Barbary States—the latter being known as the Numidia, the Lybia, the Mauritania of the Romans, familiarized to history by the crimes and exploits of Jugurtha, and as being the theatre of the opening greatness of the two powerful rivals Marius and Sylla—those portions of Africa bordering on the Mediterranean and those only, have been included in the annals of human knowledge and transactions. The bold enterprises of modern commerce, which have dared so much and penetrated so far, have failed in their attempts upon Africa. The interior has never been reached in any manner calculated to open or to establish intercourse. It is for colonization to accomplish what commercial enterprise has not succeeded in achieving. A foothold is now secured upon that vast continent, and a gateway is opened through which the unknown recesses of the interior may be visited. Nor is the interesting nature of this contemplation lessened when we behold in these colonists on this African coast the descendants of the native Africans returned from a bondage which was to them a school of discipline, and which has qualified them to be the ministers and heralds of civilization to their race, now and for centuries consigned to almost degrading servitude at home. Nowhere has the blacks improved so much as in the United States; under the relations of service which bound him to a master from whom he could learn. Every year of his residence here has been a year of progress. The whole race has thrived in the midst of a civilized community, in which they held an humble yet a harmonious position, making a profitable exchange of their labor for instruction and protection.

When, in the order of events, this relation is to be changed, how admirably is manifested the wise overruling of Providence in directing the footsteps of the emancipated blacks to to the land of their forefathers, bearing with them the elements of culture and the rudiments of religion—the best of missionaries, the most efficient of teachers! The climate of Africa, fatal to the white man, is salubrious to the sons of the sable race; it is like a wall of fire to keep the domineering Caucasian from intruding upon a land which Nature seems to hold reserved for one special portion of the human family.

The commerce of Africa, now in its infancy, is destined, we doubt not, to great extension; and with commerce and its extension the growth and progress of Colonization will go hand in hand. Each will aid the other. The project of a line of steamers to run between our southern ports and the western coast of Africa, as proposed by Mr. Stanton in the last Congress, will not be suffered to die away, we may be sure. The cause of Colonization requires the establishment of such a line, and the cause is important enough now, and strong enough, to make its requisitions heeded. It can speak for itself, and claim to be heard. It holds forth the problem of slavery in this country, and avows its ability to solve it—and its declarations on this point are words of truth and soberness, and as such they are believed.

A TRANSPLANTED REPUBLIC.

To inoculate a nation like France with republicanism is a hazardous experiment. But to transplant an organized republic, in its germ, to expand itself on a foreign shore, is no impossibility. This thing was done substantially, when the Plymouth colony came to this country with a written civil compact of their own. The thing is now in sure progress in Liberia. Though much is said of that successful experiment, its full importance has not begun to be realised.

The steady progress of that colony peacefully extending itself among the barbarous nations around it, not by conquests or violence, but by absorbing them and making them parts of itself; and these put at once into a process of civilization, contrasts favorably with the condition of the British colonies on the same continent. The policy of the British Government in colonizing Africa has been selfish, not designed to elevate the nations and teach them self-government, but to make them fit instruments and sources of British commerce. Hence, physical force and the terror of British arms have been the main instruments employed by them for civilization. And the result is seen in the terrible effusion of blood now in progress in the Cape Colony. And the proper tendency of each policy is now seen in the present actual condition of each colony. Upon the prospects of the one rest only clouds and darkness, and upon the other is rising the sun of a glorious morning. Never did an infant nation appear more like a cradled giant. The promise of future greatness—of greatness in expanding civilization of a high order—was not so fair and sure to our nation, even after our war of independence was finished, as is that of Liberia to-day. And sober reason clearly discovers that that nation is to be to the African continent, what this nation is to the American. There are many arrangements of Providence all pointing to this result. Even the geographical position of the colony is favorable for a great and powerful nation. Africa embraces in its circumference about one-fourth of the land in the world. But much of this, covered with desert sands, is as uninhabitable as the sea. And the habitable parts appear on the surface of it as the islands of a vast archipelago. And Liberia, taken in connection with that portion of territory, that will in its progress naturally come under its power, is virtually an island. In what may properly be called the Liberia region, we have a country bounded west by the Atlantic Ocean, south by the Gulf of Guinea, and north and east by the great interior deserts. Length from south to north eight hundred miles, width east and west 1,800 miles, area 1280,000 square miles.

This for all purposes of population is an island, except that it can be approached only on two sides by navigation. Here is room for a nation to extend itself over a fertile soil, and with the best advantages for a free and unlimited commerce, to extend itself to any reasonable length and breadth, and yet all the while enjoy a natural protection against any formidable hostile invasion from the interior. For it is no easy thing, to carry a war over thousands of miles of sandy deserts.

Such is the place which God has reserved for the nation to which he seems to have committed the task of civilizing and regenerating Africa. The establishment of such a republic on that dark continent, bearing with them the transcript of our own constitution and institutions, together with ideas and habits of mind formed to the conduct of civil affairs under them—and what is more important the Christianity that gives vitality and force to a free government—is the introduction of a new order of events wholly new to Africa. What England has done was an approximation towards this. All honor to the Christian philanthropists of England who gave the Gospel to so many of the natives under the British rule. But it was reserved to the American Colonization Society, to give to Africa a model of a nation—a germ of a free and Christian empire, such as is destined to send forth armies of missionaries, and also civilize the heathen by absorption of them into itself. We have been wont to talk of the "manifest destiny" of the United States. But is such a destiny for Liberia any less manifest?

Like all great enterprises, for which God has in reserve large success, this encountered determined and perservering opposition. But it has outlived it. And opposition now only makes itself ridiculous. For it is seen to be the work of God, and not to be overthrown.

☞ There comes a time when all that we behold is but a repetition of that we have already seen, and we seem only to live by habit. This it is which renders the old so indifferent to all things.

THE DAY OF TRIAL

FROM BUNYAN'S EXPERIMENTAL WORKS.

Christian reader, let me beg of thee, that thou will not be offended, either with God or men, if the cross is laid heavy upon thee. Not with God; for he doth nothing without a cause, not with men; for they are hand of God; and (will they, nill they) they are the servants of God to thee for good. Psal. xvii. 14; Jer. xxiv. 5 Take, therefore, what comes to thee from God by them, thankfully. If the messenger that brings it is glad that it is in his power to do thee hurt, and to afflict thee; if he skips for joy at thy calamity; be sorry for him, pity him and pray to thy Father for him; he is ignorant and understandeth not the judgment of thy God; yea, he showeth by this his behavior, that though he is as God's ordinance serveth thee by afflicting thee, yet means he nothing less than to destroy thee; by which also he prognosticates before thee that he is working out his own damnation by doing thee good. Lay, therefore, the woeful state of such to heart, and render him that which is good, for his evil; and love for his hatred to thee; then shalt thou show that thou art actuated by a spirit of holiness, and art like thy heavenly Father. And be it so, that thy pity and prayers can do such a one no good, yet they must light somewhere; or return again, as ships come loaden from the Indies, full of blessings into thine own bosom.

And besides all this, is there nothing, in dark providences, for the sake of the sight and observation of which, such a day may be rendered lovely when it is upon us? Is there nothing of God, of his wisdom, and power, and goodness, to be seen in thunder and lightning, in hailstones, in storms in darkness, and tempest? Why, then, is it said, he hath his way in the whirlwind and storm? Nahum i. 3. And why have God's servants of old made such notes, and observed from them such excellent and wonderful things? There is that of God to be seen in such a day that cannot be seen in another. His power in holding up some, his wrath in leaving others; his making shrubs to stand, and his suffering cedars to fall; his infatuating the counsels of men, and his making the devil to outwit himself; his giving his presence to his people & his leaving his foes in the dark; discovreing the uprightness of the hearts of his sanctified ones, and laying upon the hypocrisy of others—all this is a working of spiritual wonders in the days of his wrath, and of the whirlwind and storm. These days! these days are the days that do most aptly of any, give an occasion to Christians, to take the exactest measures and scantlings of ourselves. We are apt to overshoot, in days that are calm, and to think ourselves far higher, and more strong than we find we be, when the trying is upon us. The mouth of Goat, and the boasts of Peter were great and high before the trial came, but when that came; they found themselves to fall far short of the [illegible] they had. Judges ix. 38, M 33;-35; 69-75.

We see, before the temptation comes, think we can walk upon the seas; but when the winds blow, we feel ourselves begin to sink. Hence such a time is rightly said to be a time to try us and to find out what we are, and is there no good in this? Is it not this that rectifies our judgment about ourselves, that tends to cut off those sinful springs of pride and selfconceit wherewith we are subject to be overcome? Is not such a day, the day that bends us, and make us bow before God, for our faults committed in our prosperity? And yet doth it yield no good unto us! We could not live without much turnings of the hand of God upon us. We should be over-grown with flesh, if we had not our seasonable winters. It is said that in some countries trees will grow, but will bear no fruit, because there is no winter. The Lord bless all seasons to his people, and help them rightly to behave themselves under all the times that go over them.—Southern Baptist

Meditation on death—If thou must ever see another die, let not the impression of that most interesting sight be off set from thy heart; but remember, that through the same vale of darkness thou also must pass from this state of existence to the next. When it is morning, think that thou mayst not live till the evening; and in the evening, presume not to promise thyself another morning. Be, therefore, always ready and so live, that death may not find thee confounded at its summons. Many die suddenly and unexpectedly: "For in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh." And when that last hour is come to thee, thou wilt begin to think differently of thy past life, and be expressibly grieved for thy remissness & inconsideration:—The Friend

"NOT BORN TO BE DROWNED." The following touching incident is related in a letter from Yarmouth, England, dated the 7th instant, written by a lady, and giving an account of the disastrous results of the late shipwrecks upon the east coast.

"Last Friday a dear little babe, supposed to be about four month old, was picked up in the roads, off Yarmouth. Its long clothes prevented it from sinking; it was fast asleep, and almost benumbed with cold. There was no trace for any ship in sight, or of any boat for miles around; and it was supposed that the vessel from which it had been thrown had sunk and all hands perished. The captain who picked it up lives at Yarmouth and intends to rear it as his own. He allows the people, who come in crowds to see it, and I have seen it among the rest. It is a sweet babe.'—Boston Olive Branch.

A Hideous Monster,

There exists in French society, remarks the author of Monte Leone, and we may add that it is by no means limited by French society, a hideous monster known to all, though no one disturbs it. Its ravages are great—almost incalculable. It saps, ruinous poisons, dishonours, and defiles the splendour of the most enviable form

This minotaurus, which devours so many innocent persons is especially fearful, because the blows are terrible. It presents itself under the mildest and gentlest forms, and is received everywhere in the city. We find it in our rooms, in the interior of our families, in the palaces of the opulent, and the garrets of the poor. It has no name, being a mere figure of speech, a very word. It is composed of but one phrase, and is called—They say.

"Do you know such a one?" is often asked, and the person is pointed out.

"No; but they say his morals are very bad. He has had strange adventures, and his family is very unhappy."

"Are you sure?"

"No; I know nothing about it; but they say so."

"Do not trust that gentleman who has such credit, and is thought so rich. Be on your guard"—

"Bah! his fortune is immense; see what an establishment he has."

"Yes! But they say he is very much involved"

"Do you know that fact?"

"No! I. They say, though"—

This they say is heard in every relat of life. It is deadly mortal, and not to be grasped. It goes hither and thither, strikes and kills manly honour female virtue, without either sex being ever conscious of the injury done. Each as he reads these lines will remember cases illustrating the truth of what we say.—American News.

The Widow's Lamp.

Some years ago there dwelt a widow in a lonely cottage on the sea shore. All around her the coast was rugged and dangerous; and many a time was her heart melted by the sight of wrecked fishing-boats and coasting vessels,, and the piteous cries of perishing human beings. One stormy night, when the howling wind was making her loneliness more lonely and her mind was conjuring up what the next morning's light might disclose, a happy thought occurred to her. Her cottage stood on an elevated spot, and her window looked out upon the sea: might she not place her lamp by that window, that it might be a beacon light to warn some poor mariner off the coast? She did so. All her life after, during the winter nights, her lamp burned at the widow; and many a poor fisherman had cause to bless God for the widow's lamp. many a crew were saved from perishing. That widow woman "did what she could," and if all believers kept their light burning as brighty and steadily, might not many a soul be warned to flee from the wrath to come? Many Christians have not the power to do much active sevice for Christ; but if they would live as lights in the world, they would do much. If those who cannot preach to the old or teach the young, would but walk worthy of him who hath called them to his kingdom and glory, how much would the hands of ministers and teachers be strengthened, and their hearts encouraged! We are told that the chief priests consulted that they might put Lazarus to death; because that by reason of him many of the Jews went away and believed on Jesus. Lazarus does not seem to have been either a teacher or preacher, yet his very presence was a convincing proof of the power of the Lord of glory. Should not all who have known the power and grace of him who still is the resurrection and the life so walk that men may take knowledge of them that they have been with Jesus?—Extract.

ANECDOTE.

I cannot resist telling a little anecdote of Mr. WEBSTER'S last speech: A young man was reading it aloud to an old friend, and when he came to the quotation.

"Ye solid men of Boston, make no long orations," Mr. WEBSTER says, "I take that to myself;" "and then is added," says Mr. WEBSTER, "a sentiment whihh will undoubtedly meet with the approbation of the majority of those present."

"Ye solid men of Boston, drink no strong pot tion,"

When the young man came to this part of the quotation his old friend remark, "Well, I'll be d—d, if Mr. Webster took that to himself—he's too much of a Southerner for that!"

We find the following prophetic language in an exchange paper:—"The day will come when a man will as readily think of walking without feet working without hands, as of success without advertising. Such is the inevitable course of things; and in a few years not one from the greatest wholesaler of the greatest city to the smallest retailer of the smallest town affording a newspaper, will fail to see it. And success is for those who seize the golden ball of opportunity, who take the tide of fortune at its flood, who seize time by the forelock, start now and win the goal when their dilatory neighbors are beginning to talk about beginning."

THE SEVEN ANCIENT WONDERS OF THE WORLD.—These were 1st The brass Colossus of Rhodes, 120 feet high, built by Chres, A D. 288, occupying 12 years in making. It stood across the harbor of Rhodes 66 years, and was then thrown down by an earthquake. It was bought by a Jew, from the Saracens, who loaded 900 camels with the brass. 2d The Pyramids of Egypt. The largest one employed 360,000 workmen 30 years. 3d. The Aqueducts of Rome, invented by Appius Claudius, the censor, 4th. The Labyrinth of Psammetichus on the banks of the Nile, containing within one continued wall 1000 houses, and 12 royal palaces all covered with marble, and having only one entrance. The building was said to contain 3000 chambers, and a hall built of marble, adorned with statues of the gods. 5th The Pharos of Alexandria, a tower built by order of Ptolemy Philadelphus, in the year 282 B. C. It was erected as a lighthouse, and contained magnificent galleries of marble—a large lantern at the top, the light of which was seen near a hundred miles off; mirrors of enormous sizes were fixed round the galleries, reflecting everything on the sea. A common tower is now erected in its place. 6th The Walls of Babylon, built by order of Semiramis, or Nebuchadnezzar, and finished in one year, by 200 000 men. They were of immense thickness. 7th The Temple of Diana, at Ephesus, completed in the reign of Servius, 6th king of Rome. It was 450 feet long, 200 broad, and supported by 126 marble pillars 70 feet high. The beams and doors were of cedar, the rest of the timber cyprus. It was destroyed by fire B C. 365.

LEARN TO BE SILENT.—It is a great art in the Christian life to learn to be silent. Under oppositions, injuries, still be silent. It is better to say nothing, than to say it in an excited or an angry manner, even if the occasion should seem to justify a degree of anger. By remaining silent, the mind is enabled to collect itself, and to call upon God in secret aspirations of prayer. And thus you will speak to the honor of your holy profession, as well as the good of those who have injured you, when you speak from God.

FRIENDSHIP.

Do not believe, because a man smiles upon and seeks your society, that he is your friend. Smiles and professions, alas! are so abundant as to be of no value. He only is your friend whose heart is in his words, and whose actions illustrate them; who stands by you in all the vicissitudes of fortune, in sunshine and storm." When you find such a being, make him your second self; cling to him as your very life, for the jewels of earth are scarce and therefore precious; for the sand of life but glitters in the radiance of a high enjoyment, and even the golden bowl is broken at the fountain.

☞ Where is happiness always to be found? Don't give it up! In a dictionary.

A MARTYR'S VICTORY.

BY JAMES GILBORNE LYONS, LL. D

[When Alaric the Goth was defeated at Pollentia and Verona (A. D. 403) by Stilicho, the general of Honorius, and so driven for a time from Italy, the Romans celebrated that event with great rejoicing and magnificence. A triumphal procession & a conflict of wild beasts at once dazzled and gratified the multitude. The shows of gladitors were then forever brought to an end by Telemachus, an Asiatic monk, whom the people stoned to death in the amphitheatre for attempting to separate the combatants. Honorius was thus reminded of his duty as a Christian emperor, and soon after put forth an edict forbidding all such exhibitions for the future.]

The streets are thronged in mighty Rome,
The gleaming ensigns spread,
While warriors march in triumph home,
With firm and measured tread:
Foe foiled at last, and forced to yield
On Pollentia's crimson field,
Stern Alaric has fled.
And left his ruthless Gothic powers
All crushed beneath Verona's towers.

But when the clear Italian sun
Pours down its noontide fire,
The trumpet speaks the games begun
Which idle crowds admire;
And soon, from barred and gloomy caves
Driven howling out by troops of slaves,
In grim and sullen ire,
Beasts, the wild brood of many a land,
Pace, with loud rage, the level sand.

Gaetulia's lion, freshly brought
From scorched and desert plains,
And ravening tigers, newly sought
On Parthia's waste domains;
Bears from the frozen Oder's mouth,
And panthers from the burning south,
Bred in old Nubian fames,
Make there a stern and ghastly fray
For tribes more savage far than they.

But hark! the trumpet's warning peal
Is sounding as before,
And bondsmen clear, with staff and steel,
The red arena's floor;
The fainting brutes are swept away—
This saved to bleed another day,
That weltering in its gore;
And men, of martial frame and race,
Take with slow step the vacant place.

Two, chosen from the warlike throng,
Begin a deadly strife:
One a gray swordsman, scarred and strong,
One in the bloom of life;
This nursed where snows on Hæmus shine,
That torn from hills besides the Rhine,
From children, home, and wife;
And high-born matrons hold their breath
All bent to see the work of death.

Their toil was fierce, but short; and now,
Flung bleeding in the dust,
The Thracian waits, with pale cold brow,
The last and mortal thrust;
When rushing forth, till then unseen,
A swarthy pilgrim leaps between,
Strong in a Christian's trust,
And drenched with blood, yet undismayed,
Stays with fixed grasp the uplifted blade.

A light Numidian cross of cedar wood
[illegible] stranger bore,
[illegible] in holy solitude
[illegible] Ida's palmy shores
"Forbear us," he said, "for Him whose birth
[illegible] saving of peace on earth,
Rest and for evermore,
Servants of God in act and name,
Cast off these works of wrong and shame."

He ceased; a scowl like noon's eclipse
Spreads fast from seat to seat,
And fourscore thousand hostile lips
Loud words of wrath repeat:
They rave and roar, as groves of pine
Waked on the Etrurian Apennine
When storms the tall crags beat,
Till, heaved and troubled furiously,
Breaks in one surge that living sea.

The German leaves his task undone,
The Thracian creeps aside,
The sword-men flee like herds that shun
Vexed Arno's foaming tide;
But as a pharos meets the shock
Of waves on some unsheltered rock
Where seas are deep and wide,
Telemachus looked up and trod
That post of danger, true to God.

And when the stony tempest burst
On his defenceless head,
He stood unshrinking as at first,
As free from doubt or dread:
With aspect full of peace and love,
As if he came from worlds above,
And hands in prayer outspread,
He laid him down, nor breathed again,
Whelmed by that host of vengeful men.

Yet deem thou not the martyr died
Warring for right in vain;
His was the prize for which he sighed,
And his the eternal gain:
Fierce Alaric shall yet return,
And Rome's fair dwellings blaze and burn,
Filled with red heaps of slain;
But scenes, where man must bleed for mirth
Shall blast no more the ransomed earth.

For Liberia Herald.the

Mr. Herald:—I have a proposition to submit to the good, sensible people of Liberia. I believe we as a people, are willing to try to come up even with the age, if so, what I have to say here, will be acceded to. Next May will bring around the general election for Liberia's fourth poutical term, and in order that a general understanding, and an intelligent campaign may be had, in selecting servants for the people, it is here proposed that the very intelligent mode of nominating a Presidential ticket, which is adopted in the United States—that is, by a convention of delegates elected for that purpose in and by the different settlements throughout Liberia to assemble at a given time and place to examine and settle the claims, politically, of the different candidates proposed by their friends, by nominating, as the choice of such convention, a man for President, & a man for Vice President, who will be supported in the campaign and at the polls by the party, by whom and for whom they are nominated. Such a mode ought to be adopted and followed in Liberia henceforward. Liberia have two great parties, who are known by the names of Independent Republicans, and Consistent Republicans Such were the names, however, adopted in the last campaign. Each of these parties may therefore, have and hold a convention to nominate their executive candidates It is not for me to say who shall be first, or whether both shall meet at the same time and place, or how: I only propose that the business be done in and by convention. It is the most intelligent, orderly, and satisfactory to all concerned, of any advisable plan.

Here Mr. Herald, details the plan for the people of Liberia. There are 3 counties and 14 settlements—comprising villages, towns and cities in Liberia. Let the party wishing to have a convention, hold a public meeting in each of their respective settlements, let them there nominate and elect one or more. The number of delegates elected by and at a meeting, should be proportioned to the size of the settlement in which the meeting is held. that is to the number of voters there, say one delegate for every ten voters. Delegates for that settlement, (there may be more, six, or twelve delegates, just as the public meeting may determine), let them give their delegates such instructions as they please consistent with their duty and authority, let them give each a certificate of his election signed by the chairman and secretary of the meeting, to be presented to the president or other officer of the convention authorised to recive and open it. It is of course supposed that each delegate elected will accept of his election and therefore feel the force of an obligation to repair to the convention at the time and place appointed therefor, and to act there in reference to the good of his country, and the wishes of his party so far as they consist with public good.

I propose that the first such convention be held at Monrovia in December next, for several reasons; 1st. the size and conveniences at Monrovia are better adapted for holding the first of such conventions, than at any other place; 2nd, persons visit Monrovia from the different counties, for recreation, at every session of the Legislature, and such persons might be made delegates to the convention; 3rd. The members of the Legislature from the different counties might also be added to the list of delegates. If the time and place proposed for the convention be approved, it is recommendable that the delegates to it, all be elected in October, that they may have sufficient time to prepare for the convention. Let there, then, be appointed by the party so electing delegates at Monrovia, a committee to select out and procure a suitable place, and make suitable arrangements for the meeting of the convention. Let the delegates repair there properly, let the convention meet, appoint their own officers, and make their own rules for their government while in session and receive no one as delegates unless he presents a certificate signed by the chairman and secretary of the meeting which elected him, and whoever they may nominate as candidates for President and Vice, let them as the nominators, and the party who appointed them as delegates, stand by their nomination, or the nominees, & support them in the campaign. It is supposed that the convention will give us some kind of a platform of principles to stand upon Mr. Herald, I believe you, and every intelligent person in Liberia, will favour a convention henceforward to be held to make such nominations; the modus here detailed is not material. Give us your views, and if in favour of the plan, keep it before the people, and urge them to adopt it

Yours

P. V.

For the Liberia Herald.

How pleasant is a rural life—how gratifying to retire during the toils and perplexities of life to some calm and peaceful retreat and relax the weary mind. Rural scenery has always had its charms. Men of every age and profession have preferred the country as a place of retirement they have regarded it as "Friendly to the best pursuits of man,

Friendly to thought, to virtue and to peace."

Hence, we see them leaving splended cities & superb buildings to enjoy its pleasures. They leave the grand and imposing beauties of Architecture, the magnificient works of art, to regale their vision by the more simple, but more pleasingly impressive scenes of nature. They gladly exchange the bustling city for the silence and shade of the rural grove, the hum of business for the warbling of birds. The purest enjoyments of man, his most innocent pleasures seem to be associated with natural scenery. His most peaceful days, his happiest hours, probably, are those which are spent in the country.

"O blest seclusion from a jarring world!"

Having just returned from an excursion up the St. Paul's river the pleasures of the country are fresh in my mind, and I am forcibly struck with that line of Cowper.—

"God made the country, but man made the town."

Our trip up the river was a delightful one, we visited several farms on its banks, many of which reflect favourably on the enterprise and exertions of their proprietors. We extended our visit to Millsburgh, and were remarkably pleased with the beautiful and romantic prospects in its vicinity. We visited the female academy conducted by Mrs. Wilkins; it is held in a large and commodious brick building; the conductress appears to be a faithful and assiduous teacher. Among the settlers at this place, an air of neatness and comfort was every where observable. We also visited the Mission station at White Plains, where Rev Amos Herring resides, who most generously entertained us. There is at this place a manual labor school for native Youths in connection with the mission, conducted by Mr. Herring. This is a system which we believe has been found to be essentially necessary to the efficiency and permanent success of missionary operations among the natives. Its utility will at once be obvious, when we consider the many discouraging and painful feelings which missionaries have hitherto undergone at seeing native Youths, after having been taught to read and write, and in a great measure civilized, return, for want of employment in the settlements, to the interior, and adopt the old habits and customs.

This is certainly a sure method of carrying forward permanent civilization among them We believe a similar system has been adopted by the Episcopalian Missionaries at Cape Palmas.

A little below Millsburgh, on the same side of the river, we noticed the settlement begun by Abraham Caldwell Esqr. Agent of the New York Agricultural Association. We were pleased to observe the fine improvements there made. Mr. Caldwell is, undoubtedly an enterprising and industrious man. The continuation of the improvements commenced by his exertions, will certainly add much to the beauty and attractiveness of the scenery on the St. Paul's. We wish him success.

We visited the settlements of Kentucky, Caldwell and Virginia. They are making decided and rapid advancement, and to the passer-by, present an imposing appearance. The farmers in these settlements are successfully calling forth and realizing the resources of the country. We believe that it is impossible for one to visit the banks of this noble river and observe the steady agricultural improvements, the substantial buildings in process of erection, the evidences of comfort and convenience on every hand, without being impressed with the conviction that Messurado County is going ahead.

The scenery on the St. Paul's is as beautiful as it is diversified. The neat houses and well cultivated farms, standing on the borders of the deep green wilderness, overlooking the majestic stream as it glides silently but powerfully along, bearing on its bosom the rich productions of its banks, is a truly interesting spectacle. We have every reason to hope, "judging by the past," that the time is not far distant, when, for beauty of scenery, natural agricultural, and artificial, the St. Paul's will compare respectably with any river of its size in the United States.

The agricultural advantages of Liberia, are certainly great, possessing as we do a fertility of soil surpassed in no other country, probably on the globe. Our farmers have every reason to be encouraged, and powerful incentives to perseverance. If they will but earnestly "put their hand to the plough" they will open a source of wealth and independence for Liberia. But let them remember, that, no matter, however, fruitful our natural advantages, labor and exertion are indespensable in order to the realization of the resources of the country. Many improvements are yet to be made, much has already been done,—a great deal of the mighty wilderness has been cleared—but there is still a great deal more to be done, there still lies before us much land to be cultivated—an extensive territory—a boundless continent. There is room enough here for the energy and enterprise of all Africa's oppressed children.

Let them all come we need them on various accounts, not only to clear off the woods and cultivate the lands, but for all the great objects that tend to elevate and strengthen a rising nation.—

Always Judge for Yourselves

So N. B. endeavors and will do.

What did induce "P. V." alias Mr. D. T Harris, to depart from that plain injunction of right?—to lay down his business (soap boiling), to intermeddle in other people's affairs, is yet a mystery to N. B.; unless it be to show that profundity of erudition or pathos of brilliancy in the use of the two languages Latin and English, which his business does not find use for, in a public display, on either continent, unless in other's matters. His indelicacies of mind are apparent in the two effusions, under the signature of "P. V." in your Nos: of the 7th, ultimo, and 4th instant.

"P. V's." grammatical inaccuracies are unworthy of notice, but by the fact, that he that judgeth shall be judged. "P. V" says (in his piece of the 4th, instant,) "It is not easy to describe which is most pitiable of this per excellence, (used instead of "par excellence") effusion:" its arrogant trumpet-like Pharisaical or its stupendous weakness and folly. Here it is plain, that two things are compared by the use of "most" instead of "more." For to make it read as it should, if only two things be compared:—"Which is more pitiable,"—its arrogant trumpet-like Pharseeism, or its stupendous weakness and folly." The nouns, (connected by the copulative conjunction, and,) are made to be the other object, or other thing compared. But if he did intend to compare the three nouns the copulative conjunction should have been left out. And the piece would read so. "Which is the most pitable, &c;" Its arrogant trumpet-like Phariseeism, or its stupendous weakness, or its folly." We use "most" when three or more nouns are compared disjoined. His other errors will be seen by recurring to his 'effusions,' in both Latin and English. Mr. "P. V's." injudiciousness, might, in its narration, transcend all the limits of propriety, either in quality or measure. Which "N. B." intends never to meddle with, unless traduced. "N. B." therefore invites "P. V." to do as "N. B." always does mind his own affairs, and get to sell some folks without pay

Yours, Respectfully,

N. B

P. S.—The [illegible] to notice the writings of a would-be distinguished P. V., as a writer, who interlards his English with bad Latin, worse taste, &c., with bad orthography, see "Phariseeism." would never be held thus unworthy, except in self-defence.

Yours Respectfully.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, AUGUST 18th, 1852.

The Political Convention.

We commend the communication of our correspondent "P. V." in another column, to the careful perusal of our readers. The necessity of a political convention—or, if you will have it so, conventions, upon the reasonable supposition that there are two political parties in Liberia—to nominate candidates for the Presidency and Vice Presidency in Liberia, is so apparent that we suppose no considerate person, upon due reflection—embracing in that reflection the intelligibility to all persons, in every part of the Republic, of such a proceeding, and the great practical, utilitarian ends arrivable at thereby—will think proper to object to such an arrangement, much else to offer it strenuous opposition. "P. V." sets forth the modus operandi in selecting delegates to the convention, which we think is quite plain, simple, easy and practicable. It is, also, strictly republican and partakes largely of the spirit of the constitution. Ours is a representative government—a government of the people; made by them, and entirely at their disposal. They can do what they please under their constitution, and none may say to them why doest thou this? This being premised, and understood, it is plain that they can if they will nominate their officers by convention. It will be their (the people's) act, the delegates will be elected by them in a popular assembly for the express purpose of representing them—their will, their wishes and their authority—in an assembled body of delegates convened for the purpose of selecting from among that same people a man or men, who for prudential reason, political reasons, great national reasons, is, or are most incompetent, most eligible, or most available to be entrusted with the highest dignity and clothed with the highest honors and responsibilities of the nation. The question, the only question, is, will the people chose this mode from henceforwar to nominate their executive candidates? It is a subject in which all the people are interested, immediately and deeply. Will they then continue to nominate heretofore, in a confused jumbled manner? In different settlements and different counties so many different political caucusses, batches, or juntos offering to the country a many different men as candidates, a place in the list of our chief magistrates! Where there are so many nominees (one, possibly, for each settlement in the country) the people are cut up into clubs, clans, clubs, and cabals, among whom there is no understanding, fellow-feeling, or sympathy. But by electing delegates —to be apportioned to the number of voters as may be determined—from all parts of the Republic, and instructing them as to the preference of the people in their selection of a candidate, they will appear in the convention prepared to interchange sentiments in regard to a choice, and by concentrating the people into one voice, declare to the whole country who is the most available candidate for the Presidency. We think, with our correspondent, that for the first convention, Monrovia is the better suited place But thenceforward a more central place, would for several reasons, be advisable.

It is quite easy, therefore, for the people of the different settlements in the respective counties to meet in masses and fall in with the plan of the convention by electing a given number of delegates to give a fair and equable representation; the ratio might be fixed at one delegate to every twelve voters, so that the same apportionment may be had over all the country. 'P. V." is so plain and clear in his detail that it is needless to add anything thereto.

We close this scribble upon the convention, at present, but will continue to jog the people until they shall fall in with the proposal. Their good sense, we hope, will determine them in regard to the plan.—D. T. H.

Extra Session of the Legislature. We mentioned, a few numbers back, that there would be an Extra Session of the Legislature. Many reasons combined, prevented the meeting, before Thursday the 12th inst. The Session will close in a few days.

Ship Ralph. Loss. This noble vessel went on shore at Cape Palmas on the night of the 19th ulto. She had completed her business at that place, and would leave for this port the next day. We do not know the circumstances under which she was wrecked.

The loss of this vessel is severely felt by the Government, and people—property to the amount of nearly nine thousand dollars belonging to Government was lost—and immigrants and citizens are losers in considerable amounts. We hope the friends of Liberia in the U. S. will see that the Government will be re-imbursed for its loss—it is hoped that the property was insured to its full value.

There is but little security for the property of our citizens at Grand Cape Mount. Through the perfidy of George Cain and Boombo that country is in a very distracted state. In every direction the cry of war is heard, and the harmless and inoffensive people are robbed and slaughtered with impunity. The Government have taken this subject into serious consideration, and will no doubt adopt measures to restore the country to quietness and for the apprehension and punishment of George Cain, Boombo and their associates

We have received late dates from the Leeward Counties. Peace and tranquility prevail, the health of the people was good. Trade was in moderate condition;—and general contentment existed.

THE DEAD SEA AND JORDAN.

The Rev. Dr. Odenheimer, in a letter from Jericho, addressed to the Bishop of the cross makes this beautiful allusion:

"The contrast between the natural appearance of the Dead Sea and the Jordan was strongly symbolical of that between their moral aspects as looked at by the thoughtful Christain. Behind us was the Dead Sea perfectly enveloded in clouds, and hidden; from our view by the mist and rains before us was the Jordan and place Christ's baptism, with the bow of promise resting above it. The one spot marks the wrath of God against sin; the other declares the infinite mercy of God towards sinners The bitter wave that rolls above the doomed cities of the plain, may well be covered with clouds and darkness; the refreshing stream that Jesus has, (as our baptismal service says,) sanctified, and in, and by it, "water to the mystical washing away of sin," is most fittingly spanned by by the sign of love, bright and beautiful, as God's love to man is certain and unfailing."

How Mr. Webster Lost the Nomination. The editor of the Boston Courier, who was in Baltimore during the session of the Whig Baltimore Convention, and an active participator in its proceedings until the nomination was effected, gives a sketch in his paper of the 26th ult. of the doings of that body, and takes occasion therein to state the causes which led to Mr. Webster's defeat.

General Scott went into the Convention with one hundred and thirty-one votes—eighteen less than a majority, and these were headed by the New York delegation, which entertained, according to the article in the Courier, bitter and malignant personal hatred and virulent hostility to Mr. Fillmore, which not only led them to resist his nomination, and pass over Mr. Webster because he stood on somewhat the same platform, but induced them to sustain General Scott throughout for no other reason than that he stood in the furthest link of antagonistic position from the object of their bitter and envenomed hostility." Besides those who cast their votes for General Scott in the beginning, there were men among the Southern delegation instructed for Mr Fillmore who were determined to vote for General Scott as their second choice; and after it became apparent that Mr. Fillmore would not receive the nomination, they were ready to leave the bulk of the Southern delegates who desired to go over to Mr. Webster. According to the article already alluded to, 106 of the Fillmore men were ready on Saturday evening to cast their votes for Mr. Webster, if his New-England friends could obtain 40 votes for him in addition to three votes from Wisconsin, and one from California which had been cast for him. But the Northern Whigs were inexorable; although the South was ready to give Mr. Webster one hundred and six votes whenever they could accomplish anything, yet the North would not give him the requisite forty votes, because the nomination of Mr. Webster would not have been a triumph of Mr. Seward and the higher law. The statement of the Mississippi delegation, in its recent interview with Mr. Webster in this city, adds, says the Washington Union, confirmation to this point of the statement in the Boston Courier.—American Paper.

This is to certify that we the undersigned citizens of Monrovia Capital of the Republic of Liberia W. A. and of the Township of Millsburgh.—

Having seen the houses now being erected on certain lots or parcels of land granted by the Liberian Government to the New York Emigration and Agricultural Association, under the supervision of Abraham Cauldwell Esqr, Agent for the said Association in whose ability and integrity we have the most implicit confidence, as an undertaker, and also feel assured, that he will give the fullest satisfaction to those who have reposed confidence in him.

The buildings are in good situations, and are so constructed as to render every comfort agreeably with circumstances, although not very large, they will be found to answer the desired purpose.

We would therefore most respectfully and earnestly recommend the Association, to persevere in the good work so ably begun, as the reward is great.

We regret very much the sudden death of Elias G. Jones Esqr. he came to investigate the work and was much pleased with all that he saw relative to the very important matter, and had he lived to have returned to New York, would have given his constituents the most interesting and satisfactory report.

☞Mr. Meagher, the Irish exile attended, by invitation of the students, the celebration of St. John's Day at Fordham College, and on entering the hall, in company with two friends was received with cheers. At the conclusion of the dessert, the Rev. Mr. O'Reilly rose, and in very happy and appropriate language welcomed Mr. Meagher to the institution to which he replied in a brief but eloquent address, almost every sentence of which called forth an expression of delight. Mr. Meagher was then conducted to the President's room, where he was introduced to a number of gentlemen.—Kossuth was invited to the festival, but did not accept the invitation.

POETRY.

THE CONCLUSION OF TIME.

BY MARY NAFTEL, JR.

"And the angel which I saw stand upon the sea and upon the earth, I fled up his hand to heaven and swore by him that liveth for ever and ever, that there should be time no longer."—Rev. x. 5.

Time to thee shall be no longer,
Heaven's great herald will proclaim,
Through a medium clearer, stronger,
Than e'er sounded deeds of fame.

See that thou thy loins art girding,
With celestial fruit and love,
Trim thy lamp and keep it burning,
With the oil from heaven above.

Then the sound of heaven's high mandate,
Joy and peace shall bring to thee,
From this scene of care and conflict,
Set thy soul forever free.

Sin no more thy flight impeding,
High and higher thou shalt rise,
Till thou reach a safe abiding,
In the mansion of the skies.

Mingling there thy adorations
With the spirits of the just,
Who through grievous tribulations,
In their Saviour put their trust.

Hunger then no more shall seize thee,
Nor shall thirst thy soul dismay,
To the fount of life he'll lead thee,
And thy tears wipe all away.—The Friend.

"Poetry for Children"

Having observed an occasional article in "The Friend," for the instruction and entertainment of children, the writer thought, perhaps, some of the following pieces might be acceptable to some of our juvenile readers. They are selected from a little book entitled "Poetry for Children," and published in Hartford.

MORNING THOUGHTS.

Dark night away hath roll'd,
Glad birds are soaring high,
And see,—a ray like dazzling gold
Comes darting from the sky.

How shall I thank that Power
Whose hand sustains me so,
And o'er each waking plant and flower
Bids dews of mercy flow?

Teach me to look above;
Receive my morning prayer,
And father, in thy boundless love,
Make me this day, thy care.—Ibedem.

THOUGHTS AT SUNSET.

The sun has gone to rest,
The bee forsakes the flower,
The bird doth hasten to its nest
Within the leafy bower.

Where have I been this day?
Into what follies run?
Forgive me, Father, when I pray
Through Jesus Christ thy Son.

When all my days are o'er,
And in the grave I rest,
Oh! may my happy spirit soar
Up to a Saviour's breast.—Ibedem.

MARQUINEZ AND LA COLLEGIALA.

A ROMANTIC INCIDENT OF THE PENINSULAR WAR

Concluded.

Marquinez seized the proffered weapon, which was only stuck on the end of the ramrod, and using the greatest possible care to avoid noise, he began to pick out the cement and the small iron wedges by which the bars was fastened into the walls. It was necessary to take out all the three bars, for otherwise the opening would be too small to allow the body of a man to pass; and with no better tool than a bayonet, the task was not an easy one. At the end of half an hour, however, two of the bars had given way, and the prisoner had begun to work at the third, when the sentry, who, during this time had continued his walk without appearing to pay any attention to what was going on in the prison, rapidly approached the window, and, in the low hurried tone in which he had before spoken, exclaimed—

"The relief is at hand; hasten, or all is lost!" At the same moment Marquinez heard in the distance the q ui vive of a French soldier challenging the guard which was relieving the various sentries placed round the temporary quarters of the troops.

It is no disparagement to the often proved courage of Marquinez, to say, that in this agitating moment his heart beat with unusual quickness, whilst big drops of perspiration covered his forehead. His hand, however, lost none of its steadiness, and he plied his bayonet with redoubled vigour, but with less caution than before. Fragments of stone flew from the wall as he struck and delved with desperate violence. He fixed the sharp end of his weapon under the bar and prizing as with a lever, endeavoured to force it out, when the bayonet, already bent by the unusual purpose to which it was applied, broke off short, and the point remained in the wall. At the same instant Villaverde, awakened by the noise, which had fortunately not reached the ears of the soldiers in the guard-room, stood by the side of his chief, and in an instant comprehended their position. Our two guerillas seized the iron bar, which was all that intervened between them and liberty—between an untimely death and a life of freedom and enjoyment. They tugged and wrenched at the fatal obstacle, which shook but would not give way; the heavy tread of the Frenchmen had become audible, when, by an almost superhuman effort, the iron was torn from its place, and with the violence of the shock the two men reeled back into the centre of the room. Instantly recovering themselves, they darted through the window, and stood before their deliverer, who threw down his musket, and tossing off his shako, a profusion of dark ringlets fell upon his shoulders, and Marquinez recognised with astonishment the handsome features of La Collegiala. She was pale as death, but had lost none of her presence of mind. "Por aqui" cried she, and as the retinet turned the angle of the house, and entered the garden, the three fugitives bounded over a low fence, and disappeared in the obscurity. A moment afterwards, the guard, surprised at not being challenged by the man whom they were approaching to relieve, halted under the window, expecting to find that sleep had overtaken the negligent sentry. No sentry was there, but at a few paces distant, a dead soldier, stripped of his greatcoat and shako, was lying with his face against the ground. The long rank grass on which he was extended was wet with blood. He had received a stab in the back which had pierced through to his heart.

In less than an hour after Marquinez was carried off by the French La Collegiala had set out with a squadron in order to rescue him. This force, which included every man in the cantonment, was deemed sufficient, the peasant having reported the captors as not exceeding fifty in number. La Collegiala made sure of overtaking them before they reached Valladolid to which city, from the road they had taken, she had no doubt they would proceed. After four or five hours' hard riding, the Spaniards had gained considerably on those they were in pursuit of, when they met with some muleteers, who informed them that they were not above ten minutes in rear of the French, but that the latter must have already joined the main body, whose advanced posts were about a mile off. This was a crushing blow to the hopes of La Collegiala. A moment's reflection, however, was sufficient for her to take her resolution. She struck off the road, and after a few minutes' march across the country, halted, and formed up the squadron on a ploughed field. Then stripping off her richly-horred pelisse and embroidered forage cap, she replaced them by a coarse woollen jacket and felt hat, which she had procured from one of the muleteers. Favoured by the darkness of the night, she passed unobserved through the French pickets, and attracted by the lights in the windows of the guard room and of the colonel's quarters, she directed her steps to the very garden on which Marquinez's prison looked out. Concealed amongst some shrubs, she heard the orders given the sentry; and convinced that the prisoner whom he was directed to guard could be no other than Marquinez himself, she immediately formed a plan for his rescue, the partial success of which we have already seen.

The fugitives were no fifty yards from the village when they heard the French drums beat to arms. The troops turned out in an instant; a body of cavalry was sent to patrol the road, whilst parties of infantry hastened in all directions to endeavour to intercept the flight of the prisoners. Amidst the din and confusion, the voice of the French colonel might be heard, exciting his men by the promise of large rewards for the recapture of the notable partizan who had thus eluded his vigilance. Meantime, Marquinez and his aide-de-camp, guided by La Collegiala, laboured through the heavy ground; now falling into ditches, now stumbling over stumps of trees and other objects which their haste and the darkness prevented them from seeing. They fortunately passed the pickets before the intelligence of their escape had reached those advanced posts, the officers in command of which, hearing the drums beat to arms, and not knowing the nature of the alarm; kept their men together, instead of extending them right and left, which would probably have insured the taking of the three Spaniards. At length, covered with mud and panting for breath, Marquinez and his companion reached the squadron, which was still formed up in the field where La Collegiala had left it. Two men dismounted; Marquinez and Villaverde sprang into their saddles, and the little party of hussars moved off across the country in good order, and as fast as the heavy ground would permit. At the same instant they heard the clatter of the horse's hoofs of the French dragoons as they galloped along the road, which ran about half musket-shot to the left of their own line of march. This, however, caused no uneasiness to Marquinez, who knew that the enemy's cavalry, unacquainted with the country, would not venture to leave the road, and he was sure of being able to keep well ahead of the infantry, who in their turn, could not prudently advance too far from the main body. He reckoned, therefore, of being soon out of the reach of the enemy, when the march of the Spaniards was suddenly arrested by a broad and deep water-course, with high and perpendicular banks. In vain did they ride up and down, and lose some minutes in endeavouring to find a place at which to pass this new obstacle to their progress. The French infantry were approaching; the torches which they carried showing like so many crimson spots through the thick mist arising from the wet and marshy ground. Already the officers might be heard directing the search, and giving orders to their men. The only remaining chance was to return to the high road before they were perceived by the infantry and trust to a bold charge to break through the dragoons, which were in their front. The road was soon gained, and the hussars crossed the wooden bridge which was there thrown over the water-course, which gave out a hollow sound under their horses' feet. The infantry heard the noise, but paid no attention to it, taking the Spaniards for another patrol sent out from the village. The same mistake was made by the dragoons, whom Marquinez overlook a few hundred yards further, in a wide part of the road. The officer in command had slackened his pace when he heard other cavalry approaching, thinking it might probably bring some order; but not for a moment supposing that an enemy had got betweene him and the head quarters he had so recently left. He was awakened from his security by the voice of Marquinez. "A el tos!" shouted the guerilla, and his men rushed sabre in hand upon the French, who, taken by surprise, were thrown one upon the other, and a dozen of them cut off their horses before they had made the slightest resistance. A panic seized the remainder, who, being prevented by the darkness from distinguishing the number of their opponents, imagined themselves betrayed, and surrounded by a very superior force. The greater part leaped their horses over the hedges and low stone walls on either side of the road, and fled in every direction. Some few threw down their arms, and begged for quarter; but the guerillas were not in a merciful mood, and prisoners would have been an incumberance on the long march they had before them. The pursuit became in their turn the pursuers, and Marquinez had to exert his authority to prevent his soldiers from dispersing in chase of the runaways, a chase that would probably have led some of them into the middle of the French infantry.

Marquinez reached his cantonment at daybreak, and at the same hour the French commenced their march back to Valladolid, not a little crest falling at the events of the night.

A few days after the incident we have related, the approach of spring enabled Marquinez to take the field. After one of the first skirmishes shared in by his troops, two or three men deserted to him from the French, and by their own desire were incorporated into a squadron of hussars. One of these men, a German, made himself particularly remarked by smart soldierly bearing, and by his hatred of the French, whom he constantly execrated, declaring that his sincerest wish was to revenge on them some part of the ill treatment he had received at their hands. Effectually, in one or two affairs, he displayed so much courage and blood-thirstiness that he attracted the notice of Marquinez, who attached him to his person as an orderly. The zeal of the deserter redoubled, and he exhibited that boundless devotion to his general so naturally felt by every brave soldier for an indulgent master and gallant chief.

It was some months later that the hussars of Marquinez, being in the neighbourhood of Palencia, thier leader had ocasion to visit the town, and he set out, attended only by his German orderly. At a certain distance from the above named place, and where the road, running between two hills, is shaded by a row of large beech trees, the travellers came to one of those ancient fountains, not uncommon in Spain, and which seem to have been erected with the double object of administering to the thirst of the wayfarer, and of inviting him to solicit by prayer, a blessing on his journey. On the upper part of a mossy and time-worn slab of gray stone, placed perpendicularly against the rocky bank which bordered the road, was rudely sculptured in relievo a representation of the Virgin Mary holding the infant Jesus in her arms. From a broken wooden spout, which protruded from the ground, gushed forth a stream of water of cristal clearness, which fell bubling and sparkling into a granite trough below, while the vicinity of the fountain had encouraged the growth of a profusion of hedge flowers, which decked the banks and sides of the road, and perfumed the air with their wild and delicious fragrance.

At this cool and pleasant spot, a sort of oasis on the hot sandy road along which he had been riding—Marquinez drew rein, and loosening his horse's breastplate, allowed the animal to plunge his mouth and nostrils in the trough. Whilst his charger was drinking—an operation rendered somewhat difficult by its large and severe bit—the orderly continued to move forward, until he had greatly diminished the distance usually kept between the officer and his attendant. When he arrived within a couple of paces of the fountain, he silently drew a pistol from his holster, took a deliberate aim at the head of Marquinez, and pulled the trigger. The ounce split the skull of the unfortunate Spaniard, who first fell forward on his horse's neck, then rolled to the ground, striking in his fall against the stone basin, which was sprinkled with his blood. The assassin sprang from his saddle, and stood over his victim with a short sword dagger in his hand. He had no occasion to use it. The teeth of the guerilla chieftain were set firmly against each other, and a slight froth stood upon his lips. The independence of Spain had lost one of its most gallant defenders.

When the news of this cowardly deed reached Marquinez's comrades, the latter did not hesitate to attribute it to the French general Bover, from whose column the German had deserted. It would be unjust however, to lay the instigation of so foul a murder at the door of a brave officer without some better proof than mere suspicions. One thing is certain—that when the murderer, after some narrow escapes, succeeded in rejoining the French, he received an officer's commission, as a reward for having rid them of so troublesome and active an enemy.

Shortly after Marquinez's death, La Collegiala with thirty or forty men, deserted to Valladolid, then held by the French. Those who knew her best, were unable to discover or imagine any possible reason for so extraordinary an act. Some few, indeed, supposed that she had taken this step as the only means by which she could hope to find an opportunity of revenging the death of her lover; and they predicted that many days would return to the Spanish lines with the blood of Marquinez's assassin on her knife blade. If this supposition was the correct one; if such was the motive which induced her to abandon the cause of her country, she was unable to accomplish her design; for, a few days after her desertion, the order came from Napoleon to send back to France all the foreign troops in the French service, for the purpose of their being disbanded. Italians, Poles and Germans, were all sent across the frontier, and with them marched the murderer of Marquinez.

La Collegiala continued with the French, and commanded with the rank of the captain, a band of about a hundred irregular cavalry, composed of the men who had deserted with her, and of others who subsequently came over. On the evacuation of Spain by the French troops, which occurred soon afterwards, she accompanied them, and remained in France till an amnesty was published, of which she took advantage, and return to her own country. But to adding to her masculine dress and habits, she became exceedingly devout, and gave up the whole of her time to religious exercises and the education of her children—a more praiseworthy than poetical termination to the career of the adventurous amazon who had shared the hardships and perils of Marquinez the guerilla.—Little Museum

Education in Liberia. Stephen Fairbanks, Treasurer, in behalf of the Trustees of Donations in Liberia, acknowledged, some months since, the receipt of three thousand dollars. The names of the generous donors were then withheld by their request. He has obtained permission, in connection with the following list, to announce the names of Amos Lawrence, Esq., Hon. Albert Fearing, and Amos A. Lawrence, Esq. as donors, each of the sum of $1000, in all $3000.

The following additional donations have also been received:—From the executors of the estate of Mr. Josiah White, late of Philadelphia, stocks, now paying six per cent. par value, $500; Rev. Ralph Emerson, D. D., Professor in the Theological Seminary, Andover, $50; Rev. John Richards, D. D., Elected in his congregation at Dartmouth College Hanover, N. H., $25; Hon. Wm. B. Bannister, Newburyport, $100; Hon. A SERMON THAT DID NOT SUIT.

Mrs. H—— was very religious and perhaps came sometimes worshiping Mr.——, her favorite minister, as some of our high dogs do Kossuth, the Hungarian: but be that as it may be, she was continually hammering Aaron, a shrewd lad of sixteen years of age, who to pester the old lady, and hear her scold, would occasionally speak rather lightly of Mr.——, her minister.

Happening in at the house of Mrs H.——, one day, the old lady began as usual to chastise him, and Aaron thinking she put it on rather too hard, after hearing her through, said—

"I am as good as Mr. N——, and can preach as well."

"Preach!" said the old lady, "you don't know one single word in the Bible."

"Well, give me a text," said Aaron, "and see if I can't preach."

'You don't know any thing about the Bible,' said Mrs. H——, 'if you do, you may take any text you please.'

'Well,' said Aaron,' A virtuous woman is without price,' ain't that in your Bible?'

'Yes,' said Mrs. H——, 'and shows that women are better than men, for the Bible don't say that a virtuous man is without price'

'Well we'll see about that,' said Aaron, and after dividing his subjects into two or three heads, commenced as follows:—

'The scarcity of an article in all cases governs the price, but when an article cannot be found it cannot be had at any price.' Now, if there were any virtuous women, there would be a price, and a high one, too, by reason of scarcity, but as there are none'—

At this stage of discourse, the old lady seized the broom.

'Aaron,' said she, 'you are an impudent brat, and if you don't clear out, I will pelt you with the broom handle.'

Aaron made tracks into the road, finishing his sentence, "they are without price,' as he went through the door, which the old lady closed after him with considerable force.

Aaron now started for home, saying to himself as he went along—'I guess the old woman will not chastise me again very soon'—and, as it proved, he was not mistaken in his prediction.—Norfolk Herald.

UNCONQUERED AND UNCONQUERABLE WILL.

"There is no obstacle to him who wills."—This maxim, through ignorance, or perversity, or both, may become the source of as great evil, as, correctly understood, and legitimately carried out, it is capable of effecting great good. Even with some, who are apparently (perhaps in reality) sincere, it is made to "foil its own intent," and instead of leading to improvement, in character, it proves the greatest bar to that improvement, and leads to a confirmed, or in some cases to a malignant obstinacy. While nothing is more durable, nothing is at the same time more yielding than Charity—it seeketh not its own."

RETALIATION.

Some few years since, in the county of Penobscot, there lived a man by the name of H—, whose greatest pleasure was in tormenting others. His own family was generally the butt of his sport.

One cold and blustering night, he retired to bed at an early hour, his wife being absent at a neighbor's. Some time after, she returning, finding the door closed, demanded admittance.

"Who are you?" cried Mr. H——

"You know who I am; let me in, it is very cold."

"Begone, you strolling vagabond; I want nothing of you here."

"But I must come in."

"What is your name?"

You know my name—it is Mrs ——.

"Begone! Mrs H—— is a very likely woman; she never keeps such late hours as this."

Mrs. H—— replied—"If you do not let me in I will drown myself in the well"

"Do, if you please," he replied.

She then took up a log and plunged it into the well, and returned to the side of the door.

Mr. ——, hearing the noise rushed from the house to save, as he supposed, his drowning wife. She at the same time, slipped in and closed the door after her.—

Mr. H——, almost naked, in turn demanded admittance.

"Who are you" she demanded.

"You know who I am—let me in, or I shall freeze."

"Begone, you thievish rogue! I want nothing of you here."

"But I must come in"

"What is your name?"

"You know my name—it is Mr. H——"

"Mr H—— is a very likely man, he don't keep such late hours."

Suffice it to say, she, after keeping him in the cold until she was satisfied, opened the door and let him in.—Vox Populi.

Life.

Life is a mystery; like the midnight dream, 'tis sometimes sad and sometimes pleasing. In youth we look forward with bright anticipations, and the future clothed by our fancy in robes of sunshine, and gladness, lures us on to its enjoyment. We dream not that the fabric is unreal, or that the castle is built without foundation, 'till too sadly we have proved that life is indeed not made up entirely of bright days, but that 'some are dark and dreary."

Childhood is a happy season; its remembrances is ever linked with joyous associations, and the light heart, and smile of the young seldom fail to woo to the memory pleasing reminiscences of days unforgotten, and still cherished as the cases of our life, the garden spots, of our recollections. The gay laughter of a mirthful spirit, unclouded by care, has ever fallen upon my ear, causing a thrill of joy not unmixed with dread, that soon the gush of happiness was destined to be checked, and those lighter feelings supplanted by stern reality.

There are those whose morning sun has been darkened by the cloud, and methinks 'tis sadder thus than when life's evening sun has set in gloom, for when fullness of years have silvered our locks and robbed our step of its elasticity, our spirits are less bouyant, and calmer joys are a welcome substitute.

What then is life? asks some playful innocent; and he may point to the clear sky above him, whispering that it is bright and beautiful; bedecked with its myrthful starry gems, or some gentle stream rippling near his father's cot may murmur to him that such is life. Look upon him again when boyhood's merry laugh has yielded to manhood's graver tone, and he may tell you 'tis hope, 'tis ambition. But when Time has borne upon his wing unrealized the imaginings, the proud resolves of his soul, he will tell you 'twas nought but a feverish dream, a weary pilgrimage, a troubled ocean, and he an unskilful mariner—True Union.

THE SELFISH GIRL.

"Look out for yourself, Julia," said Mrs. Davis to her little girl; "number one is the first law of nature, as my father used to tell us; and if you don't take care of yourself, nobody will care for you."

Admonitions like these were not lost on Julia; and in consequence she became one of the most selfish and disobliging little girls in the world. She had a full knowledge of what she considered her right, and would never yield a particle to any one. The widow Davis occupied the neatest little cottage in all the village of N Not a weed was suffered to appear in her flower bed; her walks were carefully swept; and her lettuce and peas were always the earliest, and her onions the finest of any in the town. She always had an abundance of aromatic herbs, lavender and balm, sage, rue, and camomile; but she said her neighbors had the same privilege of cultivating them as herself, and she had none to spare. Not a child in all N. would have thought of asking Dame Davis for a single flower, for they were sure of never getting what they asked, and a single glance of hers was sufficient to make them feel uncomfortable for a whole day. The inside of her cottage was as scrupulously exact as the outside. You would be almost afraid to set your foot on her neatly scrubbed floor, for the least particle of dirt would bring a cloud upon the face of the good dame that no after kindness could wear away; and a book displaced or a chair left in a wrong position, was a fault never to be forgiven. Her heir-loom of pewter plates ornamented her mantel-shelf, and glistened like so many mirrors; and her brass topped andirons quite put to shame the fire behind them, which was never suffered to kindle into a blaze. I have no fault to find with Dame Davis's house-keeping. She might sometimes have carried her notions to excess, but she was none too neat; it is only her selfish, unaccommodating spirit that I condemn. She was a careful, frugal housewife, and always had a good supply of little necessaries on hand; but she was the last person to ever share them with a neighbor. Mrs. Davis contended that there was no need of borrowing, and seemed to be very proud of offering herself as an example, triumphantly demanding who ever knew her to ask a favor! She forgot how kindly she had been treated at her husband's death, and the many little friendly officers performed for her in time of sickness and calamity, or else she looked upon them as due to her, and never thought of repaying the debt by doing likewise. Take care of self, was her motto; and poor Julia was made its victim.

Julia attended the district school; but I believe no one loved her much, for her mind seemed to be always on herself. She used to hurry to school in the morning for no other reason than to get the best seat before any one else arrived. She was always followed by her little brother and sister, Archie and Bell, tugging the huge dinner basket between them, and crying at every breath, as they flounced through the snow, "Wait, sister Julia, wait!"

When she got there, she would lay her books and satchel on the particular seat which she wished to occupy, and then take her station by the fire to watch lest they should be removed. Sweet little Bell never thought of asking her sister to untie her bonnet, or unpin her shawl; for all the girls loved her for her kindness and gentleness, and were ready to do it for her without being requested. If any one had arrived, Archie would try to assist her; and when, after pricking his fingers and half choking the little favorite, his task was accomplished, he would dart a very cross look at Julia, and seat himself in silence. As the children came in, Julia would maintain her station by the fire, and instead of the kind offer, "Take my place," she would complain of them bitterly for crowding or touching her with their cold hands. When at last she was obliged to go to her seat, she would put her hand on the bench beside her, and tell every girl that came near, that was "Cary Elmore's place." Julia did not do this because she loved Caroline Elmore, for selfish people seldom love any but themselves; but Squire E had lived in the big white house on the hill, and she thought that she was learning to acquire respect and consequence by associating with people that were called wealthy.

Julia never thought of obliging those who sat near her by handing them a book or slate that happened to be out of their reach; and as for lending them any thing—oh, she was the last one to do that. When noon came, she would take the dinner-basket, and, selecting the best of every thing for herself, divide the remainder between her brother and sister. Little Bell usually took this very quietly; but Archie, who was a fiery tempered little fellow, often threw his share into his sister's face, and went home for more.

Fine times have the children in district schools, with their sliding, snow balling, and other active exercises, which often make the manners rough, invigorate and strengthen the body, and prepare the mind for study. The children of N. were not at all behindhand with their neighbors in this respect, and the boys used to boast of their victory in a snowballing contest with the next district, with about as much pride as the Spartans felt when they defeated Troy. Sometimes, when the snow had a fine crust, they used to lend the girls their sleds while they were building their snow-forts and breastworks; and it was fine fun to draw them up the high hill back of the school house for the purpose of sliding down again. Julia Davis, with her usual selfishness, always appropriated the handsomest and best sled, while the other girls used the remainder by turns; and so were one and were they to this day, for never did she cease claiming her choice of uniting her claim. One day when all were well for a frolic, as little girls are apt to be when just let out of school, and as is usual to ask for it, "You'll take me to ride, all of you," Julia Davis and James Lee, a proud spirited boy of about twelve years, uncorrected, easy and imperious in his disposition, despising any thing like restriction. "You're welcome, all but Julia Davis," repeated he, angrily, "but she'd better look out now she touches my sled."

"And mine!" "And mine!" "And mine!" echoed from all sides; "school boys are very much like sheep, following their leader, right or wrong.

Julia was very angry, but resistance was useless; so she took her station at the top of the hill to watch the sport, and spoil it if she could. Here she said a great many ill-natured things, and amused herself by giving each sled a turn as it was about starting, which made it take a kind of half-circular direction, and often left its occupant scrambling on the snow.—Then she would laugh very heartily, and dodge behind some of the best tempered girls, for fear of a blow.

"You'd better stop that!" shouted James Lee, at the top of his voice, as his little sister Sally was upset in the snow. Julia only laughed, and repeated the experiment on another girl. Instantly all the boys were at the top of the hill, and Julia Davis was screaming and scrambling at the bottom.

"James Lee did that!" cried a dozen frightened boys.

"For shame, James!" added one who dared thus much, because nearly his equal in strength and courage; "for shame, James! to knock down a girl."

But the sentence was scarcely uttered ere he too lay at the bottom of the hill; for James knew that he had performed a very mean action, and so was exasperated. It is strange how angry children will sometimes be, when any one tells them of a fault of which even they are very much ashamed.

Their teacher was a "straightforward" sort of a man, who never troubled himself to ask questions; so he made no inquiries in order to get at the root of the evil, but flogged James Lee, gave the rest a long lecture, not a word of which they remembered five minutes, and dismissed them with an order "not to slide any more."

To be forbidden this their favorite amusement, was a great deprivation; and poor Julia Davis was more disliked than ever. Oh, what little girl would be selfish? I never saw one that preferred her own pleasure and comfort before that of others, that was very much beloved

Early in the spring, the boys, with the true American spirit of chivalry, made a swing for their fair playmates, by passing ropes through the topmost boughs of an old elm tree; and there they might have spent many happy hours, had each one been willing to share her pleasures with the rest. Sometimes they had pretty hard quarrels, but there were always some good-natured peace-makers ready to interpose, and matters were generally pretty well adjusted.

"I declare," said little Sally Lee one day, after frisking about for a half hour, waiting for the swing to be vacated, "I declare it is too bad. I have never swung at all—nor more than half the rest of the girls. Julia Davis and Cary Elmore keep the swing all the time."

"Out of that swing quick!" said James, with a great show of resolution, setting his teeth together and clenching his fist; "Out of that swing quick! or I'll——" Julia profited by the experience, and obeyed, while James, laughing at her discomfiture, lifted little Sally into it. Julia turned to go away, but at the moment gave the swing a push which sent it into the air. Poor Sally! she screamed at the sudden motion, and with one hand let go her hold and fell, while the blood from her mouth and nose colored the snow around her. All were completely horror-stricken, and for several moments not a word was uttered. Then came the neighbors crowding around; but as they were about to remove her, her brother interposed. He did not speak, but, pushing them away, wiped off the blood very carefully; then folding her in his arms and putting her little white face close to his, which was almost as pale, he hurried away to his home, followed by a train of villagers.

Julia Davis stood on the spot where the accident had happened, gazing at the blood-stains on the snow like one in a dream, until her companions, without venturing to speak a word, dropped one by one away, and she was left alone. At last she raised her head, looked wildly around her for a moment, and then, uttering a loud shriek, rushed homeward, exclaiming, "I didn't kill her—I didn't—I didn't!" That day Mrs. Davis's windows were darkened, and Archie and Bell went whimpering through the streets, telling everybody they met that "sister Julia was sick and mother had fastened her in bed to keep her from striking her." Julia was all day and night delirious; and Mrs. Davis, following out her independent system, and indeed fastened her to the bed to avoid the necessity of sending for assistance.

Poor Sally's injury was of a somewhat serious nature, and Julia was never seen to smile until she was pronounced out of danger. She recovered very slowly; and before spring, was able to step about the room, and with the help of her brother and Julia Davis, she sometimes moved a few paces from the door. But she was no longer the busy, frolicsome creature she used to be. She lived, but she was a cripple. Her little crooked figure was a sad thing to look upon, but after a little while she was as gay and happy as ever.

"I'm not a bit sorry," she said one day to Julia, "that I was hurt!"

"Why, Sally!" exclaimed Julia, "you forgot how you used to dance all around the schoolroom, and run faster than a great many of the larger girls; and you forget that you will never be able to run again, and——" poor Julia could say no more, and she burst into tears.

"Sally means she is glad for your sake, I guess," said James.

"Yes, and for yours too," replied the good little girl, "and dear Mrs. Davis's. I think I am willing to be crooked, and to limp a little, and not run as fast as I used to, if I can have you and Julia always by to take care of me, especially since it has done so much good. I don't see you get mad and strike any body since I was hurt, and Julia is just as kind and good as she can be. Mrs. Davis, too——but come, let us just stop and see her a few minutes."

"Oh, do!" said Julia, "she will be so glad. She says she loves you almost as much as she does Archie and me."

Dame Davis received her young visitors very cordially, and then told Julia she was glad she had come home, as she wished to send her down to poor old Dobson's with some medicine for his sick child; "and," she added in a whisper, "you had better take along some of those early cucumbers; may be they have none."

Little Sally smiled; James though his sweet sister could scarcely be as lovely as if she were not a cripple; and Julia bounded away to execute her commission, wondering why she had never before know that "it is more blessed to give than to receive."—Southern Baptist

PRIDE.

"Pride, self-adoring pride, as primal cause
Of all sin passed, all pain, all woe to come,
Great fountain—head of evil! highest source
Whence flowed rebellion 'gainst the Omnipotent,
Whence hate of man to man, and all else ill.
Pride at the bottom of the human heart
Lay, and gave root and nourishment to all
That grow above."

"There is no evil of the human heart that is more often and more fully denounced in holy writ, as having no place in the renewed, regenerated soul of man, than pride. Our first parents were the victims of its destroying power; having tasted of the forbidden tree of knowledge of good and evil, by which they became wise in their own eyes. Though it had been told them by their Creator, and the giver of every good and perfect gift which they enjoyed, that in the day they ate thereof they should surely die, yet the temptation of the evil one was not withstood. The pride and vanity of their hearts were touched and aroused, even so as to produce rebellion against their God

And how many thousands since the days of Adam, have experienced the truth of the declaration, that "Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall; and he that exalteth himself shall be abased." Pride was the sin of Judah and Jerusalem, insomuch that it was declared, "After this manner will I mar the pride of Judah, and the great pride of Jerusalem. This evil people, which refuse to hear my words, which walk in the imagination of their heart, and walk after other gods, to serve them, to worship them, shall even be as this girdle, which is good for nothing, for as the girdle cleaveth to the loins of a man, so have I caused to cleave unto me the whole house of Israel, and the whole house of Judah, saith the Lord, that they might be unto me for a people and for a name, and for a praise, and for a glory: but they would not hear."

It is not pride that leads us to seek to take the mote out of a brother's eye, while the beam is in our own? when through the influence of self-righteousness the language of our conduct towards others becomes something like this, "I am more holy than thou!" But how instructive is the lesson taught by the example of our blessed Redeemer, who gave himself a sacrifice for the whole world, which it is declared, he came not to condemn but to save; and when he was accused by the self-righteous Jews of eating with publicans and sinners, he replied, "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." In his humility and loving-kindness he became willing to suffer for us the just for the unjust; and as he laid down his precious life for us, so, we are told, we should lay down our lives for the brethren; for if we suffer not with him neither shall we be permitted to reign with him. Self in Him was made of no reputation, and He became obedient unto death.

Ah, the pride of the human heart! how doth it close even the very windows and door of heaven, causing the refusal of the blessed invitation to bring all the tithes into he store-house; setting the servant above his Master, and the disciple above his Lord, and causing a disregard for the apostolic injunction, to be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility; for God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble. Be ye all of one mind having compassion one of another, love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous; not rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing: but contrariwise blessing; knowing that ye are thereunto called, that ye should inherit a blessing; for he that will love life and see good days, let him refrain his tongue from evil, and his lips that they speak no guile; for the eyes of the Lord are over the righteous, and his ears are open to their prayers: but the face of the Lord is against them that do evil."

How eminently conspicuous in the lives of the patriarchs, prophets, and apostles, were the virtues of humility and meekness! Noah, when commanded to build the ark, immediately obeyed. When Moses was chosen to bring forth the children of Israel out of Egypt, he meekly replied, "Who am I, that I should do this," and was obedient to the call; choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasure of sin for a season. When Solomon was anointed king over Israel, he said unto the Lord, who had made him king, "I am but a little child; I know not how to go out or come in. Give therefore thy servant an understanding heart, to judge thy people." And the promise contained in the answer to his request was remarkably manifested by the display of wisdom in the case of the two mothers: giving the living child to the merciful claimant, who, rather than it should be divided and destroyed, surrendered it to its false mother.—The Friend:

PRESIDENT WILLIAMS' MESSAGE TO THE EXTRA SESSION OF THE LEGISLATURE.

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives,—Although the regular time for your assembling has not arrived, I have thought proper in view of important business which demands attention to anticipate the day named at your last session, for your reassembling, and call an extra-session of the Legislature.

The circumstances under which you now meet, as well as the season, render it unnecessary that I should go into a history of the current year, or advert to the events which from time to time have developed themselves—these will find a more appropriate place in the message of the chief Executive, to your regular meeting in December; as well also, as that they will then have become a more permanent history and afford a more legitimate topic of remark and reflection. I shall not therefore refer further, to what otherwise might be very properly communicated than to say, that in consequence of gross misrepresentations which had been made in England against this government and people, the President of the Republic was advised to visit London.

Since your last meeting the government have received and accredited Chevalier Niteroi Charge of Affairs and Consul General of His Majesty the Emperor of Brazil.

Since your last meeting an unhappy collision has taken place between the Vey and Goulah tribes, which threaten the repose of the whole Vey and Goulah countries. Efforts, but ineffectual, have been made by the government, at a pacification of the differences. All remonstrances have failed. From careful enquiry it appears that the Veys are the aggressors, and no doubt now remains that this government will have to resort to vigorous measures at the earliest possible period to quiet the aggressive belligerent spirit, and restore peace to the country. I therefore would earnestly recommend an appropriation and the adoption of such other measures as would enable the Executive to avail himself of the first opening of the approaching dry season, so as not to interfere with the season of farming, to restore peace to these countries.

Gentlemen of the Senate. The Government since your last session have concluded a treaty of Amity and Commerce with the French Republic. This treaty will be laid before you, for your concurrence and ratification. Commodore Baudin is expected to be here in October, with the ratification on the part of his government, at which time, he was assured this government would be ready for an exchange.

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives,—this not being the regular session of the Legislature, I have nothing further to bring before you at present; should however any thing occur during your deliberations of sufficient moment to demand your attention, I shall not fail to lay it before you.

A. D. WILLIAMS.

The following letter dated "Abbeokuta, Africa, April 28th, 1851," was written by the Rev. T. J. Bowen, a missionary who came to this Republic in 1850, under the patronage of the Southern Baptist Convention, and who left some time after for the leeward, and directed to Rev. J. T. Richardson, which came to hand by the politeness of Rev. E. W. Stokes, on his return from England, and published by request.—P. L. H.

Abbeokuta Africa. April 28, 1851.

Dear Bro. Richardson,—I wrote to you long ago, but the letter never left Badagary. I am now in Yoruba. This is a large city 12 miles in circuit; population about 50,000,—it contains about 3000 natives who have returned from Sierra Leone. Here are four mission stations, four missionaries, and some 300 converts. I have been here ever since August because they would not let me go further. In Sept. I went two days journey to the west aiming to reach Iketu, from which place, there is an open road to Bohoo. The king of Iketu sent messengers one day's journey to meet me and tell me to go back as a white man could not be suffered to enter his city. He has now sent for me to come and live there and I set out this day; the journey is about 70 miles. My health is good, I have received no letters or any thing else since I came to Badagary. The best way to write from Liberia is to direct letters to the care of the missionaries in Sierra Leone to be sent to me to Badagary, they will then come 80 miles NE to Abbeokuta and from this place to Iketu. Please write me all the news and send me your minutes. I must beg you to send me some seeds including cinnamon, coffee, mangoes, water-melons, sour-sops &c., &c., such things are not here, but paupaws are plenty. The common crops are corn and yams, potatoes and sugar cane plenty. Every town has a market which is well supplied with eatables. This is a good country, it is mostly prairie, and grape vines are common.

I have no interpreter, and as the Yoruba language is a little difficult, I am not yet able to preach; when I arrive at Iketu I want to open a school. Remember me to the brethren and friends; I suppose if they should see me now in my approved health and vigor they would scarcely know me. The Lord be praised for his mercy. I remember Liberia in my prayers and beg to be remembered by the brethren there. My dear brother may the Lord preserve you and make you a good minister of Christ.

If any goods, papers, or the like come to Liberia for me please have them sent to Badagary to care of the Weslevan missionaries, or else to Cape Coast to care of Thos. Hutton Esq.

Yours in hope of eternal life,

T. J. BOWEN

We invite the attention of our readers to the following communication, from F. Chs. De Glasier, Ph. Doctor, and Surgeon of the Steam Ship Fanny.—P. L. H.

"For the Liberia Herald."

Mr. Editor;—You will allow me, through the worthy columns of your Paper, to express my sincere and earnest thanks, for the kindness and general hospitality received, during our accidental sojourn amongst your citizens.

Circumstances, unfortunate as they will happen at times, brought us with our Steamer Fanny, into this beautiful Bay as your home port, and with a surprize after becoming visible acquainted amongst you, in the town of Monrovia, and the Republic of Liberia in Africa, I actually became astonished, to see and feel, of which I was not aware, during all my previous knowledge of your worthy settlement. In regard to you as a people to yourself, I must say, that you enjoy a system, order, and a regularity, which are to create in countries abroad to you great honor, and with respect to your country, which is not only a Paradise, but is gifted with an overflow of diverse earthly treasures, and that, with a religious light in view, are to make you one of the happiest people on the face of the earth. It's all true, that more or less alike all other new and uncultivated countries, you must suffer many inconveniences and impediments, but, in such a situation, you have to do a great deal like a certain and well known phrase, "take hold, let not go, for she is thy life;" according to that maxim you have to continue your excessive perseverance; and furthermore in addition, don't neglect to explore your wild forests and the deep secreted bowels of the earth, and you, not only will find, without the least of doubt, that the labours with your present energy and cultivation towards wealth, you not only would gain treasures and riches, but that you might eventually, with all the knowledge, you possess and which is on a continued increase might range with the first people as a nation of this world. Sir! I do not rate so to give you an overpluss of praise, but in fact I can not give you with words sufficiently of what your people, in regard to enterprize are worthy thereof, I therefore in my clause,—shall hope that you may continue your labours necessary, through all the stage of life, and as far as you already, have ventured, I can assure you, that it is not an unmistakeable example to your wild natives, or all others unaware of a Divine Regulator, but without fail continue and you will and must prosper. You must excuse my hasty epistle, but otherwise believe me, that I shall remember, to the last hours of my days, your lovely spot with all what is in it. God be with you.

I remain yours with all respect,

Very Respectfully

TEMPERANCE.—It is gratifying to find that some of our good people are again awaking to the cause of temperance. We understand that a temperance society has been organized under the denomination of "The Equinoctial Division No. 1 of the Sons of Temperance

A meeting of this division held a few evenings ago is said to have been encouraging, there being a goodly number present. So valuable an institution will certainly need no recommendation from us, as its necessity, in our community, must be obvious to every considerate mind. We sincerely hope that it will be established and perpetuated, and not on account of inadvertence, be soon numbered among the "things that have been." May it increase and exert so powerful an influence as that Bacchus will be forever dethroned—his shrines destroyed, and his devotees come cheerfully, heartily, and with one accord, and offer at the crystal stream.

Important Questions Asked.

1 Ought not every individual to read the Bible? Yes, every person knowing or contemplating the origin, nature, and design of the Bible, would reply most certainly; for no person can neglect it with impunity. The Bible in its origin and nature, differs from every othe book. It came from God. It contains an expression and demonstration of his Will and pleasure concerning his subject, man. And not only so, but gives man an opportunity by scrutiny of the Bible, to understand the origin of all the other species. Will it not ever be a subject of interest to man to know what his Creator and preserver has written for his instruction and benefit, ought he not to know, to be anxious to know, to inquire, seriously and earnestly into the Bible s contents. He ought, undoubtedly. He will do so, if for one moment, he considers the origin of the Bible

2 Consider for one moment who God is; the mighty maker and creator of all things, the heavens and the earth, with their ten thousand times ten th usand existences, he who has so nicely formed our bodies and minds, and made us capable of such high attainments in excellence and knowledge, and susceptible of such variety of pleasurable emotions, do know, and must confess that the Bible is from God, and that every, individual should be inclined to read it attentively, and to follow it precepts. Again the contents of the Bible ought to engage the attention and interest of every person that can read. It is a subject settled and agreed on by all persons, no matter how learned, that the Bible contains compositions that are superior to the productions of the greatest writers of every age. The eloquence and beauty and purity of sentiment are unsurpassed. If one w o just read the Bible for pleasure, were to pay attention to the instruction of sentiment there in contained, he or she would be amply repaid. And more particularly as Lord Littleton, and Gilbert Robe rser, learned men, who not only started to read the Bible for pleasure, but in order to condemn it, but although their object was not of a good design, the reading of the Bible had its salutary effect upon them, & they both became converted, and thus were participants of its purifying influences. Again if the earnest inquirer after wisdom were to open this Sacred Book, and if for its refining and purifying influences he would not close the sacred volume, he reader would undoubtedly reap a golden harvest.

3. If it be remembered that the Bible reveals truth that cannot be gathered from any other source. all ought to read it The wise of every age groped in darkness—gross darkness, until the Bible came with its unsullied light. What thick darkness would brood over our path way were the Bible banished from our lands. Who then should pass it by? not a rational creature, not one who would be made wise for time and eternity, not one who wishes to spend on earth a well ordered life, and then pass to a world of superior bliss and peace, where well springs of know ledge are open to all.

Who then can be saved unless he knows the contents of the Scriptures; no one. If it be advantageous to hear the Scriptures read, will it not be much more so to read them ourselves, that we may ponder upon their precious contents. should, not every individual read the Bible who should not read them! the child? no, for he can understand them and grow wise and holier and happier, for he will be kept from sin and folly by taking heed to thy word Shall the man in his strength say the Bible is not for me! not so. His strength may be increased if he reads the Scriptures. His wisdom will deepen and flourish, his understanding ripen. Should not the wisest of men look into the counsels of infinite wisdom? the in erior can always learn something from his superior. The wisest man then can learn from God who is infinite in wisdom. The Bible was designed for every class of human creatures, not one is excepted by its author. What man then shall designate the degraded condition and loss of the neglectors of God's word!—it is indeed a fearful business to him who presumes to do it. Search the scriptures come unto me all ye ends of the earth and be ye saved, saith the author of the Bible "Who then will have a deaf ear and go unpunished. No one can be so vain as to expect to have neglected this Holy Revelation of God's will to man, and go unpunished. But the individual that do read the Bible and adhere to its commands, will not only abound luxuriantly amidst beauties in this world, but by faithful continuence, shall participate in those heavenly beauties in that haven of everlasting abode, where the au thor of the Bible do reside forever and ever. Therefore let every individual read the Bible.

Henry Clay is Dead

We publish this morning the melancholy tidings of the death of the illustrious and venerated statesman and patriot Henry Clay, who died in Washington City yesterday morning. This result was not unexpected. For many weeks the eyes of the American people have been turned earnestly towards the capital where the dying patriot and sage lay calmly awaiting the dread messenger. The mandate came at last, and the immortal spirit has passed from earth o inha it a purer and a better world.

Henry Clay is dead. On the wings of the lightning the sad inteligence is borne to the remotest ends of the Republic; and the name that was wont to aspire the patriotic pride and admiration of his countrymen is now breathed in sadness.

Few men since the foundation of the Government have exerted a wider influence upon the politics and le islation of the country than Henry Clay; certainly no one has possessed in a greater degree the confidence and affection of his political and personal friends. It was their devotion to him in all the vicissitudes of an eventful political life that prompted him to exclaim, on a memorable occasion, "Surely no man ever had such friends as Henry Clay."

As the acknowledged and cherished leader of one of the great political parties, he encountered the opponents of his principles with all his intellectual might, but with a frankness and gallantry that commanded the admiration of his adversaries If in the strifes and conflicts of party he made foes, it was his fortune to outlive their enmity, and to pass serenely and calmly to the close of a long, honorable, and useful life, respected, venerated and beloved by his countrymen.—*Nat. American Steam Ship Fanny

Mr Herald:—On Monday the 23rd. ultimo, the Steam Ship "Fanny," of New Orleans, Charles E. Pennock, Commander, arrived to our harbor, after a passage of 44 days from Savannah, having put in there to obtain a supply of water, fuel and sundry other stores, with about 210 passengers and supernumeraries. Though she let New Orleans with a much larger company than she now has, many of them having stopped at Savannah.

For the further particulars of the "Fanny's" coming to Monrovia, we give the following extract from the Captain's letter.

"After the arrival of the steam ship Fanny at Savannah, she was detained there for several weeks by the United States Authorities, for an alleged violation of the passenger laws; but was finally released, and left that port on the 10th, of July for San Francisco, via. Rio Janeiro. Since the 10th of August, when in latitude 10° 52' North, longitude 33° 20' West, the ship has been under canvass, not using steam, until the day of her arrival here."

"August 9th, latitude 11° 00' North, longitude 29° 20' West, the wind hauled to the South westward; varying from south by west to Southwest as per compass, and so continued, without intermission, until her arrival at this anchorage, (and indeed to this date,) with the exception of one day, when the wind was North to West, North west.

"On the 17th, and 18th, instant, East, 00' North longitude, 20° West to 18° 00' West, was in company with six ships, spoke three of them:—the Oscar of Gottenburg, the Graff Von Nassau of Amsterdam bound to San Francisco; and the Flora of Liverpool bound to Australia, with passengers"

"During the next four days I saw several vessels all of them close hauled by the wind, steering [illegible] On the 20th, descried [illegible] Monrovia 250 miles distant, to get a fresh supply of water, wood and other stores, as there was only five days water in the ship and no indication of rain, at times almost constant in these seas."

The day the Fanny arrived, several of the passengers visited the shore; and every day since then, their visits have been regularly kept up: some of them have almost made one visit of it, by remaining on shore nearly the whole time, since their arrival. Some few of them found immediate employment, especially the watchmakers. The whole company seems to be much delighted with our city and its inhabitants.

Among this happy company of adventurers, we notice a good many who belong to the first cabin, (there being three classes of passengers, the first and second cabin passengers, and the stegrage passengers, and of course corresponding prices, among whom, is Mr. Schrack, lady & daughter, and Dr F C de Glasier, who delivered a lecture on the various races of men, before a crowed audience on Friday evening, the 27th, ult. at the Providence Baptist Church. The gentleman's eloquent remarks was listened to, with almost breathless silence, except when a laughter was provoked, or interrupted by the applaudits. It is hoped that his lecture will be published in the Liberia Herald, and then fellow citizens, you will be able hote to see and read for yourselves. The gentleman in his fluent descant on, and explanations of the casts, dispositions, and manners of the human family, dwelt long on the monkey tribe, the baboon and the ourang outang species.

A vote of thanks, from the audience, for the Doctor, who so ably delivered his lecture, was proposed by Dr. H. J. Roberts and seconded to the house by B. V. R. James, Esq which was unanimously carried.—the honorable gentleman, then arose and presented the thanks of the audience to Doctor Glasier, for the he had so ably delivered, which was promptly responded to, by the Doctor.

The Doctor promised to lecture on another subject, on a future evening, should his stay among us permit it. The business of the evening being closed, the lighted [illegible] wended their way down the hill [illegible] steps that stands in front of the [illegible] and dispersed.

The adventurous company of the steam ship Fanny, seems to be made up of artizans, common laborers and professional men of various kinds;—the watch and clock makers; the jewelry vender; the house carperter; the blacksmith; the cabinet makers the shoe maker; the tailor; the printer; the book keeper; the doctor of physics; the apothecarian, and perhaps the lawyer. These useful artizans and professionals, have forsaken their former useful avocations, for that of a more useful;—that of getting California gold.—then go ahead brave hardys, we bid you God speed, for we know that your youthful hearts are buoyant with future hopes and bright anticipations. For many of you have promised yourselves, (regardless of the critical hour and fate of death,) that, after you shall have gained that land, with the golden pearl of great price, and by the dint of industry, accumulated fortunes, to return to the land from whence you came, and to spend the remainder of your days in ease;—others, no doubt, contemplate from their various researches, to obtain crowns of laurels; while others of your noble company seem to be on the move for life, having taken along with them their all. Your calculations are very good, we are in your rear, and will follow suit at a more convenient season.—though for us, that covenient season may never come.—

"WELCOME."

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA; SEPTEMBER 1st, 1852.

Death of Prince John Stephen Rodgers of the Gallenas. In a letter from Grand Cape Mount, we are informed that Prince John Stephen Rodgers of Gallenas is dead. He died suddenly, and it is supposed by foul means. Prince Rodgers was a man of honorable intentions, and greatly beloved by those who knew him He was the first who consented to a treaty with the Liberian Government for the abolition of the slave trade at the Gallenas—and in every instance when Prince Manna and his party showed a disposition to trample upon the treaty stipulations, he was foremost in the opposition. and his influence generally operated against the intentions of the lovers of the slave trade. Under such circumstances Manna and his party bore a secreat, but deadly hate towards Rodgers, In the early part of last month, a congress of the chiefs took place, at the instance of Prince Manna, the ostensible object of which was to revive the slave trade, Rodgers as usual was in the opposition, and the chiefs departed without concurring in Prince Manna's proposition but a few days elapsed, before it was known that Rodgers, was dead—that he died suddenly, and it was whispered, that Prince Manna had employed a person to poison him. We say nothing more at present, as to the future intentions of Prince Manna. We prefer waiting until his plans are fully developed.

Monrovia August 4th, 1852.

The phrase "Tellegraphic Report," has been found to be so roundabout, and to consume so much time in writing and speaking, that somebody has kindly proposed the single word Telegram to express the same meaning. It is a cadet, and only needs to be extended by consent, like a resolution in Congress, to embrace other cases of like inconvenience. We therefore move to amend the proposition by adding a clause proving, that "stenogram" shall be held to mean hereafter, stenographic report, the "Phonogram" a phonographic one, and so on.—Pennsylvania Inquirer.

What an example is Job, to such as have lost their substance all at once, by unforseen misfortunes!—"The Lord gave—the Lord hath taken away—Blessed be the name of the Lord."

He who betrays another's secrets, because he has quarrelled with him, was never worthy the sacred name of friend; a breach of kindness on one side will not justify a breach of trust on the other.

POETRY.

RESIGNATION.

BY H. W. LONGFELLOW.

There is no flock, however watched and tended,
But one dead lamb is there;
There is no fireside, however defended,
But has one vacant chair.

The air is full of farewells to the dying,
And mournings for the dead;
The heart of Rachel, for her children crying,
Will not be comforted.

Let us be patient; these severe afflictions
Not from the ground arise,
But oftentimes celestial benedictions
Assume this dark disguise.

We see but dimly through the mists and vapors;
Amid these earthly damps,
What seems to us but dim funereal tapers;
May be heaven's distant lamps.

There is no death. What seems so is transition;
This life of mortal breath
Is but a suburb of the life elysian,
Whose portals we call death.

She is not dead—the child of our affection—
But gone unto that school
Where she no longer needs our poor protection,
And Christ himself doth rule.

In that great cloister's stillness and seclusion,
By guardian angels led,
Safe from temptation, safe from sin's pollution,
She lives, whom we call dead.

Day after day, we think what she is doing
In those bright realms of air,
Year after year, her tender steps pursuing,
Behold her grown more fair.

Thus do we walk in her, and keep unbroken
The bond which nature gives,
Thinking that our remembrance, though unspoken,
May reach her where she lives.

Not as a child shall we again behold her;
For when, with rapture wild,
In our embraces we again enfold her,
She will not be a child.

But a fair maiden in her Father's mansion,
Clothed with celestial grace;
And beautiful with all the soul's expansion
Shall we behold her face.

And though at times impetuous with emotion
And anguish long suppressed,
The swelling heart heaves, moaning like the ocean,
That cannot be at rest—

We will be patient, and assuage the feeling
We cannot wholly stay;
By silence sanctifying, not concealing
The grief that must have way.—South. Baptist

The Condition of Mexico.

It needs, says the N. O. Picayune, no suspicion of premeditated bad faith, and no suggestion of any deep calculation of policy, to account for the failure of the Mexican Congress to act finally on the Tehuantepec contract with Mr. Sloo. The news from the city of Mexico of the closing scenes of the Congress, sufficiently explains the neglect. Public affairs were in the last state of confusion, and all the functionaries of State—Executive and Legislative in a condition of positive despair. The utter bankruptcy of the treasury was admitted, and no resource was known for even a temporary supply. The Administration was totally without money, and the Legislature neither could nor would give assistance. The message of the President, stating the public destitution, received scarcely a patient hearing. His request for certain extraordinary powers, with which to act in the emergency, was flatly refused, and thus the members disbanded, leaving the country without money or means of raising it, and the Executive destitute and powerless. It is like a general abandonment of the country to its fate, a tacit consent that the whole frame of government shall dissolve unless some revolutionary chief shall seize upon power with a strong hand, and by an act of energy beyond the law, give something like vigor to administration. The common sentiment of the country appears to be, that the whole fabric of government is about to tumble into pieces, and that the people of themselves are incapable of arresting its destruction or reconstructing it upon a basis promising stability. They wait with resignation, if not desire, for some daring hand to seize upon the supreme authority, and we believe that many of them regret that the controversies with the United States have not produced a war, out of which might have sprung a permanent occupation of the whole country by the Americans. They would be happy to have a government provided for them, which would support itself without their active interference, and would be powerful enough to maintain tranquillity. It is an unhappy and mismanaged country, which is given over to despair among its best citizens, and to the spoil of intriguers and usurpers.

In this state of affairs everybody was expecting a coup d'etat. The ship of State was abandoned somebody was looked for to take possession, and attempt to get out if only for the sake of the spoils which are yet in the hull.

The rumors of coup d'etat had been current for a week or ten days before the latest dates received, and nobody appeared to know where it was to come from. It was to take place, it was necessary as the only thing that could keep the semblance of a government together. Yet we do not find it stated who is to be the hero of the day, or what are to be his means. Evidently he would be welcomed as a benefactor; but somehow the man is not ready, or else have none who is disposed to undertake the herculean task of giving Mexico a government.

Amid this state of confusion and impending dissolution, it is not at all surprising that the Congress, on its last day, should not have occupied itself with a contract upon the right of way. Abandoning the task of preserving a national existence, it was hardly to be expected they would dilate understandingly upon engagements binding the faith of future governments, and making stipulations running through half a century.—Savannah Daily News.

DECEIT.

There were "deceitful workers" in the apostles' day; and the same cunning, serpentine spirit, still seeks to ensnare the innocent, and to betray them, in order to obtain some advantage over them, in destroying their good name, and their happiness in life. George Fox tells of a deceitful worker who thought to entrap Friends; "An envious justice hearing I had a great meeting at Burrowby, troubled Friends about it, and made them appear at the Sessions, where he asked them many ensnaring questions; for he knew not how to convict them, because he had no proof against them. When he saw his questions did not catch them, he told them he had heard that George Fox was at a large meeting with them, and they all sat silent, and none spoke in the meeting.' This false story he cunningly feigned, thinking thereby to have drawn some of the Friends to have contradicted him, and have said, 'That I had spoke in the meeting;' that he might have convicted them upon their own confession, and have fined them. But Friends standing in the wisdom of God, did not answer him according to his desire, and so escaped his snare."

How needful to set a guard at the door of one's lips, in the presence of those who are watching for evil against a brother!—The Friend

THE REPUBLIC OF LIBERIA.

COLONIZATION.

☞We have received a neat pamphlet, containing the addresses on "Colonization," that were delivered in the Hall of the House of Representatives, at Harrisburg, on the evening of April 6th, by William V. Pettit and the Rev. John P. Durbin. They have been published by order of the Pennsylvania Colonization Society. It seems that in consequence of numerous applications from colored person residing in Pennsylvania to be afforded the means of reaching Liberia, the Pennsylvania Society at their February meeting, resolved to appoint a committee to visit Harrisburg during the session of the Legislature, and endeavor to procure an appropriation from that body. Accordingly, Messrs. Pettit, Claghorn and Durbin visited that place, a public meeting was held in the Hall of the House of Representatives, and addresses were delivered among others, by Messrs. Pettit and Durbin. Both are highly interesting and instructive, and we regret that we have not room to give them in detail. Mr. Pettit, in the course of his remarks, stated these as the objects of the American Colonization Society:—

First, To rescue the free people of color of the United States from their political and social disadvantages.

Second, To place them in a country where they can enjoy the benefit of a free government with all the blessings it brings in its train

Third, To afford slaveholders who may wish to liberate their slaves, an asylum for their reception

Fourth, To arrest and destroy the African slave trade.

Fifth, To spread civilization, sound morals, and true religion over the whole continent of African.

He enforced these objects earnestly, ably and eloquently, gave a history of the cause and its operations, and referred in glowing language to its prospects. The territories of the Colonizationists have been extended from Maryland and Liberia, almost to the British colony of Sierra Leone, and to a considerable extent in the interior. Thus an effectual barrier has been interposed along the whole of this coast—about seven hundred miles—to the piratical and nefarious trade of the slaver. Treaties have been made with many of the native tribes, on principles of justice and moderation, and upwards of 150 000 of them have become citizens of the Republic. All their treaties stipulate for the total abandonment of the Slave Trade, and for the abolition of the sacrifice of human life, either in superstitious rites, or by the awful ordeal by which thousands have been destroyed, of taking the poisonous decoction of sassawood. Their productions have increased; their commerce has increased; their comforts have increased; and new elements of wealth and of enjoyment have been opened to the world in the produce of this fruitful, and in some respects, favored land. The desert place has been made glad, and the wilderness to blossom as the rose. The banner of the cross, and of light, and of liberty, has been raised on this one stronghold of Satan, and they will wave, it is hoped, to the end of time. And all this has been effected by the feeble instrumentality of a few thousand colored emigrants, who had received their lessons in their intercourse with us, and starting under the care of a few enlightened, devoted and intrepid leaders, who, mostly, soon yielded their lives to their zeal, and became tenants of a martyr's grave. While, however, the climate proved deleterious to them, it did not prove so, to an uncommon extent, to the emigrant, which seems to show the difference in the constitution of the races, and that one is adapted to the torrid zone, and that the other is not. A majority of the whole number of the emigrants were emancipated slaves, freed with the object of colonization. Some few were purchased for the purpose, and the most of the remainder were free colored persons, who broke, no doubt, many dear ties to establish for themselves and their posterity a better home. Some of them were recaptured Africans, taken from the slavers by our public vessels and sent out as before mentioned, by the government of the United States, which, besides the African squadron, shows the extent of governmental participation in this great enterprise. The rest has been effected by voluntary donations and bequests from benevolent individuals; and the history of the world may be challenged for the exhibition of an equal amount of good by such inconsiderable means.

Dr. Durbin also discussed the subject with great eloquence, and stated some facts which deserve to be repeated.

"The whole white population of the country, he said by the Census of 1850, was 19,631 799; slave population, 3,198.324; free color 428 637. Total colored, 3.626.961. This makes the white population about 5 ½ to 1 of the black population. The whole colored population increased from 1840 to 1850 at the rate of 26.22 per cent., which would double the colored population in 30 years. In the slaveholding States the white population is 6,224,240, and the colored population 3.433.992. This gives not quite two white persons to one colored in the slaveholding States. Ten years ago the ratio was about 2 ½ white persons to one colored in the slaveholding States. This shows a gain in ten years of one fifth per cent. of the ratio of increase of the colored population of the South over the white; and, if this is maintained for fifty years more, the white and colored population will be equal in the slave States. Let us weigh well the state of the question Again: As the Census shows that the colored population doubles every thirty years, there will be in the United States in A. D. 1880 7.233 474; and thirty years thereafter, that is sixty years from this time, or A. D. 1910, there will be in the United States 14,466 948 colored people. Of this population nearly the whole will be in the slaveholding States, at least over thirteen millions and a half, supposing matters to proceed the next sixty years as they have proceeded for the last sixty."

He then asked if the present slaveholding States would bear a slave and free population to 13.500 000; and on the foregoing data, he proceeded to argue the policy, the propriety and the humanity of colonization. He described it as a remedy for the existing condition of things—a remedy founded on the fact established by all history—that two strongly marked races of people cannot live peaceably and equally together as citizens under the same Government. They must; he said amalgamate by marriage, and form one common people, or the one must be subjected to the other. The instincts, the reason and the judgment of the people of the United States were all against amalgamation by marriage, and it remained then, either to encounter the danger described, or to adopt an adequate scheme of colonization, i. e., to transfer the colored population of those parts of the world, where they may dwell together. Dr D. contended that the measure was one of national honor as well as general prosperity, and closed his address with this language:

1 It has been supposed that the colored people will refuse to emigrate to Africa. That the great body of them in the free States will refuse to go for a long time to come, there can be no doubt. But many are and will be disposed to go; and the number will be augmented as the prosperity and power of the Liberian Republic increase, and the mortification and embarrassment of the colored people increase in the States. There is a growing disposition already observable among them to join their brethren in Liberia. Some of the men whom they have been accustomed to regard as their best friends heretofore, and who have often advised them not to go to Liberia, never changed their opinions, and now advise them to go. As an instance, Mr. Birney has addressed a sensible and excellent letter to them to this effect. Shall we not open the way for them, and afford them our aid and advice? This noble and philanthropic enterprise is worthy the patronage of the great State of Pennsylvania.

2. It has been supposed that it is impracticable to transport to Africa three millions of men, women, and children. But what do we see before our eyes? It is now ascertained that there are over four millions of Europeans, and the immediate descendants of Europeans in the United States; and they are now coming to our shores at an average of a thousand a day, and the ratio increasing annually. If the emigration should continue to advance for the next ten years as it has done the last five, there will arrive in our country from Europe, five millions of people in ten years. And all this without the aid of governments to any appreciable extent. The whole movement is founded upon private enterprise, and to accomplish private interests. Are we to be told, then, that these States, in connection with private benevolence, cannot, in the course of a generation or two, transport the colored population of less than three and a half millions to the western coast of Africa? Especially as it is a measure of public peace and safety, public justice, public benevolence, public honor, and national prosperity. It is practicable, and must be done.

3. But it has been said, any such policy will arouse the jealousy of the Slaveholding States. This is a mistake. They see the danger in the distance, and would as gladly as we accept any safe and honorable remedy. Let them see that our measures are peaceful; are practicable, are effectual, and they will join us heartily, and thus co-operating with us to bring the General Government to aid strictly in accordance with the rights of each State, and the Constitution of the United States, we shall see, or at least our children or our children's children will see this foreign and naturally antagonistic race removed from among us, and returned to their own land which God hath given them; and then shall our Union be twofold stronger, brighter, and more glorious; and indeed become the light of the nations of the earth and the undebated pride of her children.—Pennsylvania Inquirer.

THE TWO PROCESSES OF DOMESTIC EDUCATION.

An incident in the boyhood of Canova.

The great sculptor Canova first destroyed his genius when a mere stripling, by moulding butter into the form of animals for the decoration of a nobleman's table. Now had he always limited his labor to this vile material, his task would have been easier but it would also have been worthless, because of its perishable resolve.

He might have lavished taste and toil, and bestowed faultless symmetry on the bust, the statute or the group; but the passage of a single summer's day over him and his work would have effaced each delicate trait, and have melted all the symmetry of his statuary into a mass of shapelessness. Now such are the efforts of the mothers who educate only for earth, and of the legislators who plan only for this life; whose skill is spent on man's outward condition, or on the child's worldly accomplishments,—when compared with those mothers, and pastors and reformers, who aim at the change of the heart. A wide interval of worthiness and efficiency separates the reformers who work but externally, from the religion that operates within on the inner man, and on his relations to the invisible but eternal world. Christianity would shape the adornment of the heart. She toils for eternity. Hers are the true because the enduring, reforms. While a Chesterfield is moulding in butter, a Henry is hewing in granite. The more difficult is also the more durable achievement. The reforms of the gospel endure the pressure of distress, and resist the heat of temptation. The shock of the archangel's trump does not shatter them; and they do not crumble with the crumbling and burning world, as it goes through the fiery baptism of the Last Judgement. Hence the gospel, like an accomplished sculptor,

"Gives bond in marble and enduring brass" for the permanence, as well as difficulty, of its labors, and their value. Let all your labors for your household be governed by the recollection, that the renewal of the heart, (the difficult of all changes,) is the only change of permanent and eternal value. Ask it of God's Spirit now, at once, and evermore.—True Union

UNHAPPY MARRIAGES.

Dean Swift assigned as the reason why so few marriages were happy, that young ladies spent their time in early life in the formation of beautiful nets to catch husbands, instead of constructing cages to keep them after they were caught. Without supposing for a moment that there are but few happy marriages in the United States, whatever may have been the case in Great Britain at the time that the witty Dean flourished, we publish his remark for the benefit of any who may be in danger of falling into the fatal error. It may be found after a while, that those fashionable accomplishments which are acquired at an expense of so much time and money, are not so valuable as prudence, temperance, industry, selfdenial, and other qualities that are most valuable in wives and mothers.

THE CHINESE IN CALIFORNIA.

THEIR DRESS, HABITS, ETC.

The Chinese are destined to exert an important influence in this country. For the last six months they supplied a larger number of immigrants that any other country not excepting the Atlantic section of the Union. Scarcely a week elapses without the arrival of 150 to 200 Celestials.

It is a curious fact that although there are from ten to twenty thousand of these people in California, very few of them are females. The women do not come, I know of only two or three Chinese women in this city.

You can scarcely look into the street but you see groups of Chinese. Here are a dozen marching in a single file, irregularly and making a tour of observation, noting with curiosity everything around. Here is another group, twenty or more, laden with tin pans, boots, and various preparations for the mines. Still larger bodies may be seen, with sacks of sugar and rice upon their backs, carrying them to their store-houses after the manner of mules. Or if the load be too heavy for one, two of them lug it on a pole. There is a chap with a huge basket of clothing, at the heels of an odd looking genius who wears odd looking spectacles, and who reads his book as he goes to find the proper stopping place. Occasionally you behold fifty or a hundred in one gang, just arrived, and starting with amazement at everything, getting along about as fast as children going to school on a parade day.

The Chinese are slow in assuming the American costume. Their clumsy shoes first come off, and are replaced by boots, often much too large. They are fond of big boots, and never seldom submit to a good fit if they can get a pair of greater capacity for the same money. Their feet are generally small. A friend of mine had a stock of small boots which he did not know what to do with—a Chinaman attracted by their cheapness, bought a pair, and soon returned with swarms of his countrymen who exhausted the supply before night.

After stricking their nether extremities into leathern boots, the revolution attacks the head. The black woolen skull-cap, or the big cane umbrella hat, heavy as Charlemagne's crown, give place to the California slouch. Further than this the China man seldom advances; about one in fifty takes the next step, which is to don the whole American costume; but the mass continue to exhibit the natural wiry elliptic shanks enveloped in tight flannel or nankeen, or each end sticking through a petticoat which ventures scarcely below the knee.

The most distinguished man among them is Norman Assing, one of the first immigrants who dresses in the American style, and speaks the language tolerably. Assing is a sort of a prince or priest among his countrymen. He has identified himself fully with his adopted country and feels as much interest in it as a native born. On the occasion of celebrating the admission of California into the Union, he entered into the procession with enthusiasm and appeared intoxicated with joy. He distributed fire crackers to the boys, refusing to sell them, and declared it was the happiest day of his life.

The Chinese are great gabblers and their dialect strikes you as singular. You can scarcely catch a distinct sound. It is nearly all vowel, the consonants being almost undistinguishable. Americans rarely attempt to learn it.

When employed as cooks or servants they find it convenient to assume an American name; but under other circumstances, they make no change. A cook who had an outlandish or Chinese name, made choice of Thomas as his English synonyme. A card was lately published in our papers, recommending a certain Sam Mun, Chung Yee, Paw Chung and Lee Chin. Their signs are becoming quite numerous in our streets—for instance, Establishment Paw Chong. Agent, Canton Goods; Tai Wo, Chinese Goods; Hong Ho Canton Warehouse; Chinese Laundry, by Hong Hong, Chong Sing, Wash-house, Wing Shing, Chinese Silk Store, On Chong, Washing and Ironing.

One of the grand depots is at the head of Clay st, where they have erected a very handsome store-house. The sign is painted in their own tongue, though the characters are placed horizontally, and in perpendicular columns. The house is crammed like all other quartering places, with hundreds of trunks and bundles, and with various kinds of merchandize. In the adjoining lot are twenty or thirty tents all occupied. About this one establishment two or three hundred persons are congregated. The merchants mostly remain in their stores waiting for the visits of customers. Some small traders hawk their wares from door to door. They are equal to the Yankees for driving a bargain, and their economy is proverbial. It is said they can outwit a Yankee in trade, in proof of which the shingles of their roofs of dead wood are exhibited.

On a Sabbath morning lately I entered an establishment on Clay st. and found about twenty of them sitting on the boxes quietly sewing bags of buckskin for gold dust. They were evidently unskilled in the art. One of the party wore a thimble, and others wore a rag tied on the finger instead. I was showing one of them how to do his work better, when another stepped up and showed me his work which was quite well done. He was highly gratified with my approbation.

Their ironing is done with a smooth flat bottomed skilet filled with live coals, which is moved over the fabric by means of the handle. One of them found a vest he was ironing to be too dry. Taking into his mouth a sup of water, he sputtered it over the garment with wonderful dexterity. Each ironing table is supplied with a bowl of water for this purpose.

How the thousands of Chinamen in this State propose to get along without any females, I cannot conjecture. The immigration of males exclusively, doubtless has some important design. Perhaps they intend securing a home before sending for their families.

It must be evident that events of great moment in the history of the world are destined to grow out of the rapid colonization of this Pacific shore, and the opening of new channels of commerce and social intercourse. The past half of the present century is full of the miracles of science and art. The current half will not be wanting. Who can imagine what the year 1910 will bring forth? China, Japan, India, the islands of the sea, will not be as they now are. A turning and an overturning are at hand. The Chinese emigration to California is one link in the chain. We live in an eventful era, the interest of which increases daily.—The True Union.

A GOOD THING.

The following, although brief, is beautiful and comprehensive:—"Every fly, every pebble, and every flower, are tutors in the great school of nature, to instruct the mind and improve the heart. The four elements are the four volumes, in which all the works are written.—Every man has in his own life, follies enough—in his own mind troubles enough—in the performance of his duties, deficiences enough—in his own fortune, evils enough—without being curious about the affairs of others.

THE PARADE OF DEATH.

The wife of a man of means and the daughter of a wealthy citizen of this city—people, too, fond of show—recently died. She had been called beautiful before a family of children had gathered round her, and she had not renounced her claim to that title. She died, and a large concourse was invited to the funeral. The coffin was made of rosewood, inlaid with silver, lined with plaited satin. The whole top was removed, and the deceased lay in state in her narrow home. She was dressed in a white merino robe, made like a morning gown, faced with white satin profusely quilted and ornamented. The sleeves were open, similarly lined and wrought, a stomacher of the richest embroidery covered the breast, where, alas! life had forever fled. The head was covered with a cap of choice lace; and a wreath of fresh flowers arranged around. The hands were crossed upon the breast with the fingers covered with expensive jewelry, which seemed to sparkle as if in glad pride that the bright eye was dim forever. Thus bedizzled, poor food for worms, she went down into the grave there to await her God!

This parade, this awful mockery of death; a fit sequel to an ill-spent and worldly life, wasted in the pursuit of bubbles and shadows is, I understand, a not unfrequent occurrence.—N. Y. Courier.

The Republic of Apes.

I could not make up my mind to use my gun, the only animals in the neighborhood I could shoot being white-grey long tailed apes. I had shot one on a former occasion, and the mortally wounded animal, by his similarity to a human being and his piteous gestures excited my compassion so much that I determined never to kill another. M Arnaud, on the contrary took a peculiar pleasure in watching the wounded monkeys which fell by his shot, because in the agonies of death their mouths became white like that of a dying man. It was affecting to see how the mother apes precipitated themselves down from the old nut trees and secured their young, playing before our feet, behind the high branches; and darted round the corner until another malignant ball reached them from behind, whereupon they let their young fall from their arms, but the little creatures clung firmly to the old one by running, climbing, and springing under her belly.

They live together in families of several hundreds; and their territory is very limited, even in the forest, I myself subsequently ascertained. Although they fear the water much, and do not swim voluntarily, yet they always fled for security to the high trees hanging over the streams and often fell in, whereupon the first sight of imminent danger carefully wiped their faces and tried to get the water out of their ears, before they climbed up into the trees.

Such a republic of apes is really a droll sight—conxing, caressing and combing each other, plundering, fighting and tugging one another by the ears; and during all these important concerts, hastening every moment down to the river, where, however, they satisfy themselves with a hurried draught in order that they may not be devoured by the crocodiles constantly keeping watch there. The monkeys on board our vessels not being fastened, turned restless at the sight of the jolly free life and at the clamor of their brethren in the trees.—Expeditions to discover the Sources of the White Nile.

CENTRAL AFRICAN EXPLORATION.—The London Athenæum contains an account of the movements of the two enterprising travellers, Drs. Barth and Overweg. According to the last communications home, they were on the point of starting on a highly interesting journey to Borgu, a mountainous country, lying to the northeast of Lake Tshad, about midway on the road to Egypt and never yet visited by any European. Important results are anticipated from this exploration. On their return, the travelers will direct all their energies to the South, namely, from Kuka to the shores of the Indian Ocean. Dr. Barth believes that a more southerly route, in the direction of Lake Nyassi, will be much more practicable than a straight line to Coombas, on a bearing of about southeast. The information collected respecting the Nyassi line, indicates many powerful kingdoms, densely peopled, intersected by numerous rivers, very fertile, and abounding in forests. Dr. Barth and his companions have rendered good service, so far, in determining accurately what before was but vaguely known. The routes already performed, amount at a rough estimate, to 3,700 geographical miles; and the itineraries sent home by Dr. Barth, form a network which covers the greater portion of Northern Africa. It seems, however, that they are but poorly provided with means for the prosecution of their researches, the whole of the sum originally granted by the English government having been received, and their own means well nigh exhausted; while now they have only to look forward to £200, which is to be placed at their disposal on reaching the Indian Ocean.

Higher.

Higher! it is a word of wonder meaning, the inspiration of all great deeds—the sympathetic chain that leads, link by link, the impassioned soul to its zenith of glory, and still holds its mysterious object standing and glittering among the stars!

Higher! lisps the infant that clasps its parent's knees, and makes its feeble essay to rise from the floor—it is the first inspiration of childhood to burst the narrow confines of the cradle, in which its sweet moments have been passed forever.

Higher! laughs the proud schoolboy, as his swing, or as he climbs the tallest tree of the forest, that he may look down upon his less adventurous companions with a flush of exultation, and abroad over the fields, the meadows and his native village. He never saw so extended a prospect before.

Higher earnestly breathes the student of philosophy and nature: he has a host of rivals, but he must eclipse them all. The midnight oil grows dim, but he finds light on knowledge in the lamps of heaven, and his soul is never weary when the last of them is hid behind the curtains of morning.

And higher! his voice thunders forth, when the dignity of manhood has invested his form, and the multitude is listening with delight to his oracle burning with eloquence and ringing like true steel in the cause of freedom and the right. And when time has changed his locks to silver, and world-wide renown is his; when the maiden gathering flowers by the road side, and the boy in the field, bow in reverence as he passes; and the peasant looks to him with honor—can he breathe forth from his heart the fond wish of the past?

Higher yet! he has reached the apex of earthly honor, yet his spirit burns as warm as in youth, though with steadier and paler light, and it would even borrow wings and soar up to high heaven, leaving its tenement to moulder among the laurels he has wound around it, for the never ending glory to be reached only in the presence of the Most High.—The Sun.

A DISMANTLED INQUISITION.

The author (writes M. Wylie) had once the fortune to be shown over a dismantled Inquisition.—one, too, famous in its day; and he may be permitted here to tell what fell under his own observation. In the summer of 1847 we found ourselves one fine day on the shores of the Leman. At our feet was the Rhone, pouring its abundant, but discoloured waters into the beautiful blue lake. The lake itself, moveless as a mirror, slept within its snow-white strand, and reflected on its placid bosom the goodly shadows of crag and mountain. Behind us, like two giants guarding the entrance to the lovely valley of the Rhone rose the mighty Alps, the Dent de Midi and the Dent d'Oche, white with eternal snows. In front was the eastern bank of the lake, a magnificent bend, with a chord of a dozen miles, and offering to the eye rocks, vineyards villages, and mountains, forming a gorgeous picture of commingled loveliness and grandeur. The scene was one of perfect beauty, yet there was one dismal object in it. At about ——— mile's distance, almost surrounded by the waters of the lake, rose the Castle of Chillon. Its massy architecture appeared all the more dark and forbidding, from the many recollections which it had called up. It reminded us at once of the princes and the Inquisition of the Dukes of Savoy, so celebrated in the persecuting annals of Rome; and here had many of the disciples of the early Reformers endured imprisonment and torture. We had an hour to spare, and resolved to pay a visit to the Castle. We crossed the drawbridge, paid our gratuity procured admittance, and ——— of a guide. We were first led to Bonnivard's dungeon, "deep and cold." There is here a sort of inner and outer dungeon; and in passing through the first, the light was scant, that we had to grope our way over the uneven floor, which, like the landward, wall, is formed of the living rock. Into this place had been crowded some hundreds of Jews; and we felt—for we could not be said to see—the little niche of rock on which they were seated one after one, and slaughtered for the good of the Church, when it was feared their heresy might infect. We passed on, and entered the more spacious dungeon of Bonnivard. It looked not unlike a chapel, with its groined roof and central row of white pillars. The light was that of a deep twilight. We distinctly heard the ripple of the lake against the wall, which was on a level with the floor of the dungeon. At certain seasons of the year it is some feet above it. Two or three narrow slits, placed high in the wall, admitted the light, which had a greenish hue, from the reflection of the lake. This effect was rather heightened by the light breeze which kept flapping the broad leaf of some aquatic plant against the opening opposite the Martyr's Pillar. How sweet we thought, must that day have been to the Prior of St. Victor, and how often, during his imprisonment of six years, must his eyes have been turned towards it, as it streamed in from the waters and the mountains around his dungeon! We saw the iron ring still remaining in the pillar to which he was chained, and read on that pillar the names of Dryden and Byron and others who had visited the place. The latter name recalled his own beautiful lines, descriptive of the place and its martyr:

> "Eternal! thy prison is a holy place,
> And Thy sad floor an altar; for 'twas trod,
> Until its very steps have left a trace
> Worn, as if the cold pavement were sod,
> By Bonnivard! May none those marks efface!
> For they appeal from tyranny to God."

The dungeon had its one window; and the image of suffering it presented stood out definitely before us. The rooms above had their thousands, and were suggestive of crowds of victims, who passed before the mind without order or identity. Of their names few remain, though the instruments on which they were torn to pieces are still there. Emerging from the darkness gloom of the vault we ascended to ——— We entered one spacious apartment which evidently had been the "Hall of Torture." For there, with the rust of some centuries upon it, stood the grand apparatus of the Inquisition. In the middle of the room ——— beam reaching from floor to ceiling, with a strong pulley at top. This was the corda, "the queen of torments," as it has been called. The person who endured the corda had his hands tied behind his back; then a rope was attached to them, and a heavy iron weight was hung at his feet. When all was ready, the executioners suddenly hoisted him up to the ceiling by means of the rope, which passed through the pulley in the top of the beam; the arms were painfully wrenched backwards, and the weight of the body increased by the weight attached to the feet, in most cases sufficed to tear the arms from the sockets. While thus suspended, the prisoner was sometimes whipped, or had a hot iron thrust into various parts of his body, his tormentors admonishing him all the while to speak the truth. If he refused to confess, he was suddenly let down, and received a severe jerk, which completed the dislocation. If he still refused to confess, he was remanded to his cell, had his joints set, and was brought out, as soon as able, to undergo the same torture over again. At each of the four corners of the room where this beam stood was a pulley fixed in the wall, showing that the apartment had also been fitted up for the torture of the veglia. The veglia resembled a smith's anvil, with a spike at top, ending in an iron die. Through the pulleys at the four corners of the room ran four ropes. There were tied to the naked arms and legs of the sufferer, and twisted so as to cut to the bone. He was lifted up, and set down with his backbone exactly upon the die, which, as the whole weight of the person rested upon it, wrought by degrees into the bone. The torture, which was excruciating, was to last eleven hours, if the person did not sooner confess. These are but two of the seven tortures by which the Church of Rome proved—what certainly she could not prove either by Scripture or reason—that transubstantiation is true. The roof beneath which these enormities were committed was plastered over by the sign of the Cross. In a small adjoining apartment we were shown a recess in the wall, with an oubliette or trapdoor below it. In that recess, said the guide, stood an image of the Virgin. The prisoner accused of heresy was brought, and made to kneel upon the trapdoor, and, in presence of the Virgin, to adjure his heresy. To prevent the possibility of apostacy, the moment he had made his confession the bolt was drawn, and the man lay a mangled corpse on the rock below. We had seen enough! and, as we recrossed the moat of the Castle of Chillon, the light seemed sweeter than ever, and we never in all our lives felt so thankful for the Reformation, which had vested us with the power of reading our Bible without saw——— limbs or and our body mangled.—The Friend.

MEN'S JUDGMENT.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

"I wouldn't give much for his chance of heaven," was the remark of a man whose coarse, well-worn garments contrasted strongly with the dark, rich broadcloth of the person to whom he referred. In the tones of the individual who uttered this sentence, was a clearly apparent satisfaction at the misery of his rich neighbor's doubtful chance of final salvation. It was on the Sabbath, and both had just passed forth from the sacred edifice, to which each had that morning gone up for the avowed end of worship.

"Why do you say that?" asked the friend to whom the remark was addressed.

"You know the scriptures," was the confident answer. "How hardly shall they who have riches enter the kingdom of heaven."

"You believe, then, that the mere fact of possessing riches will keep a man out of heaven."

"No; I wouldn't just like to say that. But riches harden the heart, and make men unfit for heaven."

"I doubt if riches harden the heart more than poverty," was replied.

"How can you say so?" was warmly objected. "Is'nt the promise every where to the poor? To whom was the Gospel sent?"

"The rich and poor spoken of in the word of God," said the friend, "do not, it is plain, mean simply those in the world who possess natural riches, or who are in natural poverty. Remember, that the Bible is a revelation of spiritual truth for man's eternal salvation; and that its teachings must have primary regard to what is spiritual, and refer to man's internal state rather than to his mere worldly condition. Remember, that the Lord, while on earth, said: 'Blessed are the poor in spirit,' (not the poor in this world's goods) for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.' And we may, without violence to even the letter of the Word, conclude, that when He speaks of its being hard for the rich to enter the kingdom of heaven, that only the proud in spirit; those who rested self-confident on the riches of these worldly and natural wisdom, were meant. That it would be easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for such rich men to enter heaven, is plain from our Lord's words when he set a child in the midst of his disciples, and told them that unless they become as that little child they could not enter the kingdom of heaven. Not externally and naturally as that child, for that was impossible; but poor in spirit, teachable, and innocent as a child.

The first speaker, whose name was Maxwell, tossed his head, and slightly curled his lip as he replied:—

"I believe just what the Bible says. As for your forced meanings, I never go to them. As a plain, matter-of-fact man, I understand what is written in a plain, matter-of-fact way. The Bible says, that they who have riches, shall hardly enter the kingdom of heaven. And I can see how true the saying is. As for Clinton, of whom I spoke just now, I repeat, that I wouldn't give much for his chance. It is well that there will come a day of retribution. The Dives have their good things in this life; but our turn will come afterwards. We shan't be always poor. Lazarus went, a beggar, from the rich man's door, and was received into Abraham's bosom.'

"What has made you so bitter against Clinton just now?' enquired the friend.

"I'm not bitter against him, particular. I speak of rich men as a class. They are all selfish, unfeeling, and oppressive. Look what the good Clinton might do, as a steward of God's bounty, if he chose. He might make the wilderness blossom as the rose. But settlement day will come, ere long, and then a sorry account of his stewardship will he have to render.'

"How do you know that the account will be approved in heaven?' was asked in a quiet voice.

"Approved! How do I know?' ejaculated Maxwell, incredulously. 'Any man can see he is an unfaithful, hard-hearted and oppressive steward.'

"Has he oppressed you?'

"Yes.'

"Ah! I was not aware of that. I didn't know that you had any claims upon him as an almoner of ———.'

"My claims are those of common humanity. But you shall know all and judge for yourself. I am a poor man—'

"Well—'

"With a wife and four children, whom I love as tenderly as Clinton, or any other purse-proud oppressor of the poor can possibly love his wife and children. They are dependent, for daily bread upon my daily labor. With the sweat of my brow, I keep hunger from my door, and cold from entering therein.'

"An independent man,' said the other.

"Yes, thank God! I am independent man; as independent as the highest in the land.'

"But let the rich be as they are,' was answered to this. "If they are dependent, why care for them? Why trouble yourself to be fretted because others are favored by Providence with a greater abundance of worldly goods? There is danger, in this thing of going beyond the nabobs, and arraigning the wisdom of Him who setteth up whom he will, and whose bounty feeds even the young ravens.

"So go on with your story. What is the crime that Mr. Clinton has committed against you and humanity?'

"I am a poor man, as I said.'

"I know you are; a hard-working, industrious, but poor man.'

"And as such, entitled to some consideration.'

"Entitled to a fair return for your labor in all cases.'

"Of course I am; and to some favor in the distribution of employment, where I present equal capacity with those who are less needy than myself.'

"What do you mean by that?'

"A plain story makes all plain. Well; you are aware that Mr. Clinton is about building a new dam across the falls?'

"I am.

"And that he asked for proposals?'

"Yes.'

"I tried to get the contract.'

"You!' There was more surprise in this ejaculation than the friend had meant to convey.

"Certainly! Why not?' was petulantly remarked.

"Of course you had a perfect right to do so.

"Of course I had; and of course my bid, though the lowest, was thrown out, and the bid of Jackson, who manages to monopolize every thing in the village, taken. He and Clinton are leagued together, and the offer for proposals was only a ———.

"Further comment is good, friend Maxwell. Slander is the truth, and nothing else but the truth. He is no jackall and Clinton is the lion.

"A little further reflection, said the friend mildly.

"I'm not blind. I see how things are worked. You say your bid was lower than Jackson's. How do you know this? I thought his bid was not publicly known.'

"I knew it, and, in fact, knew what it was to be before I sent in my proposals; and I was therefore, able to go below it. The truth is, I managed, between you and I, to find out just what every man was going to bid, and then struck a mark below them all to make sure of the job. I wanted a contract, and was determined to have it, at all hazards.'

"I hardly think your mode of proceeding just fair, said the friend; but waiving that, could you have made anything by the job, at your bidding?

"Oh, yes, I'd have made something—more, a good deal, than I can make by day's work. The fact is, I set my heart on that job as a stepping stone to contract work; and am bitterly disappointed at its loss. Much good may it do Mr. Jackson and Clinton. I shouldn't be much sorry to see the new dam swept away by the next freshet.

"Why, Maxwell! This is not the spirit of a Christian man. Envy, malice—these are what the Bible condemns in the plainest terms; and for these sins, the poor have quite as much to answer for as the rich—and perhaps more. If you go for a preacher on the Sabbath with no better thoughts than these, I [illegible] as for finding the kingdom of heaven [illegible] supposed the Bible.

"Good day!' said Maxwell, turning off coldly from his friend, and taking [illegible] that led by a nearer course than [illegible] which they were walking, to his home.

A few weeks later, the person with whom Maxwell thus conversed had occasion to [illegible] some business with Mr. Clinton.—He had [illegible] dered him a bill for work done, and called to receive pay.

"You've [illegible] your bill, Mr. Lee, said Clinton.

"Ah! Are you certain?

"You can examine for yourself. I make no error of twenty dollars in the additions.

"Then you only owe me sixty dollars, said Lee, with a disappointment in his tones that he could not conceal.

"Rather say that I owe you a hundred, for the mistake is in your favor. The first column in the bill adds up fifty, instead of thirty dollars.

Let me examine it.' Lee took the bill and added up the column three times before he felt entirely satisfied. Then he said,

"So it does! Well, I should never have been the wiser if you had only paid me the eighty dollars called for, by the footing up of the bill. You might have retained your advantage with perfect safety.

Lee said this on the impulse of the moment. He instantly saw a change in Mr. Clinton's countenance, as if he were slightly offended.

"Oh, no; not with safety,' was gravely replied. 'I should never have found it out.

But there is coming a day, with every man, when the secrets of his heart will stand revealed. If not now, it would then appear that I had wronged you one of twenty dollars.

"True! True! But all men don't think of this. No one is more fully aware of [illegible] than myself. It is for me, however, to live [illegible] so as not to burden my future with [illegible] and repentance. Knowledge Mr. Lee, I would not wrong a poor man to the value of a single cent. I may err, and do err, like others; but to err is human.

After the expression [illegible] Lee felt curious to know [illegible] of, and how he [illegible] Maxwell, said, after [illegible] process of erasure:—

"So did you take the lowest bid [illegible] tion.

"I took the lowest competent [illegible]

"Then you do not think Maxwell [illegible] to the work.

"I do not think [illegible] man to be trusted, and, therefore, would not have given [illegible] for such a piece of work. You are aware that the [illegible] would almost inevitably [illegible] of life and property among [illegible] who live along the course of the [illegible] below. I must regard their safety before any pecuniary advantage to myself; and have given Mr. Jackson, who has the contract, positive instructions to exceed the estimates if necessary, in order to put this question of safety beyond a doubt. I know him to be a man whom I can trust. But I have no confidence in Maxwell.

"A good reason why you declined giving him the job.

"I think so.

"Maxwell was greatly disappointed.

"I know, and has spoken very hard against me. But that avails nothing. My principle of action is to do right, and let others think and say what they please. No man is my judge. Maxwell is not, probably, aware that I know him thoroughly, and that I have thrown as much in his way as I could safely do. He is not of course, aware, that one of my sons overheard him in reference to this very mill-dam, say—'I'm bound to have that contract whether or no. I have learned the lowest bid, and I have got a bid still lower. How did you learn this?' was asked of him. 'No matter,' he answered 'I have learned it. You can't go lower and build the dam safely,' was said. 'To which he replied—'I can build the dam, and make a good profit. As to the safety, I'll leave that in the hands of Providence. He'll take care of the poor people.

below. Mr. Lee! I felt an inward shudder when this was repeated to me. I could not have believed the man so void of common honesty and common humanity. Was I not right to withhold from him such a contract?

You would have been no better than he if you had given it to him, was answered. And yet this same man inveighs against the rich, and thinks their chance of heaven a poor one.

Simply because they are rich?

Or, it might with more truth be said, because they will not yield to his covetous and envious spirit. He is not content with the equivalent society renders, back to him for the benefit he confers, but wants to share what of right belongs to others

That spirit I have often seen him manifest. Well, if simple riches are a bar to man's entrance into heaven, how much more so is discontent, envy, malice, hatred, and a selfish disregard for the rights and well-being of others. The rich have their temptations and so have the poor, and neither will enter heaven, unless they overcome in temptation, receive a purified love of their neighbor. This at least is my doctrine.

Of the two, I would rather take Clinton's chance of heaven, said Lee to himself, as he went musing away, even if he is a rich man. —Liberty Hall and Cincinnati Gazette

For the Liberia Herald

Buchanan Sept., 6th, 1852

Mr. Herald.—Will you please indulge me again with a small space in your columns, in which to make a grateful acknowledgment of the receipt of an oil press "complete" on the arrival of Capt. J. K. Straw (ship Fidèle,) from Liverpool early in last April. This invaluable article was kindly sent (at the suggestion of Elliot Cresson Esq.,) by Mr. Joseph Harrison of Philadelphia, who was at the time in England.

I am satisfied, that it answers admirably well for expressing oil from the peanut and castor bean, and I have no doubt that it is equally adapted to the expression of oil from most of the numerous vegetable productions containing oil both indigenous and exotic, with which our highly favored country does, and will increasingly abound.

I have in accordance with the beneficent wishes of Mr. Harrison, put in operation the machinery of this county that can manufacture palm oil by expressing oil from the nuts of the forest, and take this opportunity to express the pleasure it has afforded throughout Liberia. This highly benevolent act of Mr. Harrison, is the more appreciated from the fact that every considerate Liberian knows that I have greatly our agricultural and manufacturing interests may be retarded for want of machinery adapted to our present infantile circumstances. I have found it admirably adapted to expression of oil from the pulp of the palm nut, having made several gallons of excellent palm oil therefrom; and would have continued making through the season, had not the scarcity of casks to contain an unusual quantity brought in by the natives this year prevented.

It is both amusing and gratifying to notice with what emotions of astonishment and admiration, the aborigines look upon the machine [though simple] when in operation; and frequently they indulge in expressions of ridicule [for which their language is most remarkably adapted] at their own imperfect method of making oil. Many of them have inquired the price of a similar press, and declared their determination to purchase. And why may they not? they are among the most independent people on the globe; the ordinary subjects of most of the chiefs in the Bassa and New Cess countries have actually made more oil &c., &c., this year than their present limited wants demanded; it is well known that during this year quantities of palm oil were brought by the natives to this city [Buchanan] and left with responsible citizens for weeks and months, or until such time as the proceeds were needed. And I feel sure that companies founded of half dozen [more or less] of them would find it an easy matter to purchase one each; and as they are now convinced of its utility. I look forward to the day is not distant, when one or more of these presses will be found in almost every native village in Liberia.

It is also gratifying to know that the natives are becoming more assimilated to us in manners and habits; their requisition for civilized productions increase annually, they are seldom satisfied with the same size and quality of the piece of cloth they wore last year—some of them habitually wear a pair of pantaloons, shirt or coat, and others all of these articles; and of the thousands that have intercourse with our settlements and used to gloss in their greegree, and were afraid to utter an expression against it, very many of them are now ashamed to be seen with a vest gris-gris about them, and if a particle of it should be about them, they try to secrete it; and if detected, it is with an affectation depicted in their countenances; they discard it, or make some excuse. There is also manifestly a spirit of commendable competition among them throughout the country, they try to rival each other as many of the civilized customs [in fact it seems to be the African is characteristically imitative,] a laudable ambition that I feel sure will never abate materially, till they are raised to the perfect level of civilized life and flow in one common channel with us, civilly and religiously. It is certainly progressing, and though some untoward circumstances may retard its consummation, yet nothing shall ultimately prevent it

The mighty benevolent act of Mr. Harrison in introducing this press upon these shores, will in its measure contribute to the consummation of this desire of every philanthropist, and will long be remembered by Liberians with emotions of liveliest gratitude. And I will add in conclusion, that while a kind providence is interposing for us, so as to facilitate a development of the resources of our highly favored country by disinterested benevolence from abroad, it becomes every intelligent and patriotic Liberian to guard our internal interests of every kind with the greatest vigilance;—to see that these interests are not compromised, to look with suspicion upon, and in a measure exercise repulsive feelings toward all foreign aid and means that may be proffered, if they primarily contemplate nothing but foreign interests, commercially. As Liberians our interests and responsibilities are peculiarly our own, entrusted to us by an All-wise Providence, and no other nation and people are called, and so properly suited to the prosecution of this great work as ourselves.

I am most respectfully,

STEPHEN A. BENSON.

A Moral for the People.

Mr. Herald.

Sir I think you will agree with me in the opinion, that much of the disquiet that prevails in this country as well as others arises from hasty conclusion, hard speeches, slander and the like.—If these were to cease, peace would ensue, and our community would at once feel the change (with its full power) of moral swaysion, and those things which now often fill the cup of woe would dissolute like the dew before the morning sun. Owing to these sweet moral influences, that lift the mind from the low groveling things of earth, to nature's God in heaven. Much of this I think arises from a want of self examination. It is an Apostolic injunction that we might examine of ourselves, and surely it must be most evident, that if this heavenly injunction was observed, there would be a superabundance of peace and prosperity, and the whole community would be governed so far as the influence of moral sua... that the present glorious [illegible] would be lost in the dazzling rays, color of its figure. And in order to effect this desired object let every person examine himself thus.

"Have I neglected to keep in my mind the love of God or the fear of him.

Have I been unthankful or brameriless and blessings!

Have I broken the Sabbath.

Have I neglected to attend the public prayers of the church!

Have I neglected to receive the holy Sacrement!

Have I neglected private prayer, or have I prayed in a careless manner!

Have I at any time taken an unnecessary oath!

Have I been guilty of corrupt communication, or idle swearing, or of taking the Lords name in vain

Have I loved and sought after the vanities and pomps of this wicked world!

Have I fulfilled the lusts of the flesh, and sinned against God!

Have I been guilty of false, pride, covetousness, discontent, and impatience, envy, hated, malice, anger unchartableness!

Have I been guilty of drunkenness, or of gluttony or sloth and idleness.

Have I hurt my neighbour!

Have I cheated, wronged, or oppressed him.

Have I spoken evil of him without cause!

Have I neglected to perform such kindnesses as he had a right to expect from me!

Have I been guilty of lying!

Have I been disrespectful or unfaithful to my parents, or any of those persons whom God hath set in authority over me"!

To these let us add, a sweet acceptive in the following simple, but impressive lines.

"Speak gently, it is better far
To rule by love than fear.
Speak gently, let not harsh words mar,
The good we might do here.

Speak gently to the young, for they
Will have enough to bear,
Pass through this life as best they may,
'Tis full of anxious care.

Speak gently to the aged one
Grieve not the care worn heart,
The sands of life are nearly run
Let such depart in peace.

Speak gently, kindly, to the poor
Let no harsh tones be heard!
They have enough, they must endure,
Without a spoken word.

Speak gently to the erring know
That thou thyself art human
Perchance unkindness may forego
O win them back again"!

Whoever penned these lines must have a heart deeply impressed with the religion of christ.

E. W. S.

The great Commission

Enlarge the Lord,

Go, preach the gospel, to all around,
Go preach it faithfully—
Go, point to Christ, his five bleeding wounds
Go, proclaim, the truth most willingly.

Go, preach the gospel freely now,
Go, preach the word both far and near,
Go, into the church and pay the vow,
Go, to Jesus and crown you shall wear.

Go, preach, in God's name declare,
Go, to the ivy mantled house of prayer,
Go, for God will not alter near,
Go, and he will read your title there.

Go, preach the gospel saith the Lord,
Go, let every creature hear,
Go, tell of, the happiness of my abode,
Go, let all, know my will both far and near.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, SEPTEMBER 15th, 1852

The September Session of the Superior Court of this County, Judge Brander presiding, was opened on monday last, and continued in Session nearly three days. We regret that our friend "P. V." was not present, to furnish us with a history of its doings

Late advices have reached us from the leeward counties—There was nothing to disturb the peace and tranquility which at present so happily exist The health of the immigrants is as good as can be expected. It is said that an attempt is about to be made by some of the people of Grand Bassa, to remove the Seat of Justice to Fish Town, "Buchanan." We have heard nothing definite about it.

Throughout this county public meetings have been held to appoint delegates to attend a national convention to be holden sometime in December next, to nominate President and Vice President. We have not learned if such meetings have taken place in the leeward counties. It is possible, we may hear, in time for our next paper. We are pleased to see the people at work in this way. It indicates certainly, that they are interested in public affairs, and that it is their duty, to engage in all such measures.

Our correspondent "P. V." will not we hope take amiss our not publishing the communication he sent us in reply to "A. B." We think he will on reflection decline having it to appear. If however it is insisted upon, we will publish it, though we may regret to do so.

From all the information we can gather the quantity of Palm oil has been collected and sent from Liberia with the past six months, this season one year before. Eleven Barks and Brigs have been loaded, and there are two vessels now collecting cargoes. They will be filled in a couple of months. The oil trade is steadily on the increase, and if our market is kept well supplied with goods, our enterprising merchants cannot help doing a profitable business. It is true, as things now are, nearly all the profits of this large trade go in the pockets of foreigners. We hope that the contemplated arrangements of our merchants, will so equalize matters, to assure to them a moiety of the profits. It is full time that we make the attempt to supply our own markets from our soil. Hitherto our labor has gone to increase the wealth of foreign merchants. Camwood is also steadily increasing in quantity, and notice the recklessness of some of the chiefs in the Vey Country, who destroy trees, we could soon ship scores of tons to Europe and the U. S.

Religious.—The Union meeting of the Baptists commenced in this city on Saturday the 11th inst. & continued until Sunday night. Many of the brethren from Millsburg, Virginia, Caldwell and New Georgia attended. On the Sabbath the baptismal interesting ceremony of baptism was performed, two persons were immersed. Elder John T Richardson was the administrator.

We learn that the arrival of one of the English mail steamers, the "Forerunner," may be looked for to-day. It had been determined that she should be dispatched a few days earlier, than was first intended. We long to hear of her appearance—for some months we had any direct news from Europe, and all are anxious to hear from there. We have reached here from President Roberts since he arrived in England.

King Bah Gay of Little Bassa is still seriously ill It is reported that he attributes his illness to witch craft, and that several poor families of his tribe, have had their houses pull down, their property destroyed, and themselves cruelly beaten, by order of Bah Gay. It will be well, that the authorities at Marshall inquire into these matters, and let Bah Gay know, that he will not be allowed to maltreat and otherwise abuse the people when no crime has been proved on them;—and that the Government do not belelieve in "witch craft."

MAMMOTH STEAMERS.—We see it stated in the London Times that a proposition is on foot to build iron steamers of 720 feet in length, with 90 feet beam, and 36 in depth, with engines of 100 horse power, and a screw. Masts—there will be eight masts, with large fore and aft sails. The vessels are to be built of iron, and will be not only shot but fire proof. The novel method, though simple, and for strength known to every school-boy, of fastening length ends, gives more safe than those of smaller construction. It is calculated to carry 2000 passengers, with a theatre for amusements, &c., and could in cases of war, open a battery of three hundred guns. This projected scheme is for the purpose of bringing the English Colonies [illegible] months reach of London.—Cincinnati Gazette

POETRY.

WHITTLING.—A YANKEE PORTRAIT.

BY REV. J. PIERPONT.

The Yankee boy, before he's sent to school,
Well knows the mystery of that mystic tool,
The pocket-knife. To that his wistful eye
Turns, while he hears his mother's lullaby;
His hoarded cents he gladly gives to get it,
Then leaves it stone unto a edge till he can whet it;
And in the education of the lad,
No little part that implement hath had.
His pocket knife to the young whittler brings
A knowledge of material things.
Projectiles, music, and the sculptor's art,
His chestnut whistle, and his shingle dart,
His elder pop-gun, with its hickory rod,
Its sharp explosion as a broadside—wad,
His corn-stalk fiddle, and the deeper tone
That murmurs from his pumpkin-leaf trombone,
Conspire to teach the boy. To these succeed
His bow, his arrow, and a feathered reed,
His windmill, raised the passing breeze to win,
His water wheel, that turns upon a pin;
Or, if in father lives upon the shore,
"You'll see his ship's beam-ends upon the floor,"
Full rigged, with raking masts and timbers staunch
And waiting, near the washing-tub, for a launch
Thus, by his genius and inventive driven,
Ere long he'll solve you a "conundrum-given;
Make any gimcrack, musical or mute,
A plough, a coach, an organ or a flute;
Make you a locomotive or a clock,
Cut a canal, or build a floating dock,
Or lead forth beauty from a marble block;
Make any thing, in short, for sea or shore,
From a child's rattle to a seventy four
Make it, said I? Ay, when he undertakes it,
He'll make the thing, & the machine that makes it.

And when the thing is made—whether it be
To move on earth, in air, or on the sea;
Whether on water, o'er the waves to glide;
Or, upon land, to roll, revolve or slide;
Whether to whirl, or jar, to strike, or ring;
Whether it be a pistol or a spring,
Wheel, pulley, lever, cord or brass,
The thing designed shall surely come to pass;
For whether us hand's upon it you may know
That eagle's go in it and he'll make it go.—The Friend.

Concluded.

Such is the instruction is contained in the scriptures, to those who, rather than allow to others the enjoyment of their heart, to which they have access by faith, would be willing to see it sacrificed to gratify their own envious and covetous lusts—would be willing to behold the destruction of the unity and harmony of Society, for the sake of the name to which both the true and false mother of the church lay claim. And how worthy of imitation is the example of the true mother! who rather than give up her child to the sword, yielded to the demand of the unjust and unmerciful claimant, what she knew, belonged only to herself. Herein was a display of the fruits of humility and love—choosing rather to surrender the child undivided and unharmed, than to see it sacrificed to the cruel will of a false and wicked heart.

The dear Redeemer and Saviour of men was meek and lowly in heart, praying for his enemies, and kindly entreating those who accused and persecuted him, seeking not his, but them, that he might cleanse them from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works. He came unto his own, and his own received him not; and yet for these very souls he gave his precious life, setting us an example of forbearance and love. He was led as a lamb to the slaughter, yet he opened not his mouth; and though he was the Lord from heaven, he took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham." Though he was tempted by the same subtle enemy which caused Adam to fall from the high estate to which he was created, being told that all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them should be given him, if he would fall down and worship the tempter; yes, "Jesus saith unto him get thee hence Satan, for it is written, thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve."

Now this blessed and lowly Jesus, of whom we profess to be the friends and followers, hath declared, "Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven; but whosoever shall humble himself as a little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven." And saith the prophet, "He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God!"

"Man, though a worm, would yet be great;
Though feeble would seem strong;
As if one an independent state
By sacrilege and wrong.

Strange the reverse, which once abas'd,
The haughty creature proves!
He feels his soul a barren waste,
Nor dares affirm he loves.

Oh, welcome, in his heart, he says,
Humility and shame!
Farewell the wish for human praise,
The music of a name!

But will not scandal mar the good
That I might else perform?
And can God work it if he would
By so despised a worm!

Ah! vainly anxious!—leave the Lord
To rule once, and dispose;
Sweet is the moral of his word,
And gracious all he does.

He draws from human littleness
His grandeur and renown,
And generously will for confess
The triumph all his own.

Down with self exalting thoughts,
That fain would still employ
The weapons of the arch foe allots,
And suffer shame with joy.

No longer, then, thou wilt encroach
On his eternal right;
And meekly smile at thy approach
And take his just delight."—The Friend.

ALONE WITH GOD.

Alone with God! How solemn, how sublime the ideal! How tranquiling! how comforting! how fraught with unimpeachable security, with indefatigable strength! Yet how awful! "Jacob was afraid, and said how dreadful is this place!" And Peter was bewildered and awe-struck, while he exclaimed, "It is good for us to be here!"

Alone with God! Such is the attitude of the Christian in prayer. "Thou when thou prayest, enter into thy closet; and when thou hast shut thy door, pray." "There are," says Sutling, "heart-sorrows and plagues which the Christian could not bear to his intimate earthly friend."

There are fears which we dare not whisper into any mortal ear. There are hopes and joys too vast and glorious to be imparted.—But when the Christian has hid his face in the bosom of Father, he can breathe forth all—for when words fail, he can resort to the language of sighs and groans, for "He knoweth our thoughts afar off." "He that searcheth the heart knoweth what the mind of the Spirit, because He maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God." These are when the work of the interceding Spirit in the heart is complete. Spirit prompts, the Intimate cannot understand them. Here is no fear of [illegible] temptation, of lack of appreciation [illegible]. For we converse with an Infinite whose name is Love, and who has promised to commune with our hearts before him."

Wondrous privilege! Delightful morality, [illegible] intercourse with God! Yet "Our [illegible] is with the Father." Thus may we [illegible] even of this, in the name of Jesus [illegible] the throne of the Universal Majesty, and [illegible] through the bright guards who surround it, penetrate to the recesses of his glorious and [illegible] abode, and stand in the very presence of the "King eternal, immortal, and invisible," and then "make thy requests known unto God," have yes, absolutely sure of a gracious hearing and a ready answer. For one hath said "Call upon me and I will answer thee." "Draw nigh to God and he will draw nigh to you."—The Southern Argus.

SIR WALTER SCOTT.

BY REV. J. CUMMING.

The poetry of Sir Walter Scott presents an entire contrast to that of his celebrated cotemporary. It glows with generous feelings and patriotic sympathies. It detects the beautiful in order to command it, and either hides the dark and repulsive characteristics of human nature, or if it cannot conceal them, describes them in order to denounce and discourage them. It creates and nourishes the loveliest affections of nature. You rise from persuing his poetry as from a generous repast—more attached to your country, its scenery, its ancient customs, and its surviving excellencies. Take the following as an instance of his power in awakening the feeling of the love of country:—

"Breathes there a man with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land!
Whose heart hath ne'er within him burned,
As home his footsteps he hath turned
From wandering on a foreign strand?
If such there breathe, go mark him well;
For him no minstrel raptures swell;
High though his titles, proud his name,
Boundless his wealth as wish can claim;
Despite those titles, power, and pelf,
The wretch, concentered all in self,
Living, shall forfeit fair renown,
And doubly dying, shall go down
To the vile dust from whence he sprung,
Unwept, unhonored and unsung."

The almost solitary exception to these features, occurs in "Old Mortality," one of his prose writings, where he has needlessly caricatured the fanaticism he ought perhaps to have passed over, or spoken lightly of the enthusiasm, the mistakes of which were compensated by its sincerity and grandeur; and beyond all dispute he has quoted Scripture in order to prove a jest, or to illustrate extravagant zeal, and thus lightly and irreverently handled sacred and solemn things. This is much to be deplored. Every serious mind shrinks with horror from every approach to an irreverent use of scripture, or jesting with the words of God. Such writing cannot be too carefully avoided. If, however, we may judge from the closing days of Scott, he would have cancelled what he must have seen was deeply offensive to Christian men.

In his dying moments his retentive memory recollected only such passages of Scripture as he had been taught in his early years. Those who stood near him, heard him repeating, at intervals, lines from the Scottish version of the Psalms, or broken fragments of Isaiah. "It was," says Mr. Lockhart, "on a sunday morning, a beautiful day, so warm, that every window was wide open, and so perfectly still that the sound of all others most delicious to his ear—the gentle ripple of the Tweed over its pebbles—was distinctly audible, as we knelt around the bed and his eldest son closed his eyes."

Many a one would hope that the mighty minstrel found the Saviour of whom David and Isaiah spake, a present help and a noble one—one without a broken string, the other without a discordant note.—Southern Baptist.

The Baby's Lesson.

Have you ever watched the sunbeams in the sunny hours of your childhood, wandered alone, the margin of some lapsing fountain? Perhaps a fragment, or a pebble, from the crumbling brow of some overhanging cliff had fallen into the calmest surface of the waters. A bubble sprang into existence. It was bright and transitory as an infant's dream. Like an air-built castle it seemed to float upon the clear, calm bosom of the crystal tide. In the bright mirror of its glittering globe were reflected the romantic beauties of the scenery around it. Rocks, mountains, meadows, and waving woods were depicted upon the stainless vault of its little heaven,—and even the gorgeous orb of the universe had dagguerreotyped himself upon its liquid sky, and seemed to float upon its cloudless firmament. It was beautiful, too soft and transitory for earth,—and a passing breeze from the mountain swept over it with relentless wing, and it was gone! A world of light and of beauty had burst and vanished from your view. Although it may have seemed to be a thing of chance, an ephemeral existence, of little consequence to earth or to you, a moment's reflection might have discovered in it a beautiful adaptation to impress upon the mind a lesson of instruction.—The Southern Argus.

THE TWO TRAVELLERS.

A FABLE.

A cunning fellow named Thomas, and his friend Lubin were going to a neighboring city on foot. They found upon the roadside a well filled purse. Lubin, with a contentful face exclaimed, "What a windfall for us!"

"For us is not quite right; say rather for ME," replied Thomas. Lubin said no more, but in leaving the plain, they discovered some robbers hid in the adjacent wood. Thomas trembled, but not without cause, and turning to Lubin said, "We are lost."

"WE is not the true word, but YOU," replied Lubin, and then scampered away. Thomas, almost petrified with fear, stood still and was soon caught and gave up the purse.

MORAL.—He who only thinks of himself in his happy days will have very few friends in his unhappy ones.—Southern Baptist.

DEO VOLENTE.

In a country parish in Maine, lived and labored a learned pastor, of his worthy and Deacon Varnum. The pastor arranged an exchange with a neighboring clergyman, less learned than he with "more world's wisdom," and left a list of notices to be given by him from the pulpit. At the close of the services, accordingly, the good brother proceeded to announce the notices; one of which ran substantially thus: "There will be the usual prayer-meeting on Thursday evening at 7 o'clock, (D. V.)" "D. V." repeated the clergyman, hesitatingly. "D V.—I suppose that means at Deacon Varnum's!" Our learned pastor used to tell the story long afterward with a relish.—I bedem.

THE CHOLERA.

A gentleman of professional honor, in order to prove that he could procure brandy of a strictly temperance landlady, at a fashionable resort on our bay, the last season, assumed the symptoms of cholera, and with expressive signs and groans called to her for brandy. "Brandy!" exclaimed, "I have none." What! none for puddings and pies?" exclaimed the honorable sufferer. "None," replied the heroine; "my puddings and pies never have the cholera!"—I bedem.

Infanticide is said to prevail to a fearful extent in China. The Rev. S. Johnson, an American Missionary, in a letter written in 1848, says:—

"My Chinese teacher, an intelligent, and apparently credible individual, informs me that female infanticide is very prevalent. He states, that within this city and its suburbs, one-third of the infant female children are annually doomed by drowning at their birth. Some parents spare only one out of four or five of the daughters. This inhuman practice is not confined entirely among the poor, but is practised to some, the rich not unfrequently following the same custom. The civil law seems to have no notice of it. One reason that was [illegible] to me, as the excuse for [illegible] was, that it was respectable [illegible]."

Another letter from Mr. White says:

"It is exceedingly difficult to ascertain the extent of infanticide in China, or all the reasons which prompt to this [illegible]. Investigations have been made at Canton, and evidence obtained to show that it is comparatively rare, and not generally countenanced by public opinion; originates by no means unknown, nor punished by the laws. [illegible] Particular investigations at Ningpo [illegible] awful extent of murder [illegible]."—Pennsylvania Inquirer.

Dogs and Animals—Last night the Opera House was crowded to witness the astonishing and amusing performances of these animals. A large portion of the audience consisted of children, to whom the exhibition appeared to afford the greatest pleasure. The performances of the monkeys formed the principal feature in the programme, although the dogs gave striking proofs of their dramatic requirements, and the goat, Esmeralda, went through several very difficult exercises.

One of the scenes is particularly worthy of notice, as showing the remarkable intelligence of these animals, and the excellent manner in which they have been trained. This was called the Dog and Deserter. The character of the deserter was personated by Monsieur Bow-wow who certainly exhibited, as much as a canine creature could, the woeful extremity to which he had been reduced, and his fear of the penalty attended upon his violation of military law. When he came upon the stage there could be no mistake about his being the criminal, and the more juvenile portion of the audience show considerable sympathy for his [illegible] in the utmost humiliation and with his paw [illegible] to the captain of the execution. In vain did Pantaloon, and supplicated in the most touching manner for pardon, but that officer was inexorable. The fate of the deserter was fixed, and he must die. A negro, habited as a clergyman, entered, and administered consolation to the condemned, who now became more resigned. A bandage was placed over his eyes, the word of command given, and a soldier, armed with a gun of most diminutive size, fired. When the smoke cleared away, poor Bow-wow was seen lying on the stage, [illegible] motion could be observed that gave signs of life. He was dead. A dead-cart, drawn by [illegible], was brought in and [illegible] the remains of the deserter were deposited, and wheeled off the stage, the officers, soldiers and others following in slow and solemn succession.—N. Y. Tribune.

DR. CHALMERS ON THE SABBATH.

We never, in the whole course of our recollection, met with a Christian [illegible] who bore upon his character every other [illegible] of the Saint, one attribute who [illegible] the Sabbath day to keep it holy. We appeal to the one portion of the worthies who are now living in their midst, that, contrast as their views in every other [illegible] of the new measure, the [illegible] of their Sabbath day shone with equal brightness amid the [illegible] of vice as [illegible] them. In every Christian household it will be found that the discipline of a well-ordered Sabbath [illegible] forgotten among the other lessons of a Christian education; and we appeal to every individual who now hears us, who carries the remembrance in his bosom of a father's worth and a father's name, if on the coming round of the seventh day an air of peculiar sanctity did not spread itself over that mansion where he first drew his breath, and was taught to repeat his infant hymn and lisp his infant prayer. Remember, then, Christian, that the love of God [illegible] in his heart, and [illegible] the place in his affections, is an anomally that is nowhere to be found. Every Sabbath image and every Sabbath circumstance is dear to him. He loves the quietness of that hallowed morning. He loves the church bell around which summon [illegible] to the house of prayer. He loves to join in the [illegible] and to sit and listen to that voice of persuasion which is lifted in the hearing of an assembled multitude. He loves the retirement of this day, from the din of worldly business and the turmoils of worldly men. He loves the leisure it brings along with it; and sweet to his soul, is the exercise of that hallowed hour, when there is no eye to witness him, but the eye of Heaven; and when in solemn audience with the Father, who seeth him in secret, he can, on the wings of celestial contemplation, [illegible] all the cares and all peculiarities of an alienated world behind him.—The Christain Herald.

THE FIGURATIVE LANGUAGE OF SCRIPTURE.

In the Jewish Chronicle one of the Axioms or Rules laid down by Mr. David N. Lord, in his Theological Literary Journal, for interpreting the figurative language of scripture, is thus stated and illustrated:

'No passage is figurative unless it have a figure in it.'

The principles of plain language are now well known. Every school master is capable of making a grammar. But still in the Occidental mind, much obscurity is found upon a higher order of language than plain, called figurative. We descendants of Europeans are a plain people, and in expressing our thoughts are accustomed to express them in those words which sober and serious minds have agreed properly to belong to them. In the description of a giant we would never think of saying "He is a son of God; or of a large kettle, we would never say, "Put over the fire that kettle of God." We do not appreciate such a mode of conceiving ideas. With the Oriental, and especially the Jewish mind, it is far otherwise. Their language is full of such expressions. They express their thoughts not commonly in plain, but figurative language. This is a prominent peculiarity of the Scriptures, and when brought to our cool and precise conceptions, is not appreciated until we strip of all that does not properly belong to the idea, and it be presented in the most simple language. To be able to ascertain what of the Scriptures is figurative, and to interpret a figure, is one of the highest qualifications to an interpreter of the Divine Oracles. In reality the figurative language of the Scriptures is about the only obstacle to their ready and correct understanding, for if they were written in the style of a Child's Reader, a "fool would not err therein."—What is figurative language? E. g: A European in describing the swift motion of a ship on the water, would simply say, "The ship sails swiftly." This is plain language, because it is just such language as men have agreed to use to describe the motion of a ship. But a Jew would say of the ship, "She flies like a bird," "She rides fleetly on the crested wave." This is figurative. Its peculiarity is simply this:—The language which men have agreed to use to describe the motion of a bird through the air, is here used to describe the motion of a ship.

Figurative language may be defined: Language borrowed from an object, or idea to which it belongs in order to describe an object or express an idea to which it does not belong. Its peculiarities are: 1st. It is not true, it is not true that a ship flies any more than a bird sails. 2d. It is language that belongs to an object well known, used to describe an object not so well known. 3. There is a resemblance between the object which is to be described, in some of its qualities and circumstances, and the object from which the language is borrowed. This resemblance is the foundation of the use of the figurative language. 4th. What is called figurative language is always plain language, when used to describe the object to which it belongs; hence there is no such thing as figurative language, only when according to the definition, it is used to describe an object or express an idea to which it does not conventionally belong. And hence we have the following infallible rule to determine when language is used figuratively.

When an object is described, or an idea expressed, in language which is possible, true, and appropriate, it is plain language. When an object is described or an idea expressed in language which is not possible, not true, and not appropriate, it is figurative. Now the object of using figurative language is to make some circumstance or quality of the object or idea more obvious, more vivid or pleasing to the mind.

We now proceed to apply Mr. David N. Lord's first axiom: "no passage is figurative unless it have a figure in it." "And God made two great lights: the greater light to rule the day." There is no borrowed language in this description except the word rule. It is plain and not figurative language. But in describing the same event the Psalmist lays aside the plain, and borrows language from other objects and events, viz: that which properly belongs to a bridegroom coming out of his tent chamber in his wedding garments, to rejoice the hearts of his friends and attendants.—Speaking of the firmament, he says: "In them hath he set a tabernacle for the sun, which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race." Had the Psalmist been describing a bridegroom merely, there would have been no figure in the language. But the moment he applies the language belonging to a bridegroom to the sun, it becomes figurative. By the use of language, the sun in its course during the day, and its effect upon the earth, is made to appear to us in a novel, interesting and striking aspect. We are pleased and instructed.

Again, Jude in his epistle speaks in plain language of certain men of his times, thus: "Ungodly men, turning the grace of God into lasciviousness, and denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ." This has no figure in it. But soon after he grows warm upon the subject, his mind recurs to objects that they are like, in some respects, and he borrows their language and applies it to them: "These are spots in your feasts of charity, when they feast with you, feeding themselves without fear: clouds they are without water carried about of winds; trees whose fruit withereth, without fruit, twice dead, plucked up by the roots; raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame; wandering stars, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever." This language is figurative. These men were not clouds; but in respect to knowledge of the truth, they were as destitute of it as a floating cloud is of rain, and just as subject to change in their opinions and doctrines as the empty cloud is to be driven about by the wind. They were not raging waves of the sea; but in their intercourse with men, were as noisy and as useless as the foaming waves breaking upon the shore. They were not wandering stars, flying away from their regular orbit into dark space, never to be heard from again; but in their relation to God they resembled a wandering star, in its relation to its own sun: having left its source of light, it is lost for ever.

Now we will test a passage which is regarded by many as figurative," "Then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory . . . . . Then shall the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." Matt. xxiv. Has this passage a figure in it? Has it any borrowed language? If so, from what object is it borrowed? In its application to the persons and objects here described is it the Son of man to come to earth in a cloud. When he ascended, a cloud received him out of sigth; so may a cloud open and reveal him again. It is possible for men to see him when he does come, for as he ascended, so will he descend, so will he descend in his human form. It is possible and true that all the tribes of the earth may mourn when they see him, on account of their sinfulness. This language is all applicable to the objects which are described or spoken of. Not a word of it is borrowed from any other object. It has no figure in it, and therefore is not figurative.

It is in this way that we must proceed in our interpretation of Scripture, to discriminate between plain and figurative language, ever keeping in mind that "no passage is figurative unless it have a figure in it."—Ch. Index.

A

Brief Notice of certain statements in a late Work written and published

By

MARTIN ROBINSON DELANY

United States.

By

EDWARD BLYDEN.

We have lately glanced at a work, just published, entitled "The Condition, Elevation, Emigration and Destiny of the Colored people in the United States, politically considered by Martin Robinson Delany."

Whatever may be the qualifications of the Author as a writer—whatever merits his book may possess, and however little we may be qualified to judge—to us his views of the manifest destiny of the colored people in the United States, their emigration, and elevation in Central and South America, appear rather enthusiastic, and bordering on absurdity. He objects very strenuously against Liberia, as the place of destination for the colored people, and makes in reference to it the most disparaging statements, which we consider the result, if not of a most violent antipathy to, certainly of a consummate ignorance of Liberia.

These we will notice hereafter.—We propose, at present noticing very briefly his views of the causes of the depressed condition of the colored people in the United States, and the means he prescribes for their elevation.

After expatiating largely on their low and abject situation, as a race in the United States, he states as one of the grand causes of it, their being so generally employed by white people in the capacity of domestics, a circumstance which he considers powerfully obstructive of their elevation to an equal social and political standing with the whites.

He says "until colored men attain to a position above, permitting their mothers, sisters, wives and daughters, to do the drudgery and menial offices of other men's wives and daughters,—it is pitiable mockery to talk about equality and elevation in society. But is there any likelihood of their ever attaining" to such a "position in the United States?

J. D—advises that the colored people abandon such menial occupations and engage in honorable employment, pursue respectable business &c. Now it must be evident to every mind, that knows the state of things in the United States, that the colored people cannot pursue such a course. It would prove a means of serious injury to them, for it is with difficulty, even now, owing to the steady and rapid increase of emigration from Europe of Irish Germans &c that they can obtain in some of the States even the situation of domestics. They are driven out of employment, and substituted by Irish and Dutch-men who on account of their piney, submissiveness and industry, and above all their color are decidely preferred.

Now if colored people can hardly be supported in those menial occupations, is it likely that they will be patronised in their honorable employments! Will they be able to compete successfully in the capacity of mechanics, merchants, &c. with their white rivals? Certainly not, for they lack, as a general thing, both means and intelligence, which in any old country, and among any advanced people are necessary to insure success.

But suppose they could be independent of "drudgery and menial office" would that raise them to equal, social and political standing with white men in the United States? Would that alter the laws, which are daily becoming more stringent and oppressive to colored people. Look at the law lately enacted in Indiana, prohibiting them from settling in the State. Look at the new Constitution of Illinois. In Kentucky slaveholders are not allowed to emancipate their slaves unless they send them out of the State. Virginia is not favorable to free colored people remaining in the State. In all the United States, North and South, there is a mighty pressure upon the colored people—a prejudice operating powerfully against their elevation.

But Mr. D.—seems to be aware of all this, and, not satisfied with the plan he proposed, admits the necessity of their leaving the United States—objects to their emigrating to Canada or Liberia—and points them to South America. Saying Central and South America must be our future homes.—Why? Have the colored people in the United States any right to it? It is not their fatherland, nor are they likely to be any better off there than in the United States. To a calm and considerate observer, there is no prospect of their becoming a large and prosperous nation in South America. The Indians where amongst the greater part of the inhabitants do not consider themselves as identified with the black race, and it is unlikely that they would be content to mingle with them and to "share" as Mr D—says "the same fate."—And should the colored people go among them pursue honorable occupations—become prosperous and wealthy—monopolize the privileges of the natives &c—a spirit of jealousy and suspicion will be awakened among the latter, which will be a source probably of continual revolution.—Again the religious and political views of the generality of colored people in the United States are essentially different from those of the South Americans. In order to be successful therefore in establishing a great nation in South America, the colored North Americans must possess a decided influence over the aborigines—a great proportion of whom being barely civilized—society must be remodeled, prejudices removed—morals established and perpetuated, and innovations introduced of a character altogether unsuited to the views of the people, and for which they are entirely unprepared. But if the colored people should not possess an influence sufficient, thus to change the state of society, but be obliged to adapt themselves to the habits and customs of their adopted country, we see no prospect of their ever becoming the nation Mr. D—anticipates.

But "they importune us to come" says Mr. D—We admit that they do—but what for? To assist them in farming operations, help to build them up a country. Not to be their rulers—their judges and magistrates. No—it is labor that they desire.

But all expostulations are unavailing. "Go we must and go we will" says Mr. D—"as there is no alternative." "No alternative!" when on the western coast of Africa—a land to which they have a natural right—there already exists an independent Republic of colored men—who cordially invite them to their shores. "No alternative" when Liberia exists, an asylum to which when a colored man flees—"he sits beneath his own vine and figtree—none daring to molest nor make him afraid"? But they "must go" to "Central and south America." Well if this be the case,—we say to them go. But as they take their departure we would remind them that they go in the neglect of a most important duty a duty which nature has made incumbent upon them.—They care not to labor for the redemption of their father-land—for the restoration of Africa's ancient and long-lost glory, upon which they so much boast—they care not to assist in raising her sons from their awful degradation and misery.

They go—to South America to amalgamate with Indians—they go to raise on that Continent—a powerful nation, they go to "keep the vineyard of others while their own vineyard they have not kept."

Who shall achieve the redemption of Africa

by whom shall she be rescued from her deplorable condition, if civilized and christianized colored men whose physical constitution, render them so peculiarly adapted to the climate, (which to white men is so fatal), turn their backs upon her? Shall she be left to wallow in her misery? If so, then let colored men in any quarter of the globe renounce all hopes of ever becoming elevated and respected—for, until Africa be rescued from her thraldom and degradation, in vain will they look for equal standing and respectability with other nations,

Regardless of this however, Mr. D—counsels the colored people of the United States, to go to South America, because she invites them to come, to go and make a nation. When Liberia a free and independent Republic of colored men on the coast of Africa, with cries more eloquent and moving than those of South America, invites them to come. "The climate, soil, and productions, the rivers and beautiful sea-coast, the [illegible] scape, and beauty of the star[illegible] the song of the birds;—"the [illegible] ity of the nation, all say come [illegible] free—come and enjoy the blessings [illegible] nature is ready to lavish upon you. Li[illegible] stretches forth her hand and presenting [illegible] most urgent motives, says come, come and be [illegible] ries cast not our lot among us, and [illegible] will do you good." She points to the be[illegible] millions around her, says "come over and help us" to raise them from their degraded situation. The sound of her cries fall upon their ear, they turn and look at the awful spectacle to which they are pointed, they affect sympathy, but, unlike the "Good Samaritan" they take an other road, they "pass on the other side:" Liberia presses her calls, but they turn their back upon her—they listen not to her expostulations, blinded by prejudice they pursue a course of opposition to her—pointing to her faults, and descanting on her failings, they seem to rejoice and triumph; but be her failings what they may, she certainly presents an asylum for colored men, especially those of the United States—no where else to be found on the face of the globe.

Mr. D. advances certain objections against Liberia which we will now notice.—The first of which is based on the fact that it is located in the sixth degree of latitude, North of the equator, in a district signally unhealthy. "He certainly does not know as much about the climate and general state of health in Liberia as he professes to know. For though situated near the equator it is undoubtedly as healthy as Central and South America, if not more so. It not being the seat of any malignant epidemics, such as frequently prevail in that part of the world. The "African fever" to which every foreigner coming to the country is subject, is fast disappearing, so far at least as its power and fatal effects are concerned and in proportion as the country becomes cleared and settled, it will be less prevalent. It is somewhat strange however, that Mr. D. in another part of his book admits and exults in the fact, that the constitution of the colored man is adapted to all countries, yet here he makes the "geographical position" of Liberia the ground of objection against it, affirming that its position "renders it objectionable as a place of destination for the colored people of the United States." Who cannot see in all this a deep-seated prejudice, an inveterate malice against Liberia?

Another ground on which he bases a second objection to Liberia, is that, "It originated in a deep-laid scheme of slaveholders!" This is a [illegible] and confirms us in the o[illegible] that Mr. D. is either [illegible] of Liberia, its history &c, or [illegible] malicious and envious dispo[illegible] proof of the falsity of his assertion with [illegible] origin of Liberia:—we make the [illegible] extracts from the pen of the late ven[illegible] Dr. Alexander. "Before any Society [illegible] in America for this object—(the ob[illegible] Colonization), the business of conveying colored people to Africa was commenced by one individual, himself a colored man of New England. As early as the year 1815 Paul Cuffee, whose name will be indelible in the annals of the free republic, rising now in Africa, carried out emigrants from New England to Sierra Leone.

* * * * *

He was largely engaged in navigation and in many voyages to foreign countries, commanded his own vessel. His desire to raise his colored brethren of this country to civil and religious liberty in the land of their fore-fathers, induced him to offer some of the free people of color a passage to the westren coast of Africa. About forty embarked with him at Boston and landed at Sierra Leone, where they were kindly received.

"Only eight of these were able to pay their passage! the whole of the expense of the remainder amounted to a sum a little less than four thousand dollars. Here was an example of philanthropy which has never been exceeded in this or any other country. * * *

"And this was but the commencement of a colonization enterprise, which he would have prosecuted to a far greater extent had not his life been cut short. His death occurred the following year. * * * * *

In the close of this year Rev Dr. Finley of Baskingridge, New Jersey, went to Washington, and by the aid of several friends, who entered warmly into his views, instituted the "American Colonization Society, which dates from December 1816."

* * * * * * * * *

"Yes; posterity shall know that Paul Cuffee is of right the father of the noble scheme of American Colonization; and we verily believe that the name of this humble but noble minded man, will stand out in bold relief in the history of Colonization, when many other names, once celebrated, shall be covered with the rust of oblivion. And it will be here proper to remark; that we have good reason for believing, that it was the noble and disinterested enterprise of Paul Cuffee which suggested to the Rev. Dr Finley of New Jersey, the idea of forming a Society for Colonizing the free people of color.

* * * * * *

"We conclude then that the true father of American Colonization was Paul Cuffee, and the proper founder of the American Colonization Society was the Rev. Robert Finley D. D.

It will appear then from the above extract that Liberia did not originate in a deep laid scheme of slaves holders" as Mr. D. in his book has published to the world to be fact, his objection then against Liberia on this score, is founded on a baseless fabrication.

But where was the utility in refering to the origin of Liberia to find objections against her? We judge not of a man by his ancestry, but we estem him according to his moral worth. O talk not of what a man has been, speak of his present conditions, caparate not on the origin of Liberia but speak of her present character, her position among the nations of the earth;—speak of her as she now stands with all the prospects of becoming a large, powerful, and prosperous nation with an almost boundless territory behind her, and the brom[illegible] before her, exciting the admiration of all who visit her rising capital."

A third objection against Liberia Mr. D.—founds on the [illegible] assumption that she "is not an independent nation." This is certainly [illegible] a great deal Liberia "not an independent nation" and acknowledged as such by the great powers of Europe, England, France, and Prussia, and by the Empire of Brazil!

With her President and Senate and House of Representatives, her Courts of justice &c.—But, according to Mr. D.—the American Colonization Society controls her affairs—the "Colonization Board at Washington City, District of Columbia, being the executive and Government."

How is that? When her Senators and Representatives, elected by the people, meet annually for Legislation, creating such laws as they deem advisable?

This asperser further avers that the late war with the Fishmen was "declared by virtue of the instructions of the American Colonization Society." This is certainly a deliberate falsehood, for the war was decided upon by the Legislature which convened soon after the aggression of Grando, and the battle was fought before any intelligence relative to it was received from the United States. The aggressions of Grando, were made on the 5th, and 15th, of November 1851. News reaching Monrovia on the 16th, on the 17th, a company of volunteers, was dispatched by the Government to Bassa Cove, to relieve the settlers there who had been encearing in their watchings against the enemy, and consequently much exhausted.

Early in December, the usual time of its session, the Legislature assembled. The President in his Message, laid before it for consideration, the circumstances of the aggressions of Grando and his allies, and recommened the adoption of measures for the subjugation of the insurgents.

In order to show the proceedings of the Legislature with regard to the matter, more accurately, we have extracted the following from the journal of the Senate.—It may here be proper to state, that the President's Message was delivered to the Legislature on the 3rd of December "Tuesday Dec. 4th." The Senate met according to adjournment. A communication was received from the House of Representatives, with a resolution, authorizing the President to raise a military force to suppress the insurrection of the Picaninny Cess Fishmen in the county of Grand Bassa.

On motion it was read; passed to a second and third reading. When it was adopted and returned to the House

Wednesday 10th. The resolution authorizing the President to raise a military force, to suppress the insurrection &c—was presented to the President of the Senate, and signed by him at half past one o'clock, P. M. Thursday 11th. A communication was received from the House of Representatives being a resolution appropriating the sum of $15.000 to carry out the resolution authorizing the President to put on foot immediately a military force to enforce the laws, and maintain the dignity of this Republic against certain conspirators insurrectionists and their abettors &c, in the County of Grand Bassa. After passing its first and second reading, it was, on motion, put off to 11 o'clock A. M.

"At 11 o'clock,—On motion of Hon. John Hanson of Grand Bassa, the appropriation bill was taken up and reconsidered. While on its third reading a conference committee was, on motion, appointed to confer with a similar committee of the House of Representatives, to make certain amendments in the bill, Hon. James B McGill of Messurado, and Hon. Edward Morriss of Sinoe, appointed on the part of the senate.

"At 11 o'clock senate adjourned for one tour."

"At 12 o'clock Senate in Session."

The Chairman of the conference Committee on amendment of the appropriation bill reported its amendment, authorizing the President to draw on the public treasury for said appropriation;—Report adopted.

"At 1 o'clock P. M. A communication was received from the House of Representatives, accompanied with a bill passed in that House, appropriating $15.000 for carrying out the resolution authorizing the President to put on foot a military force &c,—Read; Hon: J. B. McGill moved its second reading,—passed into a law at its third reading at 2 o'clock, and the House informed of the same."

These bills were all approved, and signed by the President.

We have endeavoured in this concise manner, to give our readers the doings of the Legislature in relation to the war. The Legislature adjourned on the 26 of Dec.

On the 30th, the troops left this city for the leeward. It will be remembered that up to this time news had not even reached the United States, in relation to the invasion of the natives, much less had instruction returned from the American Colonization Society, declaring war against them.

On the 23rd, of January 1852 the expedition returned having conquered and subdued the enemy. It appears that the first letter written by President Roberts to the United States, in relation to this matter, was dated December 15th 1851, and forwarded, we believe by the brig "Zeno" Capt Sturtevant; in which the following language occurs. "I am extremely sorry that, in addition to the evils of this barbarous outrage, we should be under the stern necessity of getting up a military expedition to punish Grando and his associates. This is deeply to be regreted but no other alternative remains to the Government. This letter was written to Rev. J. B Pinney of New York.

Is this asking instructions of the Colonization Society as to the steps which should be pursued &c?

Again! no intelligence whatever, relative to the war was received from the United States, until the arrival of the Liberia Packet, March 15th 1852. But sufficient proof has been adduced to show the assertion of Mr. D.—that war was "declared by virtue of the instructions, of the American Colonization Society," to be devoid of truth and destitute of any foundation whatever. It is a specimen, however, of many others occuring in this book which show the writer's utter disregard of truth, in the statement of facts of which he either knows nothing, or which he knows to be false. O how deplorable is it, that a man professing intelligence, will allow himself, to be so entirely guided by prejudice, as to sacrifice all principle, and indulge in such baseless and unwarrantable assertions.

But we cannot close without noticing certain very unjust and slanderous remarks, which he makes in reference to President Roberts. He says, "We have no confidence in President Roberts of Liberia, believing him to be wholly without principle, seeking only self-aggrandizement; even should it be done over the ruined prospects of his staggering infant country. The people of Liberia should beware of this man."

These remarks are most provokingly false, and show on the part of the writer a mind contracted by prejudice. For, who has not heard of the preservering and self-sacrificing efforts of President Roberts, in behalf of Liberia? Who that would hear, has not heard, how he has more than once or twice stood up nobly in the face of the enemies of Liberia, and defended her against their assaults? Who does not know of his bravery and skill as a soldier in securing, when his country has been assailed by the savages around—the victory of its arms, and the subjugation of its foes. Let the scenes at the war of Gatomba tell,—the New Cestors expedition and those of the later and more formiably battles at Trade Town. In all, President Roberts personally engaged. To say nothing of, the many difficultres with which he has had to contend in settling differences between the native tribes in our vicinity. The many arduous toisl constant and unwearied exertions, and the many sleepless nights spent in devising means for the promotion of his country's welfare.

To say then that he is "without principle," is to be the author of a base and most intolerable aspersion.

But the people of Liberia know too well the character, views and feelings of Mr. Roberts, to listen to the slander of an unprincipled cypher in politics, to the reports of one whose prejudice against Liberia, is obvious in every line penned about her. Despite all his envy and jealousy, however, the name of President Roberts is shrined in the heart of every Liberian, and will be heard in the songs of successive generations.

There is hardly a dissentient voice in Liberia, as to his merits as a great statesman and true patriot.

But Mr. D. may follow his own notions, and we will follow ours. He may go on in the pursuit of subtlety, falsehood and deceit,—characteristics which tell us in unequivocal language whose amanuensis he is, and we will pursue the path of justice, truth and righteousness, in the pursuit of which we are assured of the blessings of Heaven.

"Truth crushed to earth will rise again,
Th' eternal years of God are hers.
But error wounded, writhes with pain,
And dies amidst her worshippers."

Other objections and disparaging remarks, with regard to Liberia occur in Mr. D's. book, and which should be noticed, but we leave them to the consideration of those whose age, talents, and experience render them more qualified for that purpose than we are.

"Meanwhile, we call most solemnly, upon the young men and young women of Liberia to apply themselves to study to embrace the opportunities they enjoy for mental discipline and moral culture, so as to insure the success of Liberia, and the perpetuity of her institutions, and be able to stand up in defence of their country's rights against the many and formidable enemies, who oppose her onward and glorious march.

Monrovia October 1st 1852.

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Herald,—Allow us a space in your valuable paper, for the communication of certain facts, which we believe, will be interesting to your readers.

Owing to circumstances uncontrollable by him, Dr. Fr. Chs. De Glasier, did not continue his voyage on board the steam ship "Fanny" which sailed a few weeks ago from this port; but deemed it advisable to remain among us pro-tempore. Since the departure of that vessel he has delivered three very interesting lectures, at all of which, we had the pleasure of being present. The first was delivered on Friday evening the 17th ultimo—the subject was "The offices and influences of women." The second was delivered on Saturday afternoon the 18th, at which ladies only were admitted, it being for the purpose of giving them directions with regard to the preservation of health &c. The third was delivered on Thursday the 30th, ultimo, this like the second was exclusively for ladies. These lectures were all very interesting and instructive, we wish all the ladies of Monrovia had been present at their delivery, though at each, there was quite a goodly number. The Dr. has very kindly promised to deliver "a course of lectures," before the ladies—we hope they will always favor him with a full and prompt attendance.

It is our purpose, at present, to make a few remarks relative to the lecture of the 17th ult., the subject of which is stated above. In delivering this lecture, the Dr. spoke in a most winning and tender manner of the appropriate sphere of women, their duties &c. Her place, he said, was not as some would have it, in the Legislative hall, at the Bar, in public life; but in the quiet and retiring scenes of the homestead,—that the duty of rendering home happy, comfortable, and desireable was hers. He insisted on contentment in domestic life, as being one of the necessary "ingredients" of happiness: speaking of woman's rights, he said that whatever the rights of woman were, she certainly had no right to be a man. We are decidedly of the Dr's., opinion, and deem it greatly deplorable that there should be any of our sex in other parts of the world who, desiring as they suppose, to keep pace with this age of improvement, are disposed to overleap the bounds with which nature has surrounded them. The Dr in the lecture referred to, made allusion to the celebrated "Bloomer Costume," we have heard a great deal of the innovation in female dress, but have never seen any specimens of it except in pictures—as hitherto none of the ladies of Liberia have admitted it sufficiently to adopt it, and we earnestly hope they never will: but should any think of adopting it, we shall always be decidedly opposed to it, and whatever influence we have shall be constantly exerted against it. O let not woman depart from her sphere, she was given to man for an help meet, and for that purpose she is in a peculiar manner adapted; for that purpose, is she desired by man, and in that respect she contributes to his happiness, and fulfills the end of her being. To depart from her sphere, would be to produce an awful revolution in domestic life, to destroy the noble interests of society, sacrifice the true rights and privileges which nature has granted to the sex, and in the enjoyment of which only, consists the happiness of woman. In the language of Dr. G. to depart from her sphere, would be to constitute her a "wandering star forever." Let us then be content in our own sphere, though it be within the limits of the domestic circle, still it is an ample field; let us fulfil all it's duties, act faithfully our part, and though we acquire not worldly fame and renown, still let it suffice us to know that if we "grow not weary of well doing in due time, we shall reap a glorious reward above what earth can grant" and let us be encouraged by the assurance that, if we "be faithful unto death we shall wear the crown of life."

We have seen the following lines on "woman's rights" some where before, but we now transcribe them from an album belonging to a friend of ours as we think them suitable to our present purpose.

"The rights of woman, what are they?
The rights to labor and to pray;
The right to watch while others sleep;
The right o'er others' woes to weep;
The right to lead the soul to God;
Along the path the Saviour trod;
The path of meekness and of love;
The path of faith that leads above;
The path of patience under wrong;
The path in which the weak grow strong;
Such woman's rights, and God will bless;
And crown their champions with success."

Dr. De Glasier is certainly entitled to, and we take the liberty of tendering, which we hope he will accept the thanks of this community generally, and the ladies particularly, for the very interesting and instructive manner in which he entertained us on the occasions above referred to.

Respectfully yours,
THE LADIES.

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Editor,—Sir, you will confer a favor on me by publishing the following lines for the satisfaction of all it may concern

Sir, Messrs Thomas L. Jones and Joshua Lock, the first and second mate of the American Barque Ralph Cross, that was wrecked at Cape Palmas, some time last August, taken passage on board the Hamburg Barque Malvina, Capt H. F. Henert, on the 7th of August, and while coasting his way up, they were taken sick on the 14th of August. The captain finding their sickness becoming more serious, he therefore left his supercargo on shore at Nanpah Kroo and came immediately up here so as to get them where they might obtain medical attention, he reached here with them on Saturday night 21st inst., about 8 o'clok, and brought them on shore, seriously ill, and made application to Dr. James Brown who immediately took them under his care, and paid every possible attention to them that was in his power. The Dr. with his skill, and the citizens with their kindness exerted every effort in their power to rescue them from the jaws of death; but the Great disposer of all human events saw fit to baffle all of their skill, and on Tuesday the 24th. Joshua Lock the second mate was removed from the cares of this world. The Dr being fearful that the knowledge of the second mate's death being made known to the first mate, might have an evil tendency, therefore every precaution was used to prevent his finding it out, but all in vain, we perceived that he had fallen into a state of despondency. The Dr being not easily disheartened, endeavored to exercise new energy; but in a short time it was plain to be seen, that the mind was diseased as well as the body. At times he could be heard to say something about his papers, from which we concluded he was much disturbed in mind about his books and papers. He informed us that he was from New York and the 2nd mate from Philadelphia, neither of them had a family; he expressed his gratitude to the citizens for their attention to him, & on Thursday the 26th, at night, he launched into a never ending eternity. I therefore took an inventory of the effects of both of them, and among those of Thomas L. Jones we found the sum of $41 64 in specie, and in the second mate's trunk we found 12½ cts. Capt. Henert informed us that while they were on board his vessel, Joshua Lock while in a frensy state threw part of his clothes over board containing all of the money he had, we find among their papers that they had been paid off at Cape Palmas by their consignee up to the time of the wreck.

Therefore I have now advertised to sell at auction on the ensuing Saturday 4th Sept., all of the effects of the late Thomas L. Jones Joshua Lock, to satisfy all claims, and defray all expenses, and provided there should be a ballance it will be deposited in the Treasury where it will be subject to any legal demand.

By appointment of the Chairman of the Probate Court,

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, OCTOBER 6th 1852.

We have had no direct intelligence from the United States since June—and then it was in the shape of news-papers. Nor have opportunities offered since May, to communicate with our friends there. We hope soon to hear of an arrival and to learn that President Fillmore's Government have taken the initiatory steps towards the recognition of the Republic of Liberia. Many considerations which we could name if it were necessary, ought to induce that Government to do so—the trade of Liberia is now an important matter with England, France and other powers—and tho' Uncle Jonathan is strongly grasping foot-hood on nearly every part of the North American continent, he seems to have no concern for that of Africa. It cannot be that no importance is attached to its commerce,—the statistics of England show that it is far from being unimportant, and who more than the enterprising American is capable of undertaking and valuing the mercantile interests of a country? We will not like many, attribute the indifference of the American Government to Liberia to the circumstance of its being a Government of colored people;—and that the prejudices of slave holding states in the Union, are so powerful, and so very decidedly opposed to any amicable relations with a people of the African race, that their Government will not risque its popularity in following in the steps of nations, as powerful in wealth and other resources as they are. We have nothing further to say on the topic. Every people, it is supposed, are competent to be the best judges of their own matters—this is admitted to be so at all events—and we do not intend to array ourself in opposition to a doctrine which every body seem to acknowledge and approve. We have merely hinted at what, in our opinion, seems to be reasonable, just and natural.

It is with pleasure that we inform our readers that the new compilation of the Laws of the Republic, have been issued from the press. Persons wishing copies can be supplied, by calling on the Treasurer and Sub-Treasurers of the Government.

Late intelligence have reached us from the Leeward Counties—there was nothing to disturb the peace and tranquility of the people. The immigrants landed at Grand Bassa, by the unfortunate ship 'Ralph Cross' are geting on in the fever as well as can be expected.

The next expedition for Liberia will sail from Baltimore and Norfolk, on about the first of November.

Martin Roberson Delany's Book.—On our first and second pages, our readers will find an interesting communication from Mr. Edward Blyden, noticing certain statements made in Mr. Delany's book, in reference to Liberia. We feel warranted in saying, that Mr Blyden deserves well of every Liberian, for the manly course he takes in the defence of his country, and the trouble he was at in procuring official evidence, to refute the slanderers vile aspersions. It seems to us strange, that among the colored people in the northern states, of the U. S. are to be found the most inveterate enemies of Liberia—it is rather difficult for us to understand why this is so, but that such is the case, no one who reads the different periodicals published by colored persons in the U. S. will deny. The people of Liberia are satisfied with their position—they elect their own officers, make their own laws, and have one of the fairest portions of the world for their inheritance. Mr. Delany, and all who feel and think like him in regard to Liberia, may for all we care, remain where they are to do the drudgery of the whites, or go to South and Central America, to be hewers of wood for those who will to a certainty, extend to them only such kind of treatment as they are now living under.

It is not believed by the people of Liberia, that Delany and others of his stamp, if they come to Liberia, would be of much benefit to the country. A class of people who are contented to remain in a country from year to year under such degrading circumstances as they are subject to, would scarcely be competent to form correct ideas of their duty as citizens of a free Government, in which every right social and political are granted them. How can such persons be esteemed among men who braved every danger to seek a home in their Fatherland. All the Liberians desire is, that Delany and his friends cease to utter such base falsehood's about Liberia as he publish'd to the world.

Religious.—On Saturday the 28th. ult'imo the Methodist Quarterly meeting commenced in this city and was continued till the 29 th. The meeting was well attended, and highly interesting.

There has been going on at the Virginia settlement, for a week past quite a revival among the Baptists—several we have been told, have turned from the error of their way

---

We are happy to see that nearly all our coasting vessels have left the river on their usual trading expeditions. For nearly three months, they have remained moored in the river. The weather has considerably moderated, and we hope to see cargoes of oil coming in every week. It is said that the coming season will be a very prolific one for oil.

In our second number for July last, we published the list of officers attached to the Germantown; and now we re-publish it by request, as there have been some changes made.

Oct. 4th, the U. S. Ship Germantown arrived here to day from St. Paul de Loando—glad to find that the Commodore has regained his usual health &c., subjoined is a list of her officers.

POETRY.

"DON'T FRET."

Has a neighbor injured you?
Don't fret—
You will yet come off the best;
He's the most to answer for,
Never mind it, let it rest;
Don't fret.

Has a horrid lie been told?
Don't fret;
It will run itself to death;
If you let it quite alone,
It will die for want of breath:
Don't fret.

Are your enemies at work?
Don't fret—
They can't injure you a whit;
If they find you heed them not,
They will soon be glad to quit:
Don't fret.

Is adversity your lot?
Don't fret—
Fortune's wheel keeps turning round,
Every spoke will reach the top,
Which, like you, is going down:
Don't fret.

INVOCATION.

[WRITTEN FOR THE OLIVE BRANCH, BY H. D. WHITE]

Oh, come to me, when on the tree,
The first sweet flowers are blushing;
When merry birds are on the wing,
Their hearts with music gushing;
When tufted wild-flowers gem the banks
Of our own Pleasant River,
And Love his brighter arrow draws
From well replenished quiver.

Oh, come to me, when all is bright,
When thy young heart is cheery,
And life unto thine eye presents
No cloud, no prospect dreary;
I'll wreathe a chaplet for thy brow
Of poesy's fadeless flowers,
And bind them with the sweetest rose
In Love's enchanted bowers.

So come to me, when on the tree
The first sweet flowers are blushing;
When merry birds are on the wing,
Their hearts with music gushing;
When Spring adorns the glossy banks
Of our own Pleasant river,
And love his brightest arrow draws,
From well replenished quiver.

A REVERIE ABOUT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

Dream of splendor, bright and gay,
Disenchanted all too soon,
Dimly fading fast away
Like a half remembered tune,—
Lo my spirit's harp is sad
For the end of earthly things
And refuses to be glad
While I touch these trembling strings.

Fountains, gushing silver light,
Sculptures, soft, and warm, and fair,
Gems that blind the dazzled sight,
Silken trophies, rich and rare,
Wondrous works of cunning skill,
Precious miracles of art,—
How your crowding memories fill,
Feverishly my musing heart!

Fairy giant! choicest birth,
Of the beautiful-sublime,
Seemingly like the toy of earth
Given for the do'ard Time,—
Glacier diamond, Alp of glass,
Sindbad's cave, Aladdin's hall,
Must it then be crushed, alas!
Must the Crystal Palace fall?

Yes! as autumn's chequered hues
Thus are tinted with decay,
As the morn's prismatic dews,
Glittering—exhale away,
So will thee; in beauty's pride,
All true brightness must depart,—
Nature's fair consumptive bride,
Fragile paragon of Art!
But—not all of thee shall die,

One mind shall perish thus!
Thy sweet spirit ever nigh,
Will remain to gladden us,—
Thy sweet spirit—Brotherhood!
This was in thee like a soul,
Every part to gild with good,
And to glorify the whole!

MARTIN F. TUPPER

ALBURY, GUILDFORD.

JACK OF ALL TRADES, OR THE MAN FOR A NEW SETTLEMENT.

Parson Truman was a modest, unassuming person, who disliked mere outside display. He was a plain, practical man, a profound logician and an earnest preacher. His knowledge was not bound by the limits of his library; his labors were not confined to the pulpit; his influence extended beyond the parish where he expounded the Scriptures. For he often had to serve as a lawyer, physician, teacher, priest, and confidential friend, in new settlements where professional gentlemen are few and far between. At the time of which I write, he lived in a log house. When at home he spent a part of his leisure time in cultivating a little patch of ground which belonged to the parsonage. Sometimes his farm, as he called it, would be overrun with weeds, for his circuit extended several miles and frequently kept him from home more than a week at a time.

One day he returned and saw the weeds standing among the vegetables, like Philistines among the Israelites, and he determined to uproot them and remove them from the land.

"Wife," said he, "I must go to work in the garden to-day. If any person calls to see me, tell them I am engaged. No person can see me while I am weeding behind that regiment of cornstalks."

He pulled off his best coat, which had been black, rolled up his sleeves, and commenced the task before him. Spear grass, pig-weeds, sour-plant, and the whole tribe of weeds had taken possession of the little strip of land, and looked down contemptuously upon the stunted plants below them.

It was washing day, and Mrs. Truman was hanging her clothes upon the linen line, when a sunbrowned woodman, with an honest face, inquired if brother Truman was at home.

"Yes, but he is engaged," replied the dear little woman, with a smile, for she could be good-natured even on Monday, while at work over the wash-tub. Think of that, ye Xantipas, who fret, pout, scold and thump away at such times and under such circumstances.

"If he is at home, I must see him in a few moments."

"He left positive orders with me to allow no one to disturb him."

"I won't detain him from his studies but a short time."

"He is at work in the garden—"

The man did not stop to hear the conclusion of what she said, but, unceremoniously walked through the gate way, and found the good man pulling up weeds as though they were unpardonable sins.

"Well, brother, I have found you at last. My horse is lame, and as you are something of a doctor, I thought I would ask your advice.'

"Is he unable to walk or work?" inquired the dominie.

"He limps about on three legs a little.—I wish you would step up to our place and see him."

"Well, I have agreed to marry a couple a short distance beyond your house, and I will call on my way to the wedding."

In order to make up lost time, the minister now worked harder than he did before he had been interrupted.

The first caller had not got out of sight, when a woman in dishabille, with her dishevilled hair streaming over her white face, came to the door, and asked if the Rev Mr. Truman was at home.

"He is at home, but his engagements are such that he cannot be interrupted just now," observed his wife.

"O dear me, what shall I do?" exclaimed the woman, wringing her hands, and weeping as though her sufferings were intense, and the minister was the only man who could relieve them.

"Wait a moment," said Mrs. Truman; "I will ask him if he can be seen."

"Husband!"

"Well, my dear what do you want now?"

"Here is a woman—"

"I cannot help it."

"Hear what I have to say. Here is a woman in great distress; she is anxious to see you immediately."

The parson threw down a handful of wicked weeds so suddenly, a stranger might have supposed he was angry; but he was only a little excited. Perhaps he thought the transgressors he was driving from his piece of land ought to be cast into outer darkness, where they would be burned.

"What do you want, my good woman?" he asked, somewhat impatiently.

"Oh, sir! we have had such a row in our settlement! Mrs. Jenkins' child threw a stone, which broke Mrs. Sparkins' window, and Mrs. Sparkins told the child to clear out; and when Mrs. Jenkins heard of it, she came to Mrs. Soarkins' house, and told her she was no better than she ought to be; and Mrs. Sparkins declared she was a liar; then Mrs. Jenkins said she was a liar; then Mrs. Sparkins spat in her face; and then Mrs. Jenkins pulled her hair; and then Mrs. Sparkins tore the dress of her back; and Mrs. Jenkins cried murdar, and I ran after you!"

"What were they doing when you came away?"

"Pulling hair, sir, and screaming murder!"

"What do you expect I do in such a case?"

"Why, preach to them, and bleed them, sir, and stop them from going to law," said the frightened woman," who evidently had more faith in the minister than she had in the gospel.

"How far is your settlement from where the wedding is to be this evening?"

"About a mile, sir."

"I will call about seven o'clock."

The good man returned to his garden, where he had made but little progress; but as soon as he had got hold of the enemy, a teamster climbed over the fence, and asked him if he would be so kind as to put his shoulder to the wheel, and give him a lift through a mud-hold, at the foot of the hill.

He could not put that off until he went to the wedding, so he went to work, and while they were jerking and pulling the load about, the wagon broke.

Mr. Truman had a box of tools and knew how to use them. The wagon was soon repaired, and the teamster went whistling and singing on his way, and the minister returned to his garden once more.

Just as he kneeled down before a bed of onions, as though he intended to copy the example of the Egyptians, and worship them, a loud rap was heard at the door. The minister could have wept without rubbing his eyes with the onions that stood unweeded there; but he resolved to be angry, and sin not.

The door was opened, and there stood the class-leader's son, anxious to see Mr. Truman.

Mr. Truman was called into the house.

"What do you want, my son?" inquired the minister.

"Father wants to borrow the Commentary on Luke, and the last newspaper."

"Wife, get them," said he; and then turning to the boy, he remarked, "The next time you want anything of that nature, ask Mrs. Truman, she can get the books for you as well as I can."

It was now twelve o'clock, so the minister thought it best to take a "bite" of victuals. He sat down with his wife and child to a "cracked up dinner." Before he rose from dinner an Irishman made his appearance, and modestly asked if the preacher lived there.

"Yes," was the answer.

"Will yer be so kind as to write a letter for me to the ould counthry?"

"By-and-by."

"May the blessed Virgin protect ye!"

"Take a chair."

"Will ye be afther doing it soon?"

"Right way after dinner."

The writing of the leetter occupied at least an hour, and before he concluded it, a pretty little boy came to the house and asked for that "shot" he (the preacher) had recommended to his sick mother.

"Powder, you mean," said Mr. Truman, with a smile.

"Yes, sir, I meant to say powder," replied the lad, blushing to his temples.

"Now, husband," said the good natured wife, "let me pursuade you no to go into the garden again this afternoon. Stay in the house and mend the children's shoes, so that they can go to school to morrow."

He finally made up his mind that it was better to sit there in the shade, than to stoop out doors in the sun; so the shoes were repaired and the weeds left undisturbed.

When the job was finished it was time to prepare for the wedding. After performing the duties of barber and boot-black, he turned hostler, and saddled his pony, departed in peace, and went on his way rejoicing. He halted at Blake's barn, and examined the "lame mare."

"She has a nail in her foot," said he; "hand me a pair of nippers, and I will remove the shoe. "Now," continued the preacher, while he stood there with the pinchers in one hand and the shoe in the other, "bathe the foot with salt and vinegar, keep her shut up in the stable, and she will be well in a fortnight."

After marrying the couple, he mounted his pony, turned his face toward the new settlement and put up at the house of a Christian brother. He gave directions for Mrs. Jenkins, Mrs. Sparkins and their friends to meet him there. The house was crowded with the parties and their acquaintances.

"Mrs. Jenkins, did your boy break Mrs. Sparkins window?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, Mrs. Jenkins, of course you are willing to pay for the window, are you not?"

"Certainly I am."

"Mrs. Sparkins did you spit in Mrs. Jenkins' face?"

"Yes; I did so when I was angry."

"You are sorry for it now, are you not?"

"Yes, sir, I am," she said and then rubbed her eyes with one corner of her apron.

"Do you hear that, Mrs. Jenkins?"

"I do."

"Will you forgive her?"

"With my heart."

"Now take hands. God bless you. Good night!"

Mr. Truman returned home another way, in order to seek the sick woman, and give further directions respecting the powders. He found the medicine curing the patient, and had the good fortune to meet the class leader there, who handed him the paper, and promised to return the Commentary in a few days.

When this useful, practical, accommodating man reached home he was quite fatigued, but happy to think the day had not been spent in vain. One reason why he was anxious to weed the garden was because there was to be a donation party at his house the next day, and he did not wish to have his premises look as though he was slothful and lazy. After a delicious sleep and pleasant dreams, the donation-day arrived. Parson Truman helped his wife to provide for a large number of guests. He made the fire, pared the potatoes, churned the butter, stirred the oven, sharpened the knives and forks, and made himself generally useful.

Soon after sunset, the members of different denominations began to arrive. Blake came with one horse hitched to a wagon; the mare that mated the noble animal he drove, was too large to travel yet. He came with him a new house, a quantity of wood, and three or four bushels of corn. The sick woman sent her boy with a new dress for Mrs. Truman. The class leader brought a side of bacon and a dollar in money. Mrs. Sparkins, Mrs. Jenkins, and the young widow Sprecher, came together and brought a beautiful quilt, the result of the united labors of the ladies of the sewing circle. The sewing was most neatly executed. It was originally designed for the missionaries in Liberia, but some one suggested that the climate of Africa was warm enough without quilts, so the sewing circle concluded to present it to Mrs. Truman. By-and-by the teamster came with a wagon-load of people from his settlement. They came quite a distance, and brought money. The united donations amounted to fifteen dollars. The Irishman was on hand. He said he had not much to give, but he would make himself useful by taking care of the horses of other visitors.

It was a pleasant evening; the moon sailed like a ship of light through the calm heavens. When tea was over, some of the company began to joke with the minister respecting the unweeded garden.

"Sure an we might weed the garden by moonlight," said Pat.

The company took the hint, and went to work most cheerfully. Many hands make light work. When the party separated the garden was in good trim, and every guest went home with a glad heart.

Two years Mr. Truman remained on that circuit, and at the expiration of that time his petition was sent to the Conference, praying that he might be removed; but it was contrary to the usages of that body to continue a minister more than two years at one time on the same circuit.

Joe Howell the teamster, and Mary Simpson, who ran after the minister with the umbrella, were united in the holy bonds of matrimony with each other, and the first time that they attended meeting was Mr. Truman preached in Sparkins' school house. Just before the good man, who was a universal favorite left that circuit, he married this couple. Mr. Truman got up into notice by degrees, and has now charge of one of the best stations in the jurisdiction of the Conference. He has not forgotten how to mend a pair of shoes, repair a broken wagon, dispense medicine to the sick, help his wife about the house, and act as a peace maker when the hasty in spirit are disposed to quarrel. He is just "the man for a new settlement," or any other situation.—Southern Baptist.

UNHAPPY MARRIAGES.

Dean Swift assigned as the reason why so few marriages were happy, that young ladies spent their time in early life in the formation of beautiful nets to catch husbands, instead of constructing cages to keep them after they were caught. Without supposing for a moment that there are but few happy marriages in the United States, whatever may have been the case in Great Britain at the time that the witty Dean flourished, we publish his remark for the benefit of any who may be in danger of falling into the fatal error. It may be found after a while, that those fashionable accomplishments which are acquired at an expense of so much time and money, are not so valuable as prudence, temperance, industry, self-denial, and other qualities that are most valuable in wives and mothers.—Southern Baptist.

LECTURE ON THE REPUBLIC OF LIBERIA.

On Monday evening last, a lecture was delivered at the Town hall, on the rise, progress and prospects of the Republic of Liberia, by the Rev. E. W. Stokes, a gentleman of colour. The lecture was advertised to commence at seven o'clock, but the doors, through some mismanagement, were not opened until past that hour. The result was that a large number of dirty boys and others, who could not be expected to take any interest in the proceedings, were attracted thither, either by the crowd or the novelty of hearing "a black minister preach," while many respectable and interested parties were either entirely excluded from the meeting for want of room, or compelled to stand in the passages.

The Rev. CANON WODEHOUSE, who officiated as chairman, said he had very great pleasure in introducing a gentleman, whom many of the audience had before seen and heard—the Rev. Mr. Stokes,. He had but lately come amongst them as a stranger, but (and to the credit of Lynn be it spoken) he was very much pleased with the courtesy and unvarying kindness he he had received from the inhabitants of the town. He (the rev. chairman) was glad of this, because Mr. Stokes was worthy of it. He should not make a long speech, but he felt called upon to tell the meeting the circumstances under which Mr. Stokes came amongst them. The audience would recollect that 60 or 70 years ago the United States of America were under the British Crown—part of the British dominions, and that at that time missionaries were supported there by a charitable institution in connection with the established Church of England. When the States, after several severe struggles, asserted their independence and became free, then the question arose "what shall be done with those missionaries whom we have been supporting there?" The result was that many of them who had warmly attached flocks, fond of the Liturgy of the Church of England, clung together, and after the elapse of a few years, sent over several chosen ministers to England to be consecrated bishops. There was some difficulty about the matter—one was consecrated in Scotland, and two others by special act of parliament, obtained for the purpose by the Archbishop of Canterbury. With these three bishops (the number required) the church in the United States had been flourishing ever since, and adding to their numbers every day. In the course of time, a number of persons thought fit to establish a free colony on the western coast of Africa, the nature of which required some explanation. They were aware of the fact which must be mentioned with great regret as a blot on the annals of a christian country that slavery was carried on in the United States of America. Yet they should not judge too harshly of them; it was only a very few years ago since England had the same foul blot upon her national character. It was found that in America the blacks who were free were placed in an uncomfortable position, neither being regarded by their countrymen nor respected by the citizens; and to supply this want—to find a home for coloured free men, the colony of Liberia was established in the year 1819. Four or five years ago this state pronounced herself free, and she was now an independent republic, with from 400 to 500 miles of sea coast. The Republic of Liberia was an important district in Africa, and would doubtless do much for the evangelization of that continent. As might be supposed, a young colony like this was not in a position to support and establish those institutions and buildings which every christian churchman must value. His friend Mr. Stokes having become acquainted with several British officers, to whom he stated the circumstances of the Episcopalian Churches of Liberia, was assured by them that if he proceeded to England and told his story, he would meet with sympathy and help there. He had found this assurance to be true, and in furtherance of his great object he appeared before that meeting. If the meeting heartily desired the extinction of that terrible, odious, unchristian and unmanly traffic—the slave trade—they could not do better than aid in establishing christian communities on the coast of Africa. Laws and cruizers were all weak when compared with those principles of christian truth which they desired to promulgate. If they desired the extinction of the slave-trade, support his friend on the left. If they would encourage the trade of England, and in Liberia cotton, coffee, tobacco and other commodities were grown, support his friend on the left. If they valued the protestant faith, and there never was a time when they were more called on to stick close to and defend their protestant principles than at the present, when on each side they were assailed by open enemies and insidious foes, support his friend on the left. If they esteemed the doctrines and discipline of the Church of England, support his friend on the left, that the gospel may be carried throughout the earth; and again he would say support his friend and suppport him with their donations. The rev. Canon then called on.

The Rev. E. W. Stokes, who, although he has a natural impediment in his speech, speaks the purest English with the greatest possible freedom, then came forward and addressed the meeting at considerable length, expressing with deep feeling his warm interest in the condition of bleeding Africa; the state of the heathen people; their natural aversion to civilization; the character and condition of the heathen on the coast of Africa, their mode of worship and peculiar faith; the establishment of the colony of Liberia; the settlers' struggles with the savage tribes in the interior, and losses from plague and their famine; triumphs, prosperity and subsequent declaration of independence; their present condition and future prospects, were the leading features of the address. The lecturer dwelt with evident ardour and heartfelt emotion on the bravery of those 150 men who, from a desire to be free, first embarked from America for the coast of Africa, their native soil, enduring hardships and peril, famine, disease, death and war in their apparently fruitless efforts. But with a trusting faith in God, with iron arms and hearts of steel, they pressed on in their noble career until the most unexampled success repaid them for their unwearied exertions. Thus they established a home for the free—a heritage for the children of slaves—a centre of civilization in benighted Africa, and a Zion in the midst of heathenism and idolatry from which should go forth the blessings of salvation. The declaration of the republic in 1847, and its acknowledgment by England and France, and the tacit admission of it by Brother Jonathan, who would say neither one way nor another, was treated by the rev. gentleman with a carefulness as to historic detail which was at once interesting and instructive. In speaking of the prospects of the republic, Mr. Stokes said—"We here see a nation growing up in the torrid zone, who are carrying on the work of God; and Africa shall yet be a blessing to the world There is a noble stock in the seed of Ham that will stand side by side with all the sons of men" (loud applause.)

The Rev. CANON, in concluding the meeting, said all of them who were called to be ministers in this country might with great profit endeavour to imitate the example of the rev gentleman who had just sat down. They would be truly happy if they had the same measure of love, faith, and fervour in the cause of Christ. He, as their chairman, would most heartily express their earnest prayer that God would pour down His blessing on the rev. gentleman and on his poor benighted countrymen, who were yet in the darkness of heathen superstition and error.

The Doxology having been sung and the Benediction pronounced, the meeting separated.

RETALIATION.

Some few years since, in the county of Penobscot, there lived a man by the name of H———, whose greatest pleasure was in tormenting others. His own family was generally the butt of his sport.

One cold and blustering night, he retired to bed at an early hour, his wife being absent at a neighbor's. Some time after, she returning, finding the door closed, demanded admittance.

"Who are you!" cried Mr. H———.

"You know who I am; let me in, it is very cold."

"Begone, you strolling vagabond; I want nothing of you here."

"But I must come in."

"What is your name?"

"You know my name—it is Mrs.

"Begone! Mrs. H——— is a very likely woman; she never keeps such late hours as this."

Mrs. H——— replied—"If you do not let me in I will drown myself in the well."

"Do if you please," he replied

She then took up a log and plunged it into the well, and returned to the side of the door.

Mr. H——— hearing the noise, rushed from the house, to save, as he supposed, his drowning wife. She at the same time, slipped in and closed the door after her.—Mr. H———, almost naked, in turn demanded admittance.

"Who are you?" she demanded.

"You know who I am—let me in, or I shall freeze"

"Begone, you thievish rogue! I want nothing of you here."

"But I must come in."

"What is your name?"

"You know my name—it is Mr. H———."

"Mr. H——— is a very likely man, he don't keep such late hours"

Suffice it to say, she, after keeping him in the cold until she was satisfied, opened the door and let him in.—Southern Baptist

THE COUNSEL OF WOMAN.

Dr. Boardman, in his admirable work, "Hints on Domestic Happiness," inculcates this doctrine, which we cordially endorse:—N. York Recorder.

"In a conversation I once held with an eminent minister of our church, he made this fine observation: 'We will say nothing of the manner in which that sex usually conduct an argument; but the intuitive judgments of women are often more to be relied upon than the conclusions which we reach by an elaborate process of reasoning.' No man that has an intelligent wife, or who is accustomed to the society of educated women, will dispute this.

"Times without number you must have known them decide questions on the instant, and with unerring accuracy, which you had been poring over for hours, perhaps, with no other result than to find yourself getting deeper and deeper into the tangled maze of doubts and difficulties. It were hardly generous to allege that they achieve these facts less by reasoning than by a sort of sagacity which approximates to the sure instinct of the animal races; and yet there seems to be some ground for the remark of a witty French writer, that, when a man has toiled step by step, up a flight of stairs, he will be sure to find a woman at the top, but she will not be able to tell how she got there.

"How she got there, however, is of little moment. If the conclusions a woman has reached are sound, that is all that concerns us. And that they are very apt to be sound on the practical matters of domestic and secular life, nothing but prejudice or self-conceit can prevent us from acknowledging. The inference, therefore, is unavoidable, that the man who thinks it beneath his dignity to take counsel with an intelligent wife, stands in his own light, and betrays that lack of judgment which he tacitly attributes to her."

UNITED STATES TREASURY.—The amount of public funds, in the Assistant Treasuries and other depositories subject to draft on the 21st of last month, was $15.576.593, of which amount $1.036.023, were in the custody of the Assistant Treasurer of Boston. $3.334.991 at New York, $1.138.421 at Philadelphia, and $5, 631,680 at the Philadelphia Mint

AMERICAN CLIPPERS AGAINST THE WORLD.—The American Navigation Club of our city have published a card in the London Times, challenging the ship-builders of Great Britain to a race from any port in England to China and back, on a stake of £10,000 a side. The whole sum is to be paid over to the winning party, without regard to accidents or to any exceptions; and in case of the non-appearance of either, it is to be forfeited to the other party. The judges are to be mutually chosen, and a reasonable time given to build the ships in case of an acceptance of the challenge.

This is what we call boarding the lion in his den, and it remains to be seen whether that venerable and respectable gentleman, John Bull, Esq., will accept the challenge of his audacious son. The wholesome astonishment inspired by the sailing feats of the yacht America in the British seas has not yet worn off; and determined as an Englishman is to win, when once engaged he endorses in cool blood the doctrine of that celebrated hero, Jack Falstaff that "discretion is the better part of valor." The American clipper ships, with their wings of wind, are keeping pace almost with the steam marine; and, with the aid afforded by scientific researches into the laws and directions of winds and currents, are performing sailing feats never dreamed of before.

An ocean steamer consumes from 800 to 1000 tons of coal in a single trip across the Atlantic; the clipper ship arrives only a few days later, with a thousand tons of merchandise instead of an empty hold, having invoked to her assistance the demon neither of steam or fire. The zephyrs and the aereoids, in the shape of winds and currents, bear her dancing over the ocean to the remotest climes.—Boston Journal.

THE STARS. The unusual spectacle is now presented of all the visible planets being above the horizon early in the night, and they are so distributed as to mark the line of the ecliptic, or the plane of their own and the earth's orbits, with distinctness. With Venus in the West, said to be more brilliant at present than at any time within the last ten years, and Jupiter with his usual splendor in the East, with the "lesser lights" Mars and Saturn between them, the arrangement of the planetary orbs affords an interesting view to all who took pleasure in such contemplations. Mars now appears much reduced in size and brilliancy, on account of the relative position of himself and the Earth in their respective orbits, but still retains his ruddy glow. The pale white light of Saturn makes him appear like a star of the second magnitude. These, with the fine constellations of the Scorpion, Lyra, and the Greater Bear, all visible at present, make the contemplation of the "starry heavens" interesting and instructive.—Richmond Inquirer.

MARKED FISH. The Scotch commissaries of fisheries have been adopting an ingenious device for learning the migrations of the salmon. They have marked a large number of fish hatched from the spawn deposited last year in the Tweed, by placing around them a belt or ring of India Rubber, numbered and dated. One of the fish was caught, two days after being turned out, and let go, a hundred miles from the mouth of the Tweed. All fishermen taking such marked fish are desired to take note of the weight, the place and date of capture, and various other particulars named in the directions. The idea is a novel and amusing one. It may lead to valuable scientific discovery. For our part, we should like to know what Master Fish thinks of his belt. He has no hands with which to take it off, and it is doubtful whether any of his companions will have the politeness to offer any assistance. They may look as keen at their little belted brother, and be shy of his society.

Clay Ashland,

September 10th, 1852.

Mr. Herald:—Allow me through the medium of your columns, to give publicity of the doings of our citizens in this settlement. The following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted, as the basis of our political principles in future. We fearlessly assert that by them, and them alone, will we be guided in voting, and therefore recommend them to the consideration of all our citizens throughout the Republic.

After due notice had been given, our citizens met in a town meeting, September 10th, 1852.

D. Simpson, Esq. was called to the Chair, and George M. Moore, elected Secretary.

On motion, Hon. D. T. Harris, stated briefly the object of the meeting, and proposed for the consideration of the meeting, the following preamble and resolutions.

Whereas the political state of the country demands of the independent citizens throughout the Republic, patriotic concert, and wise and prudent principles, measures and actions, for the assurement of the safety of the state;—and whereas in order to attain such an important and desirable end, it is indispensible that a wise and patriotic standard bearer of independent republican principles chosen, and a better plan to make such a choice, commends itself to the consideration in the appointment of delegates, by an equal ratio of representation, throughout the Republic, to meet in convention at Monrovia, on the last Monday in December next; then and there to make a national ticket of the most available men for the Presidency, and Vice Presidency. Therefore,

Resolved,—By this meeting of independent citizens, of the settlement of Clay Ashland, met in mass meeting in Clay Ashland, on this 10th day of September, 1852, that we do hereby fall in with the proposition to hold a convention as above, for the above named purpose; and we do recommend the appointment of delegates thereto, by the different counties and settlements, in this Republic, in a ratio of one delegate to every ten voters; and we do hereby make such an appointment on the said basis.

Resolved,—That we do recommend the following, as being the principles of the independent citizens throughout this Republic.

1st. Internal improvement upon the general system.

2nd. National protection to agriculture and the mechanic arts.

3rd. The promotion of education and national industy.

4th. Encouragement to domestic manufactures.

5th. Indemnification from the native African tribes, for the expense the government is subjected to, from time to time, in settling difficulties among them.

6th. Sedulous protection to our domestic and foreign commerce.

7th. Strict construction of our constitution in all its parts.

Resolved,—That it is not advisable to allow a general system of balloting at present, in Liberia among the native Africans.

The preamble and resolutions were adopted with some slight amendments.—Quite a number of speeches were made on the occasion by gentlemen present; when on motion a committee was appointed to nominate delegates for the proposed convention.

The Committee after a short absence, returned, and reported Messrs H. W. Erskine, A. B. Hooper, R. Mc Murtry, and James Capps, as the gentlemen nominated for the convention, who were unanimously elected. Also a corresponding vigilance committee was appointed, consisting of Messrs Alx. Matthews Heary Clack, and George M. Moore.

Resolved—That the proceedings of this meeting be published in the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Herald:—Believing that you feel an interest in every good institution of the day, and especially the cause of evangelical religion; we have taken this opportunity of sending you, for publication a brief sketch of the organization of the first Independent Congregationalist Church in this place. We deem it a waste of time to enter into all the details that gave rise to this organization. Suffer us, however, to say to you that it is not the startling impulse of a day, nor of a year; for previous to our coming to this country, we imbided this form of church government, but not finding a church here of the same form of government, we as a matter of course, united ourselves to the one that became the nearest, until we could do better;—finally brother H. B. Stuart having called up on the brethren that thought as he did, and having obtained their consent to unite in church fellowship, to enjoy the ordinances of God as we were taught. On Sunday September, the 19th, 1852. Divine service was held at the house of brother H. B. Stuart, and a sermon was preached by him to a very respectable audience, from Math: 18th Chap: & 20th vers, "For where two or three are gathered together, there am I in the midst of them &c"

At the close of the services it was recommended that next Lord's day, be observed by us as a day of fasting and prayer to God, for a blessing upon our undertaking, and that a sermon be preached by brother H. B. Stuart, on the government of the church. Through the politeness of a friend who freely tendered to us a house of his own, unoccupied, accordingly on Sunday the 26th ult: divine services was there held, and a sermon was preached from Isaiah 41, chap. 10 verse, to a large and attentive audience. At the close of the sermon we covenanted with each other in the presence of Almighty God, to obey Him in all of his ordinances as he has made them known to us, and will further make known to us. Brother Henry B. Stuart, was chosen to be our Spiritual Teacher, and brother David J. Hazzard, was appointed Deacon, and brother Jacob M. Snow, Clerk. The following names constitute the above church.

Henry B. Stuart.
David J. Hazzard.
Jacob M. Snow.
Ann Snow.
Rebecca C. Stuart.
Margaret Stuart.
Sarah A. Stuart.

And here we conclude by returning our thanks to our friends and fellow citizens, for the very friendly feelings they have manifested towards us, in assisting us in fitting up the house with comfortable seats, for we were not able of ourselves. Also we take great pleasure ourselves in returning our thanks to the members of the Baptist and Methodist Churches in this place, for their friendly visits with us. By request the following named gentlemen submit their names to be placed here as well-wishers to the institution.

Pursuant to notice, a public meeting was held at the Court House on Wednesday evening the 28th. Sept: 1852. for the purpose of electing delegates to the national convention, to be held at Monrovia on the fourth Monday in December next.

On motion of J. B. Philips Esqr. that the Hon: E. J. Roye take the Chair; carried.

Motion that J. L. Baxter act as Secretary for the evening: carried.

The Hon: gentleman on taking the Chair, acknowledged the compliments, and in an able speech introduced the following Resolutions.

Resolved—That the object of this meeting is to chose its part of the delegates to assemble in the national convention to be holden here the last Monday in December, 1852, for the purpose of nominating candidates for the Presidency and Vice Presidency, at the ensuing biennial election in May. As it is a very general understanding of the people, throughout the Republic, irrespective of party, to change the administration at that time the Constitutional Republican party, of which this meeting is a part, desire through delegation to look up another set of men. Who are both honest and capable.—Who will regard the letter and spirit of the constitution as the rule of their official conduct, & as standing above every man, without exception, which constitution is the basis upon which the laws are to be modeled.—Who will regard the interest of the whole people and county, by the enactment of good and practicallaws, the publishing them & maintaining their supremacy to the letter of their intention. To explore and open roads into the interior, and to do such other improvements as the wisdom of the Legislature may suggest, if there be, after the regular appropriations, unappropriated funds in the Treasury.

In a word, to make the people prosperous, and the nation happy and respected both at home and a broad. If such things be in the province or power of the Chief Executive, his cabinet, and the Legislature. The delegates whom we the people chose this evening, are expected to look up and sustain such men, (of the above named principles who enjoy a reputation as such throughout the Republic) in the national convention. If such men should be there nominated. We here, as such a party avow ourselves undivided and unanimous in the support of the nominees to the Presidency.

J. B. Phillips Esqr. addressed the meeting in reference to the necessity of the adoption of the resolutions briefly sketched, some of the paramount questions at issue in the anticipated political contest. He says I stand now where I stood in the struggle of Fifty One, opposed to the re-election of the present incumbent, and am for a change, the resolution was adopted—great enthusiasm.

On motion of B. Lewis that the Chair appoint a committee of three to nominate fifteen delegates, the motion was adopted and the Chairman appointed the following named gentlemen J. B. Philips Esqr. B. Lewis Esqr. Mr; John Foursyth.

On motion that the meeting adjourn until the committee shall have made up their report, at which time due notice will be given by the committee: carried; and the meeting adjourned until the aforesaid time.

Mr. Herald:—I am happy to inform you, that our Steam Mill is in successful operation; all difficulties have been surmounted. At the commencement of our operations, we employed a Goldman; but we discovered in the sequel, that all that glitters are not gold;" this induced us to make trial of better metal having a rough customer about the "diggins," named Lewis Rough, he was called in, and we found him "Rough & Ready;" in a few days an entire revolution was effected, steam put on, and she worked admirably. Our friends throughout the Republic, will, we hope, give us every encouragement, the Steam Company, will make every effort to keep on hand a good supply of lumber of the best kind within its reach.

A few days ago, being on a visit to Farmersville, I was agreeably surprised to find two looms at work, on opposite farms, one by Mrs. Jessie Ramsy from Georgia, the other by Mrs. Leadom Evans, from South Carolina,—this will operate as an encouragement to cultivate cotton, it has already created a demand for the article.

The Steam Mill at Bassa will soon be in operation; we rejoice at it; we go for the whole Republic of Liberia.

Yours truly

Mr. Herald,—In the latter part of September, there was a meeting held in the Court House for the purpose of electing delegates to the general convention to be held in December, and inasmuch as there was not a sufficient notice given, in order that the body of citizens might have knowledge of the fact. It is therefore due the public to state, that there were not at that meeting more than one dozen individuals, and some of them not citizens—therefore it may be considered as only a counterfiet.

CHRISTIAN PRINCIPLES.

Approach not the altar
With gloom in thy soul;
Nor let thy feet falter
From terrors control.

God loves not the sadness,
Of fear and mistrust;
Oh! serve him with gladness,
The gentle, the just.

His bounty is tender,
His being is love;
His smile fills with splendor,
The blue arch above.

Confiding, beleiving;
Oh! enter always,
His courts with thanksgiving,
His portals with praise

Nor come to the Temple,
With pride in thy mein;
But lowly, and simple,
In courage severe

Bring meekly before him
The faith of a child;
Bow down and adore him,
With heart undefiled.

And by the still waters
And through the green shade,
With Zion's glad daughters,
Thy path shall be made.

Greenville Sinoe, October 9th, 1852.

Mr. Herald.—Dear Sir, please to give a place in your columns for a few remarks.

We feel it our duty to say something about this part of our beloved country, as it is the first time that we have had the privlege of being here, and we must say that we have been agreeably disappointed. The location is a beautiful one, not to be surpassed by any that we have seen. We have visited all the settlements in the country, and have been much pleased with all that we have seen. The people are also very kind; we have received the kind attention from all classes of this community; [illegible] might be said in favour of Sinoe, but we have not time now. Our Churches in this county are exerting great and glorious influences. We have been very successful in building [illegible] the church in Greenville was dedicated on the 18th. of April; this church is 36 feet long, and 26 feet wide, and is well [illegible] the seats were all made by the members, as was much of the other work. A church has been put up in Reedsville, 28 feet by 18; this was made by the people, and is a very good house for the kind; it is closed in with mats and covered with thatch; it was dedicated on the 16th of August, at which time our meeting was a glorious one. A new church also has been put up at Louisana; this is a very good building; it was dedicated on the 25th Sept. At the assistance that this church had [illegible] $150 besides the peoples' labours; it being our third quarterly meeting, we enjoyed a great time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. Several persons were added to the church. The house is 36 feet long and 20 feet wide, and is the best church now in this county, and the building of it has cost less than any house of the same size. For the cheapness of the workmanship, we are indebted to the Rev. E. D. Taylor, who is preacher in charge, & who done the largest portion of the work. We are also indebted to the administrators of the estate of the late Rev. Plato Hunt;—Doctor James Brown, & D. C. McFarland, who managed the affairs greatly to the benefit of the church. Brother Hunt lent all that he had after paying off his debts towards building of a church in that place; the people of themselves have done the balance. And we are now making an effort at Lexington, and our work has begun there, we have already got the frame, and the lot cleaned off; the house is to be 30 feet long and 20 feet wide, we are doing what we can. Here we wan help; but however we shall try to get the frame up before Conference. And there is still another settlement in which we must have a church and we shall try to get a lot for to build on, before the conference, this settlement is called Farmsersville,it is now settled about three miles distance. And besides the five above mentioned stations there are four prominent places amongst the natives making nine stations in all, at which we can, and ought to have regular preaching now, if we had a sufficient number of ministers for the work. The school in Greenville taught by Mr. Mc Farland is in a prosperous condition, now numbers forty, but we are sorry to say that they have no writing desks and labour under a great disadvantage for the want of them; schools much wanting on other stations.

We have the honor to remain yours &c.

B. R. WILSON,
E. D. TAYLOR.

Greenville, Sinoe, Oct. 12th, 1852.

Mr Herald

You will in all probability be struck with surprise, to be interrogated by one from this county, merely from the fact, that we are told that the people of Monrovia, have the same notions of us which the people in eastern, cities had towards the people of the western cities; it is said in some place that the people from the eastern cities, who visit Washington while Congres is in Session, are astonished beyond measure when they see the western members on the floor, that he should know how to stand gracefully and make gestures, and speak the King's English, and preserve a connected train of thoughts and reasoning, & talk away like a Philadelphia lawyer, is a matter of infinite wonderment —Now, Mr Herald, it is true that we cannot stand as graceful as the gentry of Monrovia, nor make gestures, nor speak the kings english so well, yet Mr. Herald, as we form a part of this Republic, we ought to be heard on any honorable point. The questions are these; First dont you think the convention which is talked of for nominating our President a good plan, and as we have two parties already established in this county, ought we not have two one for each party; secondly would it not be best for this convention to meet while the Legislature is in Session, that the men could come home with the members of congress; thirdly in casting our ratio might we not do it in this way instead of saying one for every 10 say one for every 40 men Fourth we wish to know whether a man who has drawn land may not have the privilege to vote whether he has a deed or not—Now Mr. Editor as we know you are always a good man & as you are always willing to instruct the ignorant we shall expect to be benefitted by making these enquiries and as I am only a beginner you will make all necessary allowance for a scholar.

A New Correspondent.

NEW DISCOVERY.—An amateur chemist of Nottingham, (England) while engaged recently in testing the Chevalier Claussen's chemical process of making cotton, not having any flax straw at hand, tried it upon oat straw. To his astonishment, after the silica and gums, which enter into the composition of oat straw in greater proportions than in flax had been dissolved, he obtained a large quantity of good cotton. The opinion he formed from this and subsequent experiments is, that common straws of the country may be profitably converted into cotton, thereby adding to the certainty and abundance of our future supplies.—The Philadelphia Freeman.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, OCTOBER 30th, 1852.

"Who is to be the next President?"—This is the question of the day and no one is wise enough to give an answer, that will be satisfactory to all. We hear the names of some half a dozen frequently spoken of, in connection with the Presidency, but we believe the people are undecided as to the persons they will select as candidates. It is proposed that the selection of candidates be left to the discussion of the convention, which is intended to be go up. We can have no especial objection to such a course, but as far as we are informed, the citizens in the lower counties have not held meetings to consider the subject, nor has the first step been taken to elect delegates to meet in convention There appears to be an entire absence of unanimity among the people.

We have seen a letter from a gentleman residing in one of the lower counties, and in connection with this subject, he says; "Our people will not consent to send delegates to the convention, if they are to be elected in number, according to the ratio of inhabitants;"—or in other words, the sentiments here, are, "either allow an equal number from each county, or let the members of the Legislature make the nomination in December next." How will the advocates for a general convention, act under these circumstances? Their first duty is, to have a proper understanding with the people in other parts of Liberia, unless they do this, they will effect nothing.

President Roberts.—It will be gratifying to our readers to know, that letters have been received from President Roberts, dated London, August 2nd: and that he was enjoying tolerable health. The President will return as soon as the business which carried him to England, is finished—he represents the English Government as still being favorably disposed to Liberia, tho.' many vile attempts have been made to injure her, with the Government and people of England.

Our latest dates represent the state of affairs in the lower counties, to be highly favorable. The health of the immigrants landed at Grand Bassa, from the "Morgan Dix," is as good as can be expected—and they are satisfied with their condition.

"Fish Town in "Buchanan" Grand Bassa, settled.—We rejoice to have it in our power to chronicle the fact, of Fish Town being now settled by our people, and under circumstances that will prevent any interference by Grando, or any of his party. The Honorable S. A. Benson, with 20 old settlers, and more than 20 immigrants, are now in quiet possession of the place, and are rapidly pushing on their opeartions for permanently residing there. Mr Benson will remain with the settlement, until all the company are comfortably housed –a part from the 40 permanent settlers, there are ten or twelve others who will reside in the settlement some weeks.

Augustus Wm. Hanson.—This man held the office of British Consul in Liberia, but was dismissed by his Government, tho.' he invented all kinds of falsehoods, to hide his mean and unofficer-like conduct while residing here in charge of the Consulate. This is not the first time that he has been turned out of government employ. Those of our readers who know that he held an office at Cape Coast, will remember that he left there under very unfavorable and unpleasant circumstances. Among the many false and malicious charges made by him to his Government, and to the friends of Liberia in England, against this government and people, are these.—"That he had been persecuted for his zeal and vigilance in looking after British interests, which were not respected in Liberia"—"that he was compelled to leave Liberia, from fear of being assassinated!!"—"that there is no commercial faith in Liberia"—"the natives have been cheated out of their territories"—"the slave trade is still being carried on within the claimed jurisdiction of the Republic"—"that the aboriginal inhabitants are cruelly treated, and not protected by the Liberian authorities, from impositions practised by Americans"—"the people are immoral &c., &c." We have nothing to say to these charges.—Hanson himself knows them to be false.

Quite Patriotic.—A day or two previous to the volunteers leaving for Fish Town, they went over to Edina, in a body to receive a handsome Flag presented to them by the Ladies of the "Edina Female Literary Institute." On the presentation of the Flag, a neat and appropriate address was made by the Agent of the Institute, and which was gallantly responded to by our friend James S. Smith M. D. We would like to know the name of the Agent. The occasion was a happy one, and it is represented as having a tendency to do much good.

A. T. Wood.—This wholesale imposter is still permitted to carry on his impositions in England. He was in Dublin in July last, and we have before us a printed address of his, in which he styles himself a missionary Pastor in Liberia, and solicits money to complete a church in this city. In the address he says, that he has resided in Liberia ten years. He has collected several sums of money in the name of the church, but not a farthing of it, ever found its way here. Wood is a rank imposter, and we sincerely hope His Excellency President Roberts, may find time to have him prosecuted for the many forgeries he has practised, and for collecting money under false pretences. The man never lived in Liberia one year in all his life.

In our last issue, we noticed, that Momorah, the favorite son of the late King Boatswain, of Bo Poro, intended to visit this city. We did not then know his object. On the 10th, he came with a large suite, and on the following day, he was received by Vice President Williams, to whom he gave assurances of the kindly feelings entertained by himself, the chiefs and people of his country, for the Government and people of Liberia; and that one of his objects in visiting Monrovia, was to arrange with the Government, some plan to increase our trade with the people of Bo Poro, and to open a direct communication with the people of the far interior. He also expressed much regret at the condition of affairs at Cape Mount. Dwar loo Beh and Boomba, the contending Chieftains, are his relatives, and he said he knew, that they had entered into stipulations with the Government of Liberia, in which they faithfully promised to refrain from war, and to restore peace to the country. That promise, he said, had been broken, but he was not prepared to say which of the parties had first violated it. He had understood that the Government intended to send an armed force to quell the disorders, and that he was anxious to propose to the Government, to let him try to reconcile the belligerents.—"they were his relations, and he believed that he could influence them to cease fighting, and restore peace to the country—and at the same time, he would consider himself as acting under the immediate direction of the Government." Those who know any thing of the early history of Liberia, may remember that the Father of this Prince, stood by and defended the colony when it was first assailed by the natives—our people were then too few in number to resist successfully the frequent attacks of the natives against the infant colony, and had it not been for the timely interference of King Boatswain, the colony would have been destroyed To the day of his death, King Boatswain proved to be a sincere friend. The recollection of these facts, induced the Government to listen somewhat favorably to the propositions of Momorah. Under certain restrictions, he is authorized to hold a conference with Dwar loo Beh and Boomba, and the other Chieftains, who are implicated in the war, and that the Government are to be kept regularly advised of every subject which may be introduced by either party, during the conference.

The French Treaty.—Commodore Bandin, Commanding the French Naval forces, on the west coast of Africa, is daily expected here, with the ratification on the part of his Government, of the Treaty of Amity and Commerce, made with this Government.

Civil War.—King Joe West, of New Sesters, and Jim Flor, a Chieftain of Trade Town, have entered into a compact, to prevent King Boyer of Trade Town from further disturbing the quietness of the country, by wars. Several of Boyer's principal headmen have left him, and gone over to Jim Flor. The first step that Boyer takes to disturb any of the Liberian settlers, will be the signal to Joe West, Jim. Flor and other Chieftains, to fall on him at once with all their forces and destroy him. They say, they will force Boyer into pacific measures—that they have already too long, permitted him to have his own way. They are right.

The Rev. Eli Jones' and Lady, of the Society of Friends, and whom we had the pleasure of seeing in Liberia last year, were, at our latest dates in England. They did not fail, when called upon, by the friends of Liberia, in reference to the base assertions of Hanson, to tell all they saw and heard while here. They pronounced the asperser's statements to be false, and every honest person, who knows any thing about Liberia will agree with them. In behalf of the people of Liberia, we thank these two kind friends, for their testimony in our defence. The people of Liberia will never forget the pleasant and christian enjoyment they received from these friends while they sojourned a among them.

On our second page will be found the proceedings of a mass meeting held at Clay Ashland on the 10th of September last.

The address delivered in Grand Bassa, by James S. Smith M. D on the 5th Anniversary of the Independence of the Republic will appear in our next number.

Big Snake. A few days ago, a number of Congoes were out hunting, when one of them accidentally came near a large snake, (he was not of the species of the Boar Constrictor) which bit him severely in the hand—the hunter immediately shot the snake, and the report of his gun bringing his comrades to the spot, a regular battle ensued. The snake did not attempt to run off, but stood battle, and it was not until he had received the contents of eleven muskets, that he surrendered up his life. The poor fellow who was bitten is suffering severely, we hope he will soon be about. The snake was 15 feet long, and his body was in size about that of an ordinary size man.

POETRY.

YOUTH AND AGE.

The happiest youth,—viewing his progress through,
What cares to come, what crosses to ensue.—
Would shut the book, and sit him down and die."
[Shakspeare.

Oh, Youth! oh, gentle, joyous youth,
How bright thy careless hours,
When round our path Hope scatters first,
Her sweetly blooming flowers;
How warm the heart, how bright the eye,
No cares our friendship's dim,
And as for time, he steps so light,
We never think of him.

In age, the lip no longer wears
The smiles that boyhood knew;
Our very hopes seem colder then,
The world diff'rent hue;—
Our golden dreams that were so bright,
(Ah, me, too bright to last.)
Lie cold and dark in mem'ry's tomb,
Dim shadows of the Past.

Ah, standing at youth's bright portal,
Could we our pathways mark,
See all the cares that lie within,
The closed future dark,—
Ah, youth would seem less brighter then,
And fewer joys' would give,
For Hope would then withdraw her smile,
And who would wish to live?

Could we but know that Friendship's chain,
Link by link, would sever,
That all our hopes, which seem so bright,
Would fade away forever;—
Ah, who could wish that youth were past,
That manhood's joys were theirs:
And sigh to give an hour of love,
To win an age of cares.
Youth is the hour to dream and hope,
Manhood to do, and dare;

The griefs which float across the one,
Leave no impress there—
But on the other—ah, a line
Drawn by the hand of care,
Usurps the place of joy, and love,
And leaves but dark despair.

EXECUTION IN CANTON.

THIRTY-THREE PERSONS EXECUTED IN THE SPACE OF THREE MINUTES.

At a recent meeting of the Asiatic Society, in London, the secretary read a paper of great interest, by Mr. T. T. Meadows, translator to Her Britannic Majesty's Consulate in China, descriptive of the execution of 34 pirates or bandatts, which took place on the 30th July last. After a description of the place of execution, which was secured by a strongly guarded door, and after stating that more than 400 human Beings have been put to death in the same place within the past eight months, Mr. Meadows states that he entered the place accompanied by two English residents at Canton, and found there a few of the lower officials. The only preparation visible was a cross, fixed up for the infliction of the highest legal punishment practiced in China—cutting up alive. There was a fire of fragrant sandal wood burning before the shed where the Mandarins sat to superintend the executions, in order to conceal the horrid stench arising from the decomposing heads remaining there. After waiting a considerable time all the criminals were introduced, most of them walking to their places, but many carried in baskets, and tumbled out on the spot appointed for them, where they lay powerless, either from the excess of fear or from treatment inflicted during the trial and imprisonment. A man stood behind each criminal, and placed them in a kneeling position by grasping his hands which were bound behind his back. In case of resistance, which happens very rarely, the criminal's queue is held by a second assistant, and dragged forward by force, so as to keep the neck extended. When all the criminals were placed in the required positions, the executioner seized a sabre with both hands and proceeded to his work. In the present instance the man was a mild-looking soldier, selected from the ranks of the army. The sword was a common sabre of three feet in length, and one of those employed on the present occasion was laid on the Society's table. It appears that there is no official weapon required, for the officers of the army, anxious to 'flesh their swords,' send them for the purpose to the executioner, who has thus a sufficient supply for his most extensive operations. The number decapitated on the occasion described was 33; and the executioner took up a fresh sword as soon as he felt the edge of one employed becoming dull, which was usually the case after cutting off two or three heads. When all was ready, the man stood firm, with his legs somewhat apart. On hearing the word 'Pan' pronounced by the officer superintending, and after a sharp order don't move!" he raised his sword straight up, and brought it rapidly down with the full strength of both arms, giving additional force to the blow by dropping his body perpendicularly to a sitting posture. The horrid task was soon done; after cutting off the head of one of the victims, the man threw himself, by a bound, into position by the side of the next; and in somewhat less than three minutes, the whole 33 were headless—the head in every case but the first being completely severed at one blow. In three or four cases, where the criminals retained their full strength, the bodies, after decapitation, rose quite upright, and Mr. Meadows is satisfied that unless restrained by the man behind they would have sprung into the air. When this part of the tragedy was over, the more horrible work of slow death was carried into effect upon the remaining criminal, who was bound to the cross mentioned above. He was a strongly built man, apparently 40 years old, who had escaped in the first instance, but who had voluntarily surrendered himself to certain death in order to save from torture his wife and family, who had been seized by the Chinese government, with the cruel policy usual on such occasions. In this instance the flesh was cut from the forehead, breast, and extremities of the sufferer, with a sharp knife, which was on the table before the meeting, the body was immediately taken from the cross, and the head cut off. The duration of the punishment was about four or five minutes. The bodies were then packed up in coffins and carried away.

AFRICAN COLONIZATION.—Mr. Stanly, member of Congress from North Carolina, is preparing a bill, as the public journals state, to restore to the States the fourth and last instalment due to them from the General Government by virtue of the distribution act of Congress in 1830. The last instalment, it will be remembered, was retained in the Treasury to meet the urgent and immediate wants of the Government. Mr. Stanly's bill proposes that certificates of United States five per cent. stock to the amount of this fourth instalment—some nine millions of dollars—shall be issued to the several States, as they shall be respectively entitled, upon the express condition that each State shall appropriate the interest thereof, amounting in the aggregate to over four hundred and fifty thousand dollars annually, to the transportation of free negroes within the State to Liberia, or to the education and improvement of the Liberian colonists. The principal is never to be touched without further Congressional legislation, and the certificates are not to be issued to any State until the legislative authorities thereof consent to receive the same upon the conditions above specified. If there should be, in any State no free negroes for transportation to Liberia, then the interest money is to be appropriated in establishing schools and colleges and in improving the moral, social and religious condition of the citizens of the Liberian Republic.

This, it will be admitted on all hands, is a most important measure. We are glad to learn that the friends of the bill have great confidence in its passage.

THE SECRET.—"I noticed," said Franklin, "a mechanic among a number of others, at work on a house erected, but a little way from my office, who always appeared to be in a merry humor, who had a kind word and a cheerful smile for every one he met. Let the day be ever so cold, gloomy, or sunless, a happy smile danced like a sunbeam on his cheerful countenance. Meeting him one morning, I asked him to tell me the secret of his constant happy flow of spirits."

"No secret, Doctor," he replied, "I have got one of the best of wives, and when I go to work, she always has a kind word of encouragement for me, and when I go home she meets me with a smile and a kiss, and then she is sure to be ready, and she has done so many little things through the day to please me, that I cannot find it in my heart to speak an unkind word to anybody."

What an influence, then, hath woman over the heart of man, to soften it, and make it the fountain of cheerful and pure emotions. Speak gently, then, a happy smile and a kind word of greeting, after the toils of the day are over, costs nothing, and go far toward making a home happy and peaceful.

A STORY OF AN OLD BACHELOR.

There was a fine old General once, who, having spent most of his life in the field of Mars knew very little about the camp of Cupid. He was one of those rough and honest spirits often met with in his gallant profession—innocent as an infant of almost everything, save high integrity and indomitable bravery. He was nearly fifty years old, and his toils were over, when Master Dan Cupid brought him acquainted with a widow Wadman, in whose eye he began to detect something that made him uneasy. Here was the result of leisure.

During his service he had never seen anything worthy of notice in a woman's eye. In fact, he would scarcely have observed whether a woman had three eyes in her head, or only one; for, no matter where his own eyes were, his thoughts were ever among guns, and drums and wounds, and love was a thing that lived in his memory just as he remembered once reading a visionary story book, called the 'Arabian Nights' Entertainment,' when a boy.

Well, the General had settled down into an amiable, gentlemanly old fellow, living alone with comfortable wealth around him, and having little to do, save now and then to entertain an old comrade in arms, which companionship afforded opportunity for him to 'fight his battles o'er again.' But alas! o'er this calm evening of the old General's day, a deal of perplexity was doomed to fall, and he soon found himself in troubled waters, the depths of which he could by no means understand. He floundered about like a cage rat under a pump—and such another melancholy fish out of water never before swallowed the bait, hook and all, of the angling god of Love. The poor General! We must give him a name, or we can't tell the story, and the best name for such a story is Uncle Toby. Poor General Uncle Toby debated abstractedly about his new position, and never had siege or campaign given him such perplexity before.

At length, however, the blunt honesty of his disposition rose uppermost among his conflicting plans, and his cause was chosen. At school he had once studied 'Othello's Defence,' to recite at an exhibition, but made a great failure; and he now recollected there was something in this 'Defence' very much like what he wanted to say. He got the book immediately, found the passage, clapped on his hat with a determined air and posted off to the widow Wadman's, with Shakspere under his arm.

'Madame,' said General Uncle Toby, opening his book at the marked place, with the solemnity of a special pleader at the bar—'Madame—

'Rude am I in my speech,
And little blessed with the set phrase of peace;
For since these arms of mine had seventh years' pith,
Till now some nine moons wasted, they have used
Their dearest action in the tented field
And little of this great world can I speak
More than pertains to feats of broil and battle;
And therefore—,

Here the General closed the book, wiped his forehead, looked up at the ceiling, and said, with a spasmodic gasp,

'I want to get married!'

The widow laughed ten minutes by the watch, before she could utter a syllable, and then she said, with precious tears of humor rolling down her good-natured cheeks.

'And who is it you want to marry General?'

'You,' said Uncle Toby, flourishing his sword arm in the air, and assuming a military attitude of defiance, as if he expected as assault from the widow immediately.

'Will you kill me if I marry you?' said the widow with a merry twinkle in her eye.

'No, madame,' replied Uncle Toby, in a most serious and deprecating tone, as if to assure her that such an idea had never entered his head.

'Well, then I guess I'll marry you,' said the widow.

'Thank you, ma'am,' said Uncle Toby; 'but one thing I am bound to tell you of, madame; I wear a wig!'

The widow started, remained silent a moment, and then went into a longer and merrier laugh than she had indulged in before, at the end of which she drew her seat near to the General, gravely laid her hand on his head, gently lifted his wig off, and placed it on the table.

General Uncle Toby had never known fear in hot battle, but now he felt a most decisive inclination to run away. The widow laughed again as though she never would stop, and the General was about to lay his hat upon his denuded head and bolt, when the facetious lady placed her hand upon his arm, and detained him. She then deliberately raised her other hand to her own head, with a sort of military precision, executed a rapid manœuvre with her five fingers, pulled off her whole head of fine glossy hair, and, placing it upon the table by the side of the General, remained seated with ludicrous gravity, in front of her astonished lover, quite bald!

As may be expected Uncle Toby now laughed along with the widow, and they grew so merry over the affair that the maid servant peeped through the keyhole at the noise, and saw the old couple dancing a jig, and bobbing their bald pates at each other like a pair of Chinese Mandrines. So the two very shortly were made one.

The Northwest Passage.

The problem of a northwest passage seems to have been first propounded in the 9th century. From that period, up to 1553, various voyages had been undertaken for the purpose of solving the question; and in that year Sir Hugh Willoughby sailed from England, and is said to have discovered Nova Zemble. But on his return he was frozen to death in Lapland, and all his men. Between 1555 and 1557 several other voyages were made for the same purpose, but no advance was made towards the discovery of a passage. In 1578, two brothers of the name of Frobisher, sailed on the same 'Tom fool errand; but they never returned, nor is their fate conjecture respecting their fate. From that period, up to 1719, many other unsuccessful attempts were made, and in the intervening period between that year and 1722, voyages are recorded to have been made by Knight, Barlow, Vaughan, and Scroggs, but no account of them was ever received. John Monk also sailed on a voyage of discovery to the north in 1719, and the only account received from him was that all his men but two had died. In 1722, Behring sailed and discovered the straits and island which bear his name; he was afterwards wrecked upon Behring Island, and there died. Between 1722 and 1818 many other voyages were made, and all were equally unsuccessful. In the latter year, Buchan made a fruitless attempt to reach the pole, and was obliged to return in consequence of damage sustained by his ship. In 1823, Capt. Perry was compelled by the scurvy to abandon his expedition, and with the Hecla and Fury to return. In a third expedition in 1825, he was equally unsuccessful, and the Fury was wrecked. In 1832 Rear-Admiral Sir John Ross, C. B. (then Captain,) after having been frozen up in ice for four years, was obliged to abandon his ship the Victory, and with great peril and difficulty at length was saved. Sir John Franklin was sent out to the Arctic seas in 1845; and as all the world knows, has never since been heard of—a period of seven years. Expedition after expedition has been sent in search of him, and they have all proved singularly unsuccessful in their object.

Scraps from Punch.

"A Penny for your Thoughts."—We often hear of persons being offered this princely sum, but the only person we ever knew actually to receive it in payment of his thoughts, was a Penny-a-liner!

An "Honor"-able Destination. After a harmless interchange of shots, the Weybridge duellists are reported to have declared themselves "perfectly satisfied." In the name of common wonder, "satisfied with what?" With having achieved a doubtful notority, and for a day or two afforded food for the gossips, and grateful penny a-liners? Well every one to his taste, certainly; but for ourselves, we must confess we are by no means envious of that distinction which is usually employed with a "difference."

A Paragraph only to be read by the Ladies. Every man has his price, said Walpole; but he never said as much to a Woman. The fact is, Walpole judged the ladies only too correctly, for he knew as well as we do, that many of those dear creatures are beyond all price!

Motives. Many a talented youngman only enters College from a motives of good Fellowship;—and many a worldly young man enters the Church, as almost every Alderman the city life, from no other motives than that of good living!—Boston Daily Journal.

THE CHINESE IN CUBA.—The rumor is revived that the planters of Cuba have contracted with parties in England for the transportation of eight thousand Chinese coolies, to be employed on the plantations at the rate of four dollars a month for eight years. This will be cheaper than slave labor, we should think; and if the experiment proves successful, the effect upon the whole institution of slavery may be of the most serious consequence. Prove that slave labor is more expensive than free labor, and the strength of the institution, is broken. Provide a cheaper substitute, and we shall need no other plan of emancipation or of colonization. They will follow inevitably in the course of nature, and in the way in which all such great changes are made, quietly and without convulsion. There are strong indications that slavery has nearly accomplished the purpose for which, in the order of Providence, it has been permitted, and that the young civilization of the New World will send back to the exhausted East and the West, from the Atlantic and the Pacific shores, the fruits of the seed which was planted so many years ago.—Providence Journal.

THE VIRTUE OF A GLANCE.

"The might—the majesty of loveliness."

Bride of Abydos.

IF Deity be well considered, and question thereupon occur, wherefore space and matter have been formed it shall appear that the universe was created to be the evidence of God. That angel might never lack memory of his existence or majesty of his power, the myriad orbs which roll the deep air, and flash eternally glad light and life throughout the boundless sphere of existence, were called into being, that the servants of the Most High, as they sped daily on their Lord's behest, might everywhere be reminded of him they worshipped; hell only was left void, that they who shouted might doubt on in dark horror and dumb misery. The tokens of God are everywhere abounding; they are stamped, God-like, on the mountain's brow—they are furrowed in the sea, painted on the sky, and carved in air by the blossoming tree. But no where do they glow more eloquently rich than in the breathing beauty of a woman's face. For while to other objects is assigned one function—the sun raying naught but his glory, the thunder only sounding his terror—to it are given all forms and modes and phases of expression; power, who hath not felt it? purity, who doth not reverence it? peace and love and changeless truth; there lingers the last memory of Paradise—there kindles the first hope of heaven; while beauty lives upon the earth, the days of chivalry are never gone, the heroic times are not passed away, religion never shall be extinct, and faith shall never grow obsolete.

I look upon a beautiful woman with a kind of veneration. The gift of fairness is a God-like gift; and the history of a lovely face would be a record of blessed miracles. How often has the casual glance of beauty from her lattice woke into splendid life the torpid soul of man! how often has its careless smile struck glorious hope into the desponding heart. Long ago had I lapsed into the darkness of materialism but for the intense spirituality which beams in the face, O, daughter of the glowing South! The chain of thy timid softness, O Queen of the Western vallies! drew me forth from the dark chambers of misanthropy: and if I am not wholly vile, it is because thy memory, O meek-eyed dweller by the sounding sea, is upon me like a band of adamant.

I have often wondered what must be the feelings of a beautiful girl in the noon-day of her potent loveliness. I can form no conception of the impulses of a heart which abides alway behind the veil of a rich enchantment, conscious that its presence is a power with which no other upon earth may be paralleled; for strength must be exerted, and wisdom must be exhibited, and eloquence must court occasion, and learning struggle for opportunity, in order to have their influence, and even then may miss the consciousness of triumph; but beauty has but to appear and her empire is conceded; like the ocean to the tempest-ruling brothers of the sky, the enchained eye and the arrested tongue proclaim the apparent deity. Her daily pathway is through gentle victories, springing up around her like roses beneath the tread of Venus: and in the hour of languor, the recollection of the hearts that are then worshipping her in secret, and the tongues that then falter her praises, and the thought that many a harp is strung, many a pen is moved, and many an arm is nerved with double force, only because she lives, make a lute-like music to her spirit. Thus, waking, her course is through peculiar brightness, and, reposing, she is wrapt in a mantle of glad memories.

Such would be the charmed life of a beautiful woman, could she take home to herself the sense of her own exceeding blessedness: but modesty which makes the charm, oft mars the charmer's joy. For though none may behold a maid approached in her purity without a holy influence, even as none might touch the garments of the blessed Nazarene, (with reverence be the illustration used!) but he was straightway healed yet in the former case there lacks the further perception how virtue hath proceeded. It is the knowledge of these unconscious miracles which loveliness hath wrought that gives in my eyes such sanctity to a fair woman; and it is to exhibit some of the incidental blessings of a virgin's being, that this tale, not all unreal, is now written.

Ismali ascended the throne of Sassanides in the tenth year of his age. The reign of his predecessor was a period in the history of Persia when wars were not thought of by the country, and the rumours of wars were unheard of at the court. The palace was a scene of calm voluptuousness, and in this condition was the young king educated. When he was called upon to assume the sceptre, he exhibited no disposition to change the tastes which he had imbibed, and the first years of his public life indicated that his sway would be dark and inglorious to his country. He passed most of his time among the women of his palace, whose ready submission and soulless sensuality might well have extinguished even a generous spirit. Possessed of no royal virtue, Ismali was destitute of all manly ardour, he was always dull and gloomy, averse from all enterprise and rarely even entering into conversation. He gave evidence of sort of talent, and his mind seemed deeply overpoerelised, and fatally enfettered in the coils of sensuality.

It was in the sixth year of his reign and the sixteenth year of his age, that the Arabs suddenly invaded Persia. A stranger, it appeared, of whom none knew anything, but of whom all told strange wonders, had united various tribes of the desert in a scheme of conquest, and unresisted by the surprised Persians had entered the eastern provinces, and were gradually occupying that part of the empire. When the intelligence reached the capital, the officers made some feeble provisions for resisting the foe, but knowing well the character of the king they concealed from him all suspicion of the affair: and in a few days the monarch was probably the only person in the kingdom who did not know that his country was at war.

It was at this period that the king one day at the close of a delightful afternoon, when the freshness of the evening breeze was beginning to be felt, issued from a private door of his palace, unattended, and in the dress of a private man, to stroll about the environs of the capital. The course of his walk presently brought him to the gate of a well-appointed park, of which the neatness and the novelty so much pleased him that he entered it, and walked forward along the path. This lawn, appertained to the residence of an English gentleman, of great wealth, who had married many years before a Persian lady, and resided with her some time in England; but her constant longing for her native land, and his own fondness for its exquisite climate, had recently induced him to return and fix his dweling in the neighbourhood of Tehraun. He had "one fair daughter and no more;" a marvel even in that land of beauty, and of a spirit as lovely as her form—partaking at once the sense of England, and the sensibility of Persia. She was now walking in the garden, and the king in the progress of his rambles was very near her before he was aware of it. He heard her voice while she was yet concealed from him by a clump of shrubbery, and he paused for a moment in surprise.

"How exquisite," said Emily as she gazed upon a small bunch of flowers in her hand. "These odours are their thoughts; or are they rather my memories? For I remember that the first time I saw this rose was in a certain small garden in England, and I, till this moment, had forgotten that place. But the memory which I had lost has garnered in the flower, and that it is which makes the rose so fragrant."

At that moment Ismali caught a glimpse of her countenance through the open bushes, and it struck upon his soul like a flash from Heaven. It roused a new and wonderous feeling; it created in him a new life. The darkness which had rested upon his being passed away like a cloud before the northern wind. One thought had been given him, but that ran along the circle of his slumbering sympathies, with an electric and life-giving fire. He started at the new perceptions that burst upon him, and the new prospects that were opened to him. The past fell from his mind like a loose garment, and he rose into another sphere of consciousness. All this was the result of a moment.

Meanwhile the girl passed on, and the King remained motionless till she was out of sight. Looking forth then from his concealment he perceived that she had dropped her glove, and delighted with the opportunity of seeing her more closely, and yet fairly trembling at the prospect of speaking to her, he took it up and walked forward to overtake her.

As he approached her she was standing towards him, looking at something on the ground, with he head bent down. Her small and exquisitely rounded shape of virgin gentleness rather than womanly development—the simplicity of her short black hair divided by a silver line,

> Which served to show how delicate a soil
> The harvest grew in and not so profuse as to conceal the form of her beautiful head—all formed, as she stood, "a sight to love—a sinner."

"Madam," said Ismali, faltering with agitation—it was a droll sight that, a King trembling before a girl. "Madam, you have dropped a glove I believe; I have the pleasure of restoring it to you."

She raised her dark and fawn-like eyes, and fixed them upon him for a moment with a mild doubt, and then with a gentle smile and nod, graciously thanked the stranger for his kindness.

"You are fond of flowers, I perceive," remarked Ismali, somewhat at a loss to know what to say; "I happen to have some of the rarer sorts, I believe, in my garden—perhaps you will allow me to offer some of them to you to-morrow afternoon?"

The lady professed her gratitude for the intended service, and the happiness she would feel in accepting the present.

Ismali gazed for a few instants longer on her bewitching countenance, and then being unable to devise any other topic of conversation, hastily took his leave. The whole soul of the youth was absorbed in the interview which he had had. He walked along rapidly, and with disordered manner, scarcely knowing which way he was going. He leaped the gate with a bound, and went on, sometimes breaking into a run, sometimes skipping, and employing violent gestures the whole way. He went over a hundred times in his own mind every smile and nod; framed felicitous compliments, and denounced himself as a dolt and a fool for not having made use of them; and looked forward to the coming day when he should see her again with a world of delight.

An Oration delivered on the 26th of July, 1852, At Buchanan, Grand Bassa, at the 5th Celebration of the Independence Of the Republic of Liberia,

BY

JAMES S. SMITH, M. D.

And published by request of the citizens of the County of Grand Bassa

FELLOW CITIZENS:

I know that your bosoms swell with emotions of delight, as you hail the return of auspicious twenty sixth of July—that auspicious day, that momentous day, when our little ark of State launched boldly upon the tempestuous waters of nationality, and although five years have rolled over her she still rides gallantly over the waves, with stunsail set, to a propitious breeze, and having stemmed the current of experiment, is now upon the broad main of nationality.

Thanks to a kind Providence, the success of Liberia is no longer a problem, but she stands in virgin glory" among the nations of the earth, and kings and potentates have paid her honor.

Lift up your heads ye sons of Liberia and exult in your high estate; say to the earth be glad, and yield us your sweetness; your stores of gold, and rich profusion of the precious fruits; say to the mountains yield us your gems, and let us partake of your wholesome breezes: aye, say to the lightnings, bear on thy wings our message, and to the waters yield us thy light, and bestow unto us thy strength, that we may reveal the wonders of Central Africa, and load the earth with thy blessings.

To leave the figure, I believe that Liberia is destined to be the mistress of Africa, and that christianity and science will be her pillars, that her sons will be fired with a noble zeal, and that [illegible] will [illegible] the arcana of science and as the [illegible]

Is this our anticipation? Shall Africa redeem her for her glory? Aye and a more glorious career awaits her, than she has ever seen, for cheering inspiration assures us, that Ethiopia shall stretch out her hands unto God, and then will she be glorious, as revealed religion is the light of the world.

This being the case, having the hope that our labor is not in vain, let us be resolved with a noble emulation, and see who can do most to advance the cause of civilization and christianity in this our father-land.

To do this, we must commence at our own doors, build up our own houses, improve our premises and city, and set examples of industry, enterprise and sobriety. No man can contribute to a great cause without being much interested in his own welfare: "Charity always begins at home."

It is not at all necesary that all should be engaged in offices, this would not work well, but let each follow eagerly his proper business, and walk uprightly, and he will serve his country honorably; his honor from any condition lies not well your part, there all the honor lies.

Fellow citizen I feel sanguin that the march of Liberia will be onward, and though she must —as all other institutions, governments and individuals have—encounter difficulties in her steep ascent to eminence, that no weapons formed against her will prosper: for I firmly believe that she is guided by the unerring hand of Omnipotence.

I feel confident that while Liberia follows her high destiny, so long as we [illegible] the path of rectitude, that we have nothing to fear.

Had no Heaven interposed, we had perished long ago.

God is our helper, and the combined efforts of earth would be directed against us in vain.

If we are right, though clouds overwhelm us, and irretrievable ruin threaten us, stand firm, rely on Jehovah, and fear no evil.

I believe that the American Colonization on the western coast of Africa, is emphatically of God, that He commenced the work and will conduct it to perfection; that we are servants in this vineyard, to make ourselves happy and redeem Africa; should we mistake our calling, he may cut us off, and give the vineyard to others of the sons of Ham, whose fathers have not toiled to lay this foundation.

This, fellow citizens, is all I fear, in a word, our neglect. It is with us to say wether we shall be prosperous and happy—wether we shall accomplish the work assigned us and live, or refuse and perish.

Depend upon it, that no evil will befal us without we incur the Divine displeasure.

Difficulties we are bound to have, and they are necessary to keep us alive to our true interests, to develop our energies, and cause us to unfold the resources of our country.

Should trouble assail us, enquire into the justice of our cause, and though our sky be dark; if justice and truth are with us, fear not, we shall soon enjoy a brighter horizon.

These views are sustained by the examination of our past history, which irresistably leads the mind to the conclusion, that so small a company of men, as were our pilgrim fathers, let them be ever so great, is incompetent without Divine assistance, to achieve the victories they won, and to surmount the difficulties that encompassed them.

At every step of their unprecedented progress, some new manifestation of Divine favour and protection beamed forth, and our enemies are forced to acknowlede that the tabernacle of the Lord was dweb among us.

Having made these preliminary remarks, we will take a brief survey of Africa, and the history of Liberia.

Soon after the confusion of laogunges, Africa became mighty and renowned: she cradles sciences, erects the towering pyramids, collects huge libraries, converses with the stars and enlightens the world.

But ere the sun of righteousness arose with healing on its wings, to bless the nations, Africa descends to her original chaos. Darkness, superstition and demonology broods over the land, and her fall becomes as wondrous as was her rise, progress and transcendant elevation.

The nations that were buried in obscurity during her glory, and those that reflected the light of her glory now, departed, tramples upon her, and she becomes the pillage of the earth. Her sons are torn from her embraces, dragged to distant lands, and made to labour as beast of burden. Africa groans as a woman in travail, and though it was not known that she was with child, she brings forth a son, and he is called Liberia; because, though born in the land of oppression, he was to be the deliverer of his people!

Liberia was born on the 21st, day of December, 1816, in the City of Washington, the capital of the United States; and the American Colonization Society was the accoucher that delivered. Africa cradled this lovely son, and the society has ever since, continued the attendant of Liberia.

And the child Liberia increased in stature and grew in favor with God and man. Therefore his attendant advised that he should no longer be attired in the dress of a child, but that he should put on the habiliments of a man.

Now as Liberia was by birth a Prince, great preparation was made, and the 26th of July 1847 was appointed for him to put on his crown and regalia; then there was much dancing and singing and feasting; flags flouted on the gentle zephers, cannons opened wide their voices, and all the earth rejoiced.

As Liberia was the most forward child that ever was born, and attained the statute and wisdow of a man quicker than any child was ever known to do, from the foundation of the world, I shall take the pleasure of giving you, in brief, the early history of Liberia.

Now Liberia is somewhat like Messiah, that he has been called the son of the doctor, that attended his mother, yet his life shows that God himself is his father.

Now it is not my intention to give a full history of Liberia, my limits will not allow it, but I merely wish to gather such flowers from it, that will form a garland suitable to enliven the present occasion.

I have by implication, said that the American Colonization Society was instituted December 21st, 1816.

It had no revenue, in many respects it was unpopular, yet it had to rely on voluntary contributions, to obtain means to effect the grand design of planting a colony of Africano-Americans, on the western coast of Africa. A settlement was considered practicable, and a party suited to the task presented themselves as pioneers for Liberia.

At this juncture, just as congress was retiring, the happy idea of instituting an agency for liberated Africans, and of forming an asylum for them in their father land, burst upon the Government of the United States.

The Elizabeth, favoured name, was chosen as a transport ship of the African squadron, and she was appointed to bear the harbingers of religion and science to the western coast of Africa. Consequently the Elizabeth on the 2nd, of Feb. 1821, sets sail for Africa with her noble band.

At first they settled at Sherbro, a low, sickly island, in Fornah Bay, belonging to the colony of Sierra Leone. This place being unhealthy a more suitable and desirable location was regarded imperative, and after a survey of the coast for several miles, Cape Messurado was selected as being the most eligible position for the colony. European nations had attempted in vain for upwards of a century to gain possession of that lovely spot; Heaven had reserved it for us. But its acquisition was to be made by experienced hands, and here we find Captain Stockton and Dr. Ayres, at hand, and by the address, sagacity and chivalry of the former, we were placed in quiet possession of that cape.

Many of the natives complained and disputed the title, but Boatswain, the then terror of the country, vindicated our cause, and by his nod, silences the discontents. This merely quieted them for a while, but showed our little band that they were surrounded by treacherous foes, and that it behoved them to prepare for defence.

About this time the natives discovered that the colonists were at war against slavery, this they had before suspected, but now an act of the colonists throughout convinced them of the fact.

A British prize schooner containg thirty Re captured Africans, was stranded near the settlement, and the little colony was compelled with force of arms, to defend the sufferers from native rapacity.

This event showed that colonization had laid the axe at the root of the tree of slavery,

By the slave trade the natives had flatered themselves that they would become lords and princes. But now it is in jeopardy, the colony threatens to destroy it, and with it, all their hopes. Now they must arise and strike the colony from the earth, or abandon their fostered traffic, by which alone, they expected to enrich themselves. The avaricious slave-dealer failed in his attempt, to oppose our fathers from acquiring their favoured spot, burns with resentment, opens wide his stores and loads the deluded natives of destroying his mortal enemy But it is all vain. The immortal appears on the ground, and sets to work his inventive genius to prepare for the impending dangers. In the mean time Heaven raises in the camp of the savages an opposition, that stays their march. Bob-Gray, a distinguished Bassa Chief, is commissioned to reveal their whole plan to our little band, and to discourage his comrades.

The colony being now in a state of defence, the savage hordes appear. Tyrany is now waring against truth and liberty.

Liberty struggling against fearful odds. Upwards of a thousand, aye an enemy large enough to cover half a square mile, is opposed by only thirty feeble men, who were unaccustomed to the hardships of the camp, and who, withal, were labouring under the disease of the climate; but the cause of our fathers was just,—they fought and conquered, and slew their enemies with a great slaughter.

This was the battle of November, 11th 1822. Besides large numbers of the slain carried down the southern beach, and ten or twelve large canoe loads sent a cross the Messurado river, twenty seven bodies were found in the bushes. Thus in their first efforts were the arms of our fathers victorious. They had fought a great battle, but the war was not ended. Days passed away in anxious suspense, they awaited another attack; and how deplorable was their condition, how shall they be able to stand, they are enfeebled by sickness and fatigue, starvation stares them in the face, and three rounds only of ammunition left them to defend their lives in an enemy's land; and to heighten their distress, they are informed, that on that very night their foe would certainly return. But, ere the pavilion of the night is drawn over them, Captain Brassy, a noble hearted Englishman, is sent to their relief. The presence of his large ship deters the natives from their purpose, and the Captain liberally supplies the colony with stores and ammunition. Thus were they prepared by the special interposition of Providence, to make the decisive blow on the memorable 2nd, of December, 1822.

In painful suspense, but with a firm reliance on the Arbiter of all events, our fathers awaited the decisive hour, when their contest would be decided, when peace should be restored.

On the 2nd of December, 1822, the host of slavery again appears, rushes with impetuosity on the camp of Liberty, but is repulsed in each attempt; slavery is slain, liberty raises its head, and peace extends her wings o'er all the land

Reduced to the greatest extremity, our little band invoked the deliverance of Jehovah; for though they had achieved a notable victory, yet, all around them appeared dark and gloomy; they had to be on the alert for their foe; they knew not that his shaft was broken, that his heart was faint within him, and that he was utterly subdued. Nothwithstanding this, however, their situation was indeed perilous, for unless they had supplies, if the sword did not slay them, they were in danger of extermination by famine. But, lo! at dead of night, on the 3rd of December, an officer startles, he goes at imaginary foe; the cannon thunders forth the alarm; the sound salutes the passing Prince Regent, a British Colonial vessel, laden with military stores. Curiosity on tip-toe starts, the Regent hauls too, that the opening day may disclose the mysteries of these voices. These guns had been discharged as a summons to her, and she obeyed the command —She supplied the colony, and by the mediation of Captain Lang, her noble commander, a convocation of the hostile Chiefs were obtained, and a cessation of hostilities agreed to, that resulted in a permanent peace. Midshipman Gordon, with eleven men were also landed to defend the colony.

The eminent dangers that threatened them, being averted, our little band looked around themselves, and on every hand they found more to do than they had strength or ability to accomplish, and they required houses and a tower of defence.

Under these circumstances, they were cheered by the opportune arrival of an armed colonial British schooner on the 4th of December, which generously proffered her services, and set too to build up the waste places, and her mechanics were thus employed for a month. But before they could enter fully into the comforts thus prepared, starvation again threatened to lay upon them, his palsied hand, but it is stayed; a trade is opened into the interior, and plenty gladdens their hearts.

In March 1823, the captives taken by the natives, in the battle of November 11th, '22, were returned unhurt; they had found favour in the sight of their enemies, for God was with them; and from the signs of the times, one of those captives, promises to be the third, if not the second President of Liberia.

About this time, the United States ship Cyane, Commander Robert Trail Spence, touched at Monrovia. He builds a tower of defence on Fort Hill, fixes up the schooner Augutus, of 6 guns, puts Lieutant Dashiel in command of her to guard the coast and protect the colony.

Every thing having conspired to bless the colony, Mr. Ashmun writes in sixteen months after their arrival, at Messurado, to the following effect:—

"The colony is now one hundred and fifty strong, all in health;—have fifty houses built, including three stone houses, and a heavy substantial stone tower fourteen feet high, mounting six pieces of ordinance,—have a large framed house surrounded by piazzas, and another ready for erection. Harmony and a good degree of industry at present prevails."

In comping our history with that of the United States, we find that a handful of men aided by a benevolent institution, accomplished more in Liberia, in about one year, than Dukes and Lords, with Royal patents, fleets and rich estates, done in America in thirty years.

But, ah! how frail is human nature, prosperity smiles, each man seeks his own good, and painful to relate, insubordination lifts his hydra head, but ere he distils his venem, a pathetic speech from the eloquent Ashmun, strikes it down. Stunned for a while he lies, but new difficulties warm him again into life, he erects himself, but before he strikes, a Gurley appears, and kills him outright. Religion spreads its balmy wings, a revival springs up and all is peace.

To develope more clearly the hand of Providence, in the rise and progress of Liberia; it would be well to take a glance at the early history of the United States.

I select the history of America, because she has been called the favored land of Heaven. If she has passed through so many difficulties, to her present high station, what may not Liberia expect with all her heavenly favours.

Admiral Gibert, starts with an expedition to colonize America, it fails signally.

He attempts a second time with a fleet of five sails, the Admiral and four of his vessels are swallowed up in the great deep. And is it not remarkable, that not a death has occurred in African Colonization, by shipwreck. Sir Walter Releigh made an attempt,—spies out the land, but returned with a good report, he could not stay, however. Ralph Lane, with seven vessels left England,—he reaches America and founds a colony; famine and the sword threatening to sweep it to oblivion; Admiral Drake flies to their rescue, but the vessel with stores intended for relief, is shipwrecked; consequently they abandoned the colony, and returned to England. Relief was sent from England, but it reached there too late, the colony was gone. Sir Richard Greenfield, soon follows with three ships, but finding no colony, he landed fifteen men and returned.—But what became of those men, remains a mystery to this day.

Governor Writes is sent out with a large company, times appeared gloomy, he was pressed to return with the same vessel to represent their condition, and seek relief. He reaches England, delivers his message, and is despatched with ful supplies; but he forgets his charge, is greedy after prizes, and on his return the next year; no colony could be found, and not one was left to tell the melancholy fate of its inhabitants.

A charter was granted by King James,—one hundred and five men emigrated to America, in five months one half of them was dead, and the survivors were reduced to the greatest extremity. Satisfying the gnawings of hunger principally on crabs and sturgeons, and even then civil wars threatened to destroy them.

In this extremity, that Captain of the American Colonization, looks to the common good, he suffers, but he heeds it not,—is taken captive, but as soon as he is released, returns with large supplies of corn; but who can imagine the depth of bitterness, into which they were cast, by the destruction of that corn, with many of their houses and much opposed.

Five hundred emigrants are added to their number, but this merely increased their troubles. About this time Smith leaves for England. Two new settlements was formed, Matlin and Nansumond of one hundred and twenty men each; these are soon burried in flames and the inhabitants massacred. Ratliffe and thirty men in a vessel is cut off by Powhatan. West with thirty men resorted to piracy on the high seas. And in six months after, Smith left for England five hundred men were reduced to sixty, who, awful to tell, lived on the bodies of the dead.

Thus, I have related some of the early struggles of America, for forty years.

Heaven at length blessed her, and she is now the Queen of the earth.

In reviewing our early history, we find that all nations, as opportunity affords, rendered us important services,

And that we have received many favours from British naval and merchant vessels, for lack of which, we might have perished. But the colony advances, and commercial competition arises.

Our independence was declared on the 26th of July, 1847, and we find that all is well; and as we have advanced, crooked ways have been made straight before us, and rough paths made smooth; and the tabernacle of the Lord is yet among us. But I cannot enlarge, I must draw to a close.

Many have been the vicisitudes through which, we as a country have passed, since the last twenty sixth of July. The year opened with bright prospects, peace and tranquility extended throughout our borders; a troublesome band of marauders had been expelled, and Fishtown was in our quiet possession, and we looked forward with bright prospects. But ere the year is half past, a thunder bolt breaks forth in terror upon us, and the new settlement is sunk to the besom of destruction.

Ere we had recovered from that panic, while our hearts were yet bleeding, because there were those whom we held dear, by the ties of consanguinity of affinity, and nationality, who had perished by the bloody axe of the relentless savage.

We had to fly to arms to rescue our wives and children from falling victims at our own doors, to the same mournful fate. Grando's host covered the land, and loud and long did Tarplan's horn (Grando's chief warrior,) resound "stick your heels in the ground and hold on." But it was all in vain, to war with us; Tarplan was struck to the ground, and that mighty host being discomfeited, fled to their native forest.

These tidings spread all over the land, our sister counties trembled for us, and the public mind heaved in agony expecting some severer fate; but in due time succors are sent us, and our enemies are severely chastised. Peace returned, and with it palm oil flows in such abundance that there is not vessels to contain it The 15th, of November 1851 came near being the last of days for Bassa, but it is big with hope, its good effects will be coeval with Liberia. It was the brightest day Bassa ever saw; the drama of 1834 was just then closed and the curtain dropted over the scene—dropted forever.

The Pennsylvania Colonization Society attempted to settle a colony among the barbarous tribes of Africa on the principles of peace and temperance; they knew not that a defenseless colony, was too grent a temptation to native rapacity, they knew not that Colonization had to war with might and main, against slavery.

Bassa Cove was settled under their auspices in '32 and '33 on the principles of no resistance, consequently the natives obeyed the impulse of their hearts and the instigation of a devilish slaver, and massered the inhabitants. Having gained the mastery once by this faulty step, the natives have always held us in this county in dirision they regarded us not as men, but the battle of the 15th, November redeemed our name and set us free. Then long live the heroes of the battle of November 15th, 1851 when you shall have been gathered to your fathers some of Liberia's sons and daughters, will invoke the muses and chant forth your praises.

In conclusion fellow citizens, seeing that Liberia have been more favored than any nation in its early stroggles, let us throw off our lethergy, go to work and subdue the land and cause this moral, intelectual and physical wilderness to bud and blossom as the rose. Let us plant groves, erect temples to the true God, trust in Jehovah and fear no evil.

Mr. Editor,

In one of your back numbers I find a piece of original poetry under the caption, "The great commission--Thus saith the Lord." I say original for two reasons. First, it has the signature beneath it of a living writer, and secondly, it does not fall within any of the known laws of poetry whether ancient or modern.

In any effusion claiming the high character of poetry, two attributes, at least, have usually been looked for: The one, thought, or common sense—the other rhythm or measure: and when rhyme has been affected, a third quality has usually been demanded, a concord in sound at regular and measured intervals.

Poetry is the language of the passions--the echo of the imagination—it is nature painting and delineating her own vivid and elevated conceptions. There may therefore be very good poetry, where there is no rigid conformity to the conventional rules of versification. And if the "great commission" be poetry, a position I shall not dispute;—then there is poetry where there is a marvellous conflicting, not only with all conventional rules, but also with all the harmonies and sympathies within us, that beat in unison and concord with the objects without us. Yet as poetry was regarded the language of nature, it was not supposed she would, in the utterance of her conceptions, do violence to the emotions which she herself awakens, or violently jostle the mind in that course, along which, it was her professed purpose to conduct it smoothly and pleasantly. To justify this view, a reference, was usually made to the poetry of the rude, and the poetry of the polished ages. On the other hand it was never supposed that any smoothness of versification, any finish or elegance of diction, any regularity or evenness of rhythm, or combination of poetic feet can compensate the want of sentiment. To elevate a common place sentiment on the throne of Pegasus—to introduce the type of a low-born thought into the temple of the muses, was, until lately, supposed to be as ridiculous and absurd, as it would have been, to decree an ovation to a vagrant and conduct him in pomp through the city.

As to rhyme, that of itself can never bestow a title to praise—for it is equally within the reach of the loftiest genius and the vilest scribbler of Grub Street. And while I would avoid any expression tending to discourage the incipient efforts of genius, of which occasional contributions of original articles to your columns give indication, I must be permitted to express a deep regret at the increase of poetasters, whose only object seems to be, to make the ends of their lines tell on the ears of their readers. Indeed I am almost inclined to the suggested idea of placing a bar upon all effusions pretending to rhyme. This to be sure, would be involving the good and evil in one general sentence of condemnation, but as the good is unit, and the vile legion, the lovers of reform might consent to the correction.

Submitting the "great commission" to the above test, its only commendation or title to the character of poetry is its conformity in sound of the end of its lines—I say end of its lines, because the whole poem bids a disdainful defiance to all the known rules of measure and feet. But while I say this I do not condemn it. It would be absurd to speak reproachfully, or even slightingly of what I cannot comprehend. I would rather indulge the charity of beleiving there is a poetry high above me—heights of Parnassus which my untaught eye has never seen, and which my loftiest flights can never reach, but where the author of the "great commission" peculiarly at home, strikes a chord in unison only with his cloudless elevation, and the sympathies of the purified spirits around him.

Yours truly,

LIBERIA.

Monrovia Oct. 20th, 1852.

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Editor:—It was with no little surprise that I noticed, in your last number, the "original" lines, over the signature of "E. W. S."—I was not aware, when, years since, I delighted to sing those beautiful stanzas to a set piece of music for the Piano Forte that the author of them was now a resident of Liberia, and a contributor to your columns.

It is true, the piece, thus set, was not headed "Christian Principles," as now; nor did the fifth stanza there end with the word "severe." These, I suppose, are the latest additions and corrections of the author. I must own, however, that I was juet as well pleased with the former simple caption, "Approach not the Altar;" and the word "serene" seemed to me quite as appropriate an epithet of the courage of a worshipper, as "severe," besides its forming just as good a rhyme with "mien," above. Old partialities, however, often bias our tastes, no less than our judgment; so that, after all, the improvement may be only unperceived. The author doubtless had some reason for the change.

But notwithstanding, I must confess it is somewhat difficult to discover what "principles" the lines exhibit, except it be the principles of good taste and versification. The lines were evidently intended to be sung; and the critics tell us that the business of lyric poetry is, not to lay down or to inculcate principles, but to express sentiments or emotions

But, as just remarked, the lines do exhibit the principles of good taste and versification, although we can hardly suppose this to have been the intention of the author. Many reasons might be assigned for this opinion, the weightiest of which, perhaps, is the noble contempt of these principles which he has shown in a previous production. When I say a previous production I refer to that notable specimen of versification, styled, "The Great Commission," previously published, in your paper of the 16th, Sept. Among all the various measures of ancient and modern poets, whether Monometer, Dimeter, Trimeter, Tetrameter, Pentameter, Hexameter, Asclepiadean, Glyconian, Alcaic, Sapphic, Long, Short, Common, Hallelujah, or Spenserian, I have been able to find none after which these lines are modeled. It is perfectly unique and "original" It might, perhaps appropriately be called the Cholopodaic measure, as expressive of the lameness of its feet.

The author of this new measure, however, certainly deserves well of all poets and lovers of poetry, for thus enlarging the bounds within which verse has hitherto been required to move Thus untrammeled, we may expect to see Pegasus take a freer and bolder sweep, even far beyond Parnassus and the Castalian fount.

In conclusion, were it not that the "Christian Principles" seem to have been written some time before the "Great Commission." I would offer "E. W. S." my hearty congratulations on the great improvement in the former, in respect of poetic thought and diction, no less than of versification. With this fact in view, however, I must express with regret, the fear that his poetic fire is growing dull, and his numbers losing their former melody Genius, I know, is not always equal; nor is it to be rated either by the number or the length of its productions. To have been the author of the first would have been glory enough. But lest its lustre should be dimmed by other effusions like "The Great Commission." I would humbly suggest to "E. W. S." that hereafter he confine himself to prose

A READER.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, NOVEMBER 3rd, 1852.

In our last issue, our readers, no doubt read the communication from Sinoe, above the name of "New Correspondent"—in which we are called upon to answer several questions. We do not profess to be capable of answering the queries of our friend—nor do we acknowledge the charge "that the people of Monrovia have the same notions of us (the people of Sinoe), that the eastern cities have towards the people of the western cities, who visit Washington while Congress is in session, and are astonished beyond measure when they see the western members on the floor" &c, &c, &c. All what of our friend say may be true for all we know, but we are yet to learn that the presence of any one from Sinoe, or from any other place, creates here any thing like wonder or astonishment. We did not know that any such idea had beleivers. We do not know why such should be the case.

But to the questions.—We say now, as we have always said, that we see no objection to their being a convention for the nomination of candidates for President and Vice President—but we did not know that there are two parties established in Liberia, and if there are two parties, we certainly find it difficult to say, why each party should nominate two persons for one office. We can imagine no plausible reason for such a course. There can be no objection to the convention assembling while the Legislature is in session—that time probably, may upon the whole suit best, the convenience of all who may take an interest in the matter.

It is pretty general admitted that the number of delegates, say one for every ten voters, is two large, and the number will no doubt, be altered so as to conform more to the convenience of the people. It is generally said that persons who have drawn lands, and not forfeited them, are entitled to the electivefranchise.

We have received late advices from the leeward settlements,—and we have to regret, that though in Sinoe, matters are proceeding with their usual regularity, and that the health of the people is good—apprehensions are entertained that Grando and Boyer are concocting plans to disturb the peace of the settlements in Grand Bassa. We hope in our next to be in receipt of full advices, to enable us to give our readers the truth, as to the rumors, now so openly circulated, of the assembling of Fishmen at Trade Town from Pickenney Cess. The citizens of Grand Bassa have heard, that their old enemies Boyer and Grando, are determined to attack the new settlement and they are prepared to give them a warm reception, if they should come.

Cape Mount. President Williams has determined on the immediate occupation of Grand Cape Mount, by founding a settlement on the most eligible spot on or near the mount. Preparations are now in progress to fit out a company of 75 men to form the settlement and it is intended that the volunteers shall leave here by the 16th: inst. This step has become necessary to restore peace and tranquility in that region, as all other attempts of the Government to reconcile the hostile chieftians have proved abortive and it has been recommended by the most pacific of the chiefs, and which they think will have a decided tendency to restore tranquility to the country, that the government make a settlement there, and which will more effectually extend the authority of our laws over it. Neither party of the chieftians will object to the founding of the colony, and it is not doubted, but they will give every assistance in their power to render the settlement strong in the hope that it may exercise an influence for much good—and destroy finally the propensity of the chieftians for war.

It is calculated that there will be manufactured on the banks of the St. Paul's, this coming season about thirty thousand pounds of sugar, and five thousand gallons of molasses and syrup.

The Saw Mill at Sinoe is successfully at work, the proprietors are satisfied with their prospect.

The one at Grand Bassa, will, it is supposed, soon be ready to be worked.

The rainy season is now over, or so nearly so, as to permit out door work to be carried on. Several buildings have been commenced, and it is probable that the number will be considerably increased in a month's time. Mechanicks will throughout the dry season meet with steady employment.

From our Correspondent

Clay-Ashland, Oct. 26th, 1852.

Up in "these ends of the earth" we are on the march of improvement. And not more so, as regards the migratory current which sets in to the settlement, than the spirit of rivalry every where seen to be working among our inhabitants—a spirit to build up, beautify and adorn. As regards the farming interest, it will favourably compare with that of any other settlement in the Republic. To those who take any pleasure in visiting a region of the back bone of our country, and of encouraging those who are engaged in the development of its strength, a trip through Clay-Ashland will amply reward them. It will not be deemed invidous to remark in relation to the efforts of a few of her citizens particularly. From "Bedford place"--the farm of R. Mc Murtry—up to Mount Pleasant farm--owned by G. R. Ellis Esqr --the improvements that have been made on the inside of two years are calculated to encourage the most timid and cowardly. Here are growing from 6 to 10.000 coffee scions, some of which upon the farm of A. B. Hooper, are beginning to bear berries; in two months more, there will be manufactured from 6 to 8,000 lbs sugar, besides barrels of syrup and molasses; in the same time there can be dug from 4 to 6,000 lbs ginger; these, the sugar-cane and ginger, are growing upon land where eleven months ago the cane break and undergrowth rendered it impossible for a human being to pass without the aid of a cutlass. The growth of arrow root we have no means, as yet, to ascertain Of cotton we have but one farmer engaged in its growth, the appearance of which is quite encouraging. Of rice, corn, cassada, potatoes, ect. there have been large quantities raised. In the stock line we are doing comparatively nothing as yet but much is contemplated. Let the Government encourage the farming interests of the country and the recurence of panic-stricken, death-like times such as that now sitting like a pall upon Monrovia, will be seldom. While edibles are now so scarce at the emporium, and have been for weeks past, that Gotham sues for pity, the industrious and enterprising of this, and other St. Paul's river settlements, fall back with rustic independence upon their cassades, potatoes, rice, and greens; grippers, and crew-fish; goats, sheep, pigs and fowls; and are engaged in establishing the future prosperity and independence of the country--to supply our treasury with capitol, our commerce with staples, and in checking the annual drain upon the purses of the people by those who bring to them the refuse provisions of the United States at an enormous tax, of from 100 to 200 per cent. upon the American price for the article, and which they seem content to pay without attempting to make a manly and determined protest against it, by refusing to take their 4th, and 5th, quality pork, beef, and salt-fish and flour. In politics the people here seem steady, intent upon standing by their platform. And while they are watchful against venality and political corruption, they will not be alarmed at that which should not "make men afraid." More anon.

Yours

A Yankee on Vesuvius.—A correspondent of the Boston Transcript, writing from Naples, thus describes an amusing interview with a live Yankee:

"The other day, on reaching the top of Vesuvius, I described a man sitting astride a rock of lava. I don't know why, but I marked him at once for one of my countrymen. As I approached towards him, I could not help noticing the cool manner in which he and Vesuvius were taking a morning smoke together. His long nine was run out like a bowsprit, and he took the whole affair as calmly as one would look upon a kitchen fire at home.—As soon as I came up with him, he hawled out: 'Hallo, stranger! pretty considerable lot of fun round here! Any news down below? Ye goin'? tuckered out, be ye?' On my asking him if he had looked into the crater, he replied: 'Yas! but I burnt the laigs of my trowsers, though, I tell yew.' He turned out to be a man from N. England, who come up here from Marseilles to see the volcano."

Stripes, whether on a lady's dress or on the walls of a room, always give the effect of height, consequently a low room is improved by being hung with striped paper. The effect is produced by a wavy stripe as well as by a straight one, as curved lines are most graceful, they should generally be preferred.

A Question of Property.—A Western editor asks, "If a chap as hain't got nothing, marries a gal as nothing has, is nizzen hern or hern hizzen!"—Not only so, but also.

POETRY.

"THE SEA IS HIS."

BY MRS. H. J. LEWIS.

THINE the great Ocean, fathomless and wide,
Through whose far depths uncoiled myriads glide;
Thine its tumultuous heave, its placid rest,
And Thine the sleepers in its cold, dark breast

Supreme, resistless in its ebb and flow,
Bursting beneath the morning's fervid glow,
Fine as the softest skies that span its bed,
Is the faint type of Thee around us spread.

Its glory Thine in cloudless noontide hours,
When crested billows scatter golden showers;
And Thine, through all the holy, solemn night,
Its wondrous beauty 'neath the moon's pale light.

Thine are the storms that wrathfully arise,
In dreadful conflict mingling sea and skies;
And Thine the lulling of the blast, whose breath
Bore to the veiled ear the cadl of death.

Its solitudes leave no theme but Thee,
Lord of the stars, and earth, and rolling sea!
And in the wildest storm that o'er it plays,
Thy voice alone it hears—Thy arm obeys.

CHIDE ME NOT.

BY MARY E. BRYANT.

Oh! chide me not because I weep—
Mine is a bitter grief!
And only in these burning tears
My heart can find relief!
And oh! a sweet relief they bring,
Thus soothing aching breast,
They cool my throbbing head and fevered brain,
And give my heart rest!

Then chide me not—nor seek with smiles
My saddened heart to cheer,
For joyousness no more can find,
An answering echo here;
For cold neglect has crushed
Each smile from out my heart,
And often when I strive to smile,
The tears unbidden start.

And though I proudly check those tears
That others may not know
That pride's fount for me is dry,
And heart encased in woe.
Your slight and careless word,
One tone or look unkind,
A thousand bitter memories
Come thronging o'er my mind.

And every bitter, chiding word
That I am doomed to hear,
Is but another cold and bleeding heart
A dagger sinking there.
Then chide me not—but let me weep,
Mine is a bitter grief,
And only in those bitter tears,
My spirit finds relief.

SYBILLINE SCENES IN THE LIFE OF NAPOLEON.

BY ROBERT HAMILTON.

ONE evening in December in the memorable year of 1772, in a café, in the Rue Mouthelon, was seated a mixed party discussing the events of the present time, and speculating on those of the future. The greater part were citizens, while the lesser, from their costumes, appeared to belong to the military profession. The laugh and gibe occasionally broke forth, but their conversation was more that of seriousness than mirth. Apart from the company, in a corner of the room, stood a young soldier, with his back against the wall and his arms folded upon his breast. He appeared to be completely buried in thought, and regardless of every object around him. His features were beautifully moulded, inclining almost to feminine softness and his hair of a rich glossy brown, fell in flowing ringlets down his back. His stature was that of the middle size, with a person correctly formed altogether presenting in form and feature, a study for the artist or sculptor. So silent was he that he had been completely forgotten by his associates, and it was only whilst one of them in tossing off his glass of vin ordinaire, in prefacing it with the toast of "Destruction to the Bourbons," that he quickly raised his head, directing his flashing eyes towards the door, ejaculated in a short quick tone—"Remercier Monsieur!" that his presence was remembered, and hailed with shouts of welcome."

"Ah, ha! Monsieur Bonaparte, are you still there?" cried one of them; "we thought you had gone to keep the mice company in the garret."

"Or to the Odeon to take lessons from Talma—when do you appear, Lieutenant! we hear that you are about to change the sword for the buskin."

The young man surveyed the speaker with a frown upon his brow, and a contemptuous curl of the lip

"No offence," continued the speaker, seeing that the young soldier did not receive his ribaldry in the best of tempers. "But you and Talma are so constantly together, we thought you had some serious designs of becoming a follower of Melpomene."

"Bah! you are a child, Captain Berryer, waste your words upon fools, they are only fit for such society," said Bonaparte.

"Ha! ha!" shouted Berryer, "the little gentleman is angry.

"And complimentary withal," added another of the party, "if your words are to be wasted upon fools, you have had a numerous assemblage around you sometime, Berryer."

A loud laugh followed this remark, and Bonaparte rising, took his place at the table. A deep gloom was settled on his countenance, and he seemed in no way disposed to join in the merriment, but politely uncovering, he begged his companions not to imagine that his remark alluded at all to them. "But," added he, "I retract not one word I have applied to Berryer."

In an instant Berryer was on his feet, and the others followed his example—but Bonaparte remained coolly seated, and filling out a glass of wine, as he looked a volume of scorn at Berryer, quaffed off the liquor and quietly replaced the glass upon the table.

"You shall answer this, lieutenant," cried Berryer.

"When, where, and how you please," firmly and coolly answered Bonaparte. "Here—this very moment, and on this very spot," and drawing his sword, he stood waiting the assault of his enemy.

"No—not here!" shouted a dozen voices. "This is no place to settle such an affair."

"Where, then," cried Bonaparte "are proper? The earth could afford no safer shelter than the field where your honor is to be vindicated."

"Enough!" answered Berryer. "Enough! Gentlemen, pray do not prevent me," and breaking from them he drew his sword.

A circle was in a moment formed, and the two combatants stood face to face, cool and determined. A profound silence reigned in the room, which was only broken by the sound of their swords, as the combatants each sought for an advantage of assault.

At last, Berryer, thinking he perceived an opening in the guard of his adversary, thrust home when Bonaparte, quick as lighting disarmed him. The sword flew whirling into the air, and descending, was caught by a female who unseen and unheard, glided like a spectre into the circle.

"Hold!" she exclaimed. "Stain not your name by a drunken frolic. The future Emperor of France must war with nobler enemies."

As she said this she looked like a sybil in the moment of inspiration. She might have been about twenty five years of age, tall and commanding in person—browned with the suns of foreign climes. Her eye was dark as the raven's and of unspeakable brightness—her hair, which descended in thick black ringlets over her shoulders, was braided in front, and her brow encircled by a brilliant scarlet kerchief. Her garment was a loose flowing robe of green, fastened at the waist by a blue silken scarf, which descended nearly to the ankle; and her feet were encased in richly ornamented slippers of red morocco.

The party were surprized at her appearance, and some moments ere the silence was broken. At last Bonaparte said—

"Who are you—and what want you here?"

"I am the genius of your fate, captain. In my hand I hold the rudder of your star—to good or to evil I can direct it. Forbear—seek not to imbrue your hands in the blood of your friend," and saying this she dropped upon her knee, and placing the sword of Berryer at his feet, cried—"Hail Emperor of France!"

A loud laugh burst from all around save Napoleon, who impressed by her sudden and singular appearance as well as by her words, stood fixed to the spot, gazing upon her.

"Mock us not," she replied to their derision. "I speak the truth—there is not one of you but shall yet behold him the conqueror of the world—the Emperor of France! Look! look, behold that star, how brightly it gleams," she continued, pointing to the window through which, in a dark December sky, one bright only star was glowing in unspeakable brilliancy; "it is the star of his glory. Lodi, Marengo, Austerlitz—bloody will be your fields—but they are his passage to the imperial diadem. Behold how it waxes, it glows in accordance to my words, and yet dark clouds seem to threaten to bedim its glory. Ha! they prevail. Rout, carnage and confusion, are on his track. The sceptre falls from his hand—he bends in submission. What now passes o'er its disk! Interminable seas—a barren rock his home and a grave in the regions of his enemy,' and uttering a loud scream, she rushed from the apartment.

Her mysterious speech had created a strange feeling in the bosom of every one present, but more especially in that of Bonaparte, who stood like a statue, gazing upon the star. At that moment a loud roll of drums was heard, and Barras, one of the directors of the Convention, entered, and addressing Bonaparte, told him he was appointed to the command of the Conventional troops, with full power to act as he deemed proper for the restoration of peace to Paris.

"Ha! ha! ha! said I not rightly?" shouted a female voice at the window. All eyes were in an instant turned towards it, where, for a moment, the face of the sibil was seen, flushed with joy and waving her hand above her head.

"'Tis strange!" half aloud muttered Napoleon.

"What is strange!" inquired Barras, amazed at the apathy evinced by Napoleon, on receipt of his good intelligence.

"Nothing, nothing Monsieur," he replied; "a strange female has been among us, who pretending to the art of divination, has covered me with glory and shame in the same breath. Behold!"

At this moment a brilliant light arose from without illuminating the whole apartment; but in place of the sybil was seen a beautiful female with an imperial diadem encircling her brow. In her left hand she held another, while with her right she pointed to Bonaparte.

"Do my eyes deceive me!" exclaimed Barras. "Is this the effect of a fevered imagination—or do others see as I do?"

"It is no deception!" shouted some dozen voices.

"Look again there—approach her, Napoleon, 'tis only at that she smiles so graciously."

He did so, but the next moment she had disappeared, and nought but darkness supplied the place of brightness. Loud shouts now arose without, and the rolling of the drum, the report of the fire-arms, told that tumult and bloodshed were again at work in the streets of Paris.

"Lose not a moment, Bonaparte," said Barras, "we shall talk of this again—may the vision prove true. Take this sword—let it carve out your path to its fulfilment."

Bonaparte received the weapon, and bowing assent, departed to assume his appointment, while the others followed, wondering at and speculating upon, what they had witnessed.

We shall now change the scene to the battle of Lodi, that memorable event which won for the Corsican high fame and honor. During a greater part of the day he had assisted in duties of the common soldier, with his own hands charging and discharging a piece of ordnance, when on the very eve of victory he was struck with a musket-ball—the blood flowed freely, sight almost forsook him, and he was nearly falling to the earth, when a voice whispered in his ear—

"Arouse thee—thy wound is healed. This is thy first passage to the imperial crown!"

He looked, and the sybil who two years before had confronted him in the café, in the rue de Mouthelon, stood there in the midst of death and carnage.

"Ha!" cried Bonaparte, "you here!"

"Why not?" she coolly replied, "I am thy genius. Hearken—'tis accomplished! the day is won—the wreath of victory is thine!"

At the same time the bugle of the Austrians was heard sounding a retreat, and the wild shouts of triumph from the French, mingling with the roar of cannon and martial music, proclaimed Napoleon the victor of that ever memorable and bloody field. He had but for a moment averted his eyes from her, towards the scene, her words were yet in his ears, when he turned to her again, but she was not to be seen. He placed his hand upon his breast, his dress was yet moist with blood, but no pain was by him felt; and when in possession of the field, he uncovered his bosom, there only appeared the semblance of a wound but not the slightest sign of its recent infliction.

In 1800, five years after this occurrence, during which time success had ever attended him, when he had added to his name the Conqueror of Egypt—had returned to France—had boldly dissolved the Directorial government, had been declared First Consul, and crossed the Alps, and was now encamped on the field of Marengo. It was on the night preceeding that battle, worn and weary with a long and arduous march, he had wrapped his cloak around him and thrown himself upon his camp couch, before the opening of his tent, so that the refreshing breezes of an Italian summer night might play upon his distracted and fevered frame. The moon shone with unclouded brilliance upon the marshalled plains, and the opposing armies were bound in the slumber of silence and fatigue. Scarcely a sound was to be heard, save

"The clink of hammers closing rivets up,
Giving dreadful note of preparation.

At the opening of the tent paced two sentinels, whose orders, at the peril of their lives, were to admit no one, 'till the morning bugle sounded. But look, what form is that which moves in the dimness of the tent, so softly that ever the breath of the mid-night zephyr ruffles more the stillness of the hour. 'Tis a female—she approaches the couch of Napoleon—she looks keenly upon him—she casts her eyes upwards and for some moments seems as imploring aid from a spiritual power—again she gazes on him—a smile irradiates he features—it now gives place to sorrow—tears fall from her eyes on the face of the hero, as she bends over him—Napoleon starts from his slumber—she is about to speak, but she places her finger upon her lip to command silence. It is a spectre or reality that stands before him? Her mantle falls from her shoulders, and the sybil again stands before him.

"Speak not but listen," she said in a voice of melancholy tenderness. "The star of thy fortune is once more in the ascendant. To-day shall victory award thee the laurel!"

"Mysterious being, who are you and from whence come you?" asked Napoleon.

She spoke not, but taking from her bosom a small talisman of the form of an eagle, cut from an emerald and richly set in gold, placed it in his hand, saying.—

"When from thee this departeth then will depart the star of thy glory. Up, up and be gone—already is thy foe preparing—go—be fearless, and victory is thine."

In an instant she was lost in the gloom of the tent, and Napoleon starting up sought to pursue her. At that moment the morning bugle sounded to arms, and the sentinel entering the tent was surprized to find him standing lost in abstraction. The noise of his footsteps, however, recalled him to remembrance—he rushed from the tent—the field was now a moving mass of men, like fire illumined with the first streaks of morning—he leaped into his saddle—the word for battle was given—deep and deadly roared the voice of destruction throughout the day, and when the sun was sinking behind the distant mountains, another garland was hung on the banner of Napoleon.

Austerlitz, glorious be that yet bloody Austerlitz—how swelled Napoleon's heart on that day, when the sun rose in dazzling splendor o'er his host, and the Austrian and Russian powers lay scattered o'er the field, thick as the autumnal leaves of the forest. When the first blast of the bugle thrilled each heart, telling that the work of battle had begun and man horse in thundering conflict met. Veiled on the east of that day depended the summit of his ambition, the stability of his regal sway—but when at last the evening fell upon the vanquished and he stood the one the terrible and triumphant conqueror, oh! were his feelings to be envied or his fame to be desired! It was as he thus stood, surrounded by his brilliant staff on that bloody field, flushed with victory and devising plans for the morrow, that Murat, approached and informed him that a friend in the thickest of the fight, had arrested his arm and placed within his hand a packet with these words—"This is the brightest day in the reign of Napoleon."

He took it, it was addressed to him; he broke the seal, and within it lay the fragments of a ring, but no writing. A gloom overshadowed his countenance and hastily folding it up, he thrust it into his bosom, and gave orders for the disposal of his troops for the night

Having retired to his tent, and seated himself by his watch-fire, which burned brightly in the clear keen air of a December night, his busy soul was soon filled with a thousand thoughts of the future. In the ever changing embers he could almost depict, in "his mind's eye," crowns and sceptres tumbling into his grasp, and monarchs bending captives at his footstool. Then would the spectres of misfortune throng before him, 'till he beheld himself a vanquished and humbled being, at the mercy of those, whom like a second Attila, he had spurned without feeling and destroyed without cause.

Lost in these reveries, the remembrance of the packet flashed upon him. He took it from his bosom and unfolding it, again beheld the broken fragments of the ring.

"What can I to divine from this?" said he "What symbol does this betoken?"

"That the circle of thy glory is shattered!" exclaimed a voice beside him.

He started—his sword was in his hand, but he was on the eve of rushing to the sentinel, when the speaker arrested his arm and commanded him to be silent.

"Know you me not?" said the speaker. "Ten five years since we met, on the plains of Marengo—I then placed in your grasp the talisman of fortune, but to-day it hath departed from thee!"

SYBILLINE SCENES IN THE LIFE OF NAPOLEON.

BY ROBERT HAMILTON.

Concluded.

"Not so," exclaimed Napoleon, thrusting his hand into his bosom, "'tis here!" But his pale countenance grew crimsoned and a strong trembling seized upon his frame—he stood aghast, gazing with vacant horror upon the face of the speaker, whom he now recognized as the sybil.

"Speak I not truth?" cried she; "'tis gone, vanished, never to return. Thy star may wax brilliant, and the sun of fortune may seem to smile upon thee as brightly as ever, but a storm is gathering in the distance that shall burst upon and destroy thee for ever!"

"Whether has it gone? asked Napoleon, faintly.

"To the spirit hand that formed it—to the mansions of destiny," she replied. "Farewell! we shall meet again, but then thy sun shall be set and tempest shall be o'er thee!"

She rushed from his presence, and escaping from the tent, was challenged by the sentinel, but on perceiving it was a woman, and that she readily gave the countersign, he permitted her to pass safe and unmolested. Napoleon could not speak, he stood statue-like and speechless, and at length sunk beside the embers of his watchfire in a state of oblivion, from which he was only aroused by the entrance of the officer of the morning.

Nine years had passed away, and Josephine, his wife, the promoter of his fortune, had been discarded, and another, a regal, but not a better being, taken to his arms. Battle after battle had been fought, kingdom after kingdom had been conquered, and in the intoxication of success, the sybil's prophecy had totally escaped his memory. But reverses of fortune now fell upon his arms, and alone in the old princely palace of Fontainbleau, in a solitary chamber, on the evening of the 11th of April, 1814, we now behold him, driven to the very verge of despair—at the mercy of those, a captured conqueror, to whom he had shown none, and with whom he had violated every principle of honor.

He is seated at a small table, where before him lie various documents, one of which he scans with a keen and anxious eye—ever and anon he rises and walks about the apartment, muttering to himself—and striking his hand upon his brow—he suddenly pause seizes the pen and is about to apply it to the document—now he casts it from him, and assumes an air of terrible determination—his hand now falls unwittingly upon a pistol—he starts—he grasps it—a wild light flashes from his eye—he raises it—what, shall the hero of "a hundred fields," bow beneath the reverses of fortune? No! he dashes it from his grasp—he draws his hand across his eyes—a tear drops from beneath it, and flinging himself into his chair, his head falls upon his breast, and a deep smothered sigh bursts from him.

Slowly on its hinges moves the door, and with a step noiseless as death, enters a figure in full white flowing garments. A thick veil conceals her features. She advances to the table, and stands motionless before him. He perceives her not 'till she deeply and solemnly pronounces the name of—"Napoleon!"

He starts from his revery. Who dares thus break in upon his last night of royalty? The veil falls from the face of the intruder, and the spirit of his destiny stands before him—'tis the Sybil!

"Said I not we should meet again, when thy sun should be set, and the tempest should be o'er thee?"

"Ah! Austerlitz—I remember—the—the—" He would have added more, but surpize at her strange and sudden appearance had appalled him, and he looked upon her unable to speak.

"Behold—the talisman of thy fate!" said she, exhibited to his sight the eagle she had presented to him on the memorable visit at Marengo.

"Ah! give it me!" he exclaimed, and he rose eagarly to clutch it—but it was but a shadow in his grasp, while the act was followed by a derisive laugh from the Sybil. "Fiend! tempter!" he ejaculated; "why come you here to mock me? Dost thou too rejoice with mine enemies at my downfall?"

"Thy downfall is a fitting retribution for thy bloody and boundless ambition. Think of the millions thou hast murdered—of the hearts thou hast broken. The curses of the childless, widowless, and fatherless, are upon thee. Think of thy Josephine and tremble! Once more I shall be with thee—but once more! remember!" and she glided swiftly and noiselessly from his presence.

Change we the scene. In his sea-girt citadel, in an apartment in Longwood, dimly lighted, and surrounded by his weeping household, lay the dying exile. His last moment was fast approaching, and reason had departed from her seat; His breathing was low and heavy, and indistinct and incoherent words occasionally broke from his lips. A furious storm was raging without—vivid beams of lightning, followed by terrific claps of thunder, shook the island to its foundation. It was a fitting hour for the departure of him, who with his engines of destruction and insatiate ambition, had shaken the world to its basis. Fainter and fainter became his breathing; the death-rattle rung frightfully in his throat, and his sunken and glassy eyes wandered vacantly around. In a moment, as if inspired by superhuman power, he suddenly raised himself from his pillow, his eyes were kindled with unnatural brilliancy, and with his thin and emaciated hand pointing to the window of the aparment on which the beams of lightning were playing, exclaimed—"There!"

All eyes were turned towards it, and the form of Josephine, well known to the attendants, was beheld smiling upon the scene

"Come, my Cid,"* it exclaimed; "'tis the Sybil of thy life awaits thee."

The exile fell back upon his pillow—his eyes assumed again their glassy hue—a faint sigh escaped from him, followed by a convulsive shudder of the frame, and the next moment his spirit had departed. The prophecy was fulfilled—"A barren rock his home—a grave in the regions of his enemy.

A name that Josephine delighted to apply to him.*

LIBERIA—WESTERN AFRICA.

On Tuesday a meeting was held in the Lecture Room of the Rotundo, at twelve o'clock, for the purpose of hearing a statement from the Rev. Alfred T. Wood, a gentleman of colour, respecting the state of Christianity in the Republic of Liberia, in Western Africa. Amongst those present were—The Rev. Thomas Scott, the Rev. Frederick Dowling, the Rev. Wm. Palliser, the Rev. W. B. Kirkpatrick, Rev. Camillo Mapei, Rev. Richard Wall, Rev. Hugh Prior, &c.

The Rev. Mr. Wood, having commenced the proceedings with prayer and the reading of a portion of Scripture, communicated to the meeting a resolution and letter of introduction, signed by members of the Independent Protestant Church of Monrovia, the capital of the Republic of Liberia, and accompanying license, bearing the signature J. J. Roberts, the president of that republic, and dated June, 1851, by which he was authorised to lay the case of their church before the Christian public of these countries, to solicit contributions for the purpose of completing a house of worship in Monrovia, and also to request that their missionary operations should be extended to the republic. He had submitted those documents to several of the clergy of Liverpool, Birkenhead, and Wales. The rev. gentleman read letters from clergymen of those places, attesting his mission, and then said he would endeavour to enter on the important business for which he had been sent here. His thoughts returned to the field in which he laboured for thirteen years, where four and a-half millions of human beings were distributed in little towns and villages, and of whom only about 1-225th part, who lived near the sea-coast, enjoyed Christian privileges. He saw Africa, the country with which he was particularly identified, bound in darkness and superstition to deaths triumphal car. What had he been accoustomed to find on visiting the hut of a poor sick heathen? Concealed under a native cloth would be his god—or parent, in his own language; an image probably sculptured by his own hands, or perhaps only a bit of iron or brass procured from a wreck on the coast; and the priest who came from the bush told him that he should move it into different positions, and then his god would be satisfied, and he would be restored to strength. Dark, indeed, was the condition of the large proportion of inhabitants of the territory of Liberia, which he had already mentioned. The country was beautiful enough to remind the traveller, on first arriving, of the description of the garden of Eden—such was its perpetual verdure—its never-falling foliage; however, God in his mercy had planted there the church he (Mr. Wood) represented, as a light upon its shores, pointing to the day of African redemption. The Republic of Liberia was colonised in 1822, under the auspices of the American government; and at first the colonists, subject to its laws, could not even call for religious intelligence. Governors were placed in the town of Monrovia, and the place was, in fact, as it was then designated, a little America in Africa. At that time it was given out that the object of the American Colonization Society, in connection with the colony, was to better the condition of the African; but while it continued under its aupices, the enlightened inhabitants had not the privilege even of erecting houses of worship or of establishing native schools. That the policy of the society was not the Christianizing of Africa at all he could easily prove by reading abstracts from published statements of its principles. The rev. gentleman read two extracts, by which it appeared that there was to have been no intermeddling with property in slaves in the colony, and that the rights of masters were to be sacred; and went on to say that painfully, year after year, had the colonists had to bear with the daring impudence of their own citizens in going into the interior, destroying the huts of natives, seizing young Africans, and smuggling them on board American slave ships. The colony had, in fact, been established for the purpose of getting rid of the enfranchised African population of America, by whom the slave property there was kept under value, and at the same time of having a market for the supply of young and fresh slaves. They continued under that government until 1842, when the colony declared its independence. A constitution was then drawn up, and the inhabitants elected Joseph J. Roberts president of their republic. He was despatched to Great Britain, and Queen Victoria was the first to acknowledge the independence of Liberia (applause); and that was not all, for her gracious Majesty also pledged the honor and power of the crown to defend it. The president passed over into France, and Louis Philippe, who was then on the throne there, acknowledged their independence, as did also all the European powers of which they had any knowledge. There was no interference with them on the part of the American government. This change in the state of things gave them the privilage of dwelling under their own vine. The American minister was safely despatched from the colony to his own country; their president was inaugurated, and they became an independent people and turned their attention to that which would benefit themselves and better the condition of their fellow-beings. Millions were around them ignorant of the Word of God, and American slave vessels were hovering on their coast, watching every opportunity of getting in and dragging forth victims of perpetual slavery; but her gracious Majesty was pleased not only to keep a squadron on the coast, but she also presented the republic with a sloop of war, which was manned with native inhabitants of the city of Monrovia, and was successful in capturing twelve slavers on the coast within the last three years. So formidable was the slave trade thus rendered to those engaged in it, that it had been abolished for 700 miles along the coast, and of the destruction of the famous slave mart at Lagos many of those present had no doubt read. They had now a flourishing population of fifteen thousand at Monrovia, according to the last census, connected with which were twenty-three schools, where native children sent from the interior were educated at the expense of the government and each of whom on his return to his own people became an infant preacher. Whenever a chief applied to their government for a man to teach his people the English language—which they were apt to learn—a school teacher was sent, and thus a door was opened for the preaching of the blessed gospel of Christ. And such had been the demand on them to help their poor perishing people, that he had been sent across the seas to make known their case here. Liberia considered that she had some claims upon the sympathies of Great Britain, and they thanked God for his mercy in having enabled them to do so. It was no trifling matter to become responsible in such a case as his (Mr. Woods); but there were two friends which could never fail him, namely God and his conscience. These were the friends that enabled them to brave all their difficulties. He begged to make a few remarks with reference to the climate of Africa. It had been generally termed the grave of the European. There was an impression that a contagious fever prevailed there, which was destructive to the lives of Europeans. He begged to remove that idea. He had the experience of thirteen years' residence, and he was able to say that the climate of Liberia was the most healthful on the coast of Africa. But in point of fact there was no such thing as contagious disease on the coast. Every foreigner going to Africa carried fever with him, it being nothing more nor less than the acclimatizing, or changing of the constitution to the temperature and the diet of the country. The climate was very warm, but since he had been in this country he had seen the thermometer higher in mid-day than he had seen it for eight months during the dry season in the city of Monrovia. The continuance rather than the intensity of the heat was what produced the effect there. Pleasant breezes was felt both in the morning and in the afternoon. It was true that there were unhealthy places on the coast of Africa. Why so? There was an atmospheric vapor, which rose immediately when the sun dipped beneath the horizon about four feet and a half. Any wood that was exposed to contact with it would not last above two years and a half; therefore the foundation of the houses were built of brick or stone. The lower story was used as a store-room; and the upper ones for sitting and sleeping apartments, by which the inmates were preserved from that vapour, and they enjoyed healthy constitutions. By cautiously abstaining from fruit, native food, and especially spirituous liquors for five weeks after his arrival, the foreign resident would perfectly preserve his health. Persons paid by the government took charge of those who were newly arrived; they could take lodgings for themselves; and medical men were appointed to see that they did not unknowingly destroy themselves; consequently there were living amongst them persons who were as healthy as the natives themselves; and the treacherous sound of Africa being the grave of the European was proved to be entirely false. A few words as to the church of Monrovia. In 1811 it contained not more than thirty members; but up to June, 1851, he was happy to announce that there were 639 communicants; and shortly before he left, seven members were admitted into the church in one day from the [illegible] tribe. The rev. gentleman gave an account of the conversion of one of that tribe, who had taken refuge in Monrovia from an impending war between the Vey and the Golah tribes, and went on to ask where were the philanthropic Christians who would not unite in an effort to raise the people he had represented to them from their degraded state. The church in Monrovia required 200l. for its completion. He begged of them to understand that he had not come there to solicit any aid for himself (hear, hear). He did not want it; God would take care of him and of his cause (hear). Let the gentlemen who had interested themselves in his case in Dublin receive the contributions and secure them for the specific purpose of completing the building. It was true that their church was not connected with any one in this country; nevertheless, he did not confine his application to any particular church. The liturgy of the Church of England, its marriage and baptismal service, and also the service for the dead, had been in use in the Church of Monrovia as long as he had been connected with it, so that it was actually part and parcel of the Protestant Church. From Sierra Leone down to the extremity of the coast of Liberia, at Cape P[illegible] a range of 750 miles, there were but four individuals who exercised the function of preaching the Word of God. He craved then their interest on behalf of the perishing sinners of Liberia. The laws of the republic were a perfect abstract of those of Great Britain, making allowance for some alterations which had been rendered necessary by circumstances. He had heard it said since he reached these shores that the constitution contained a clause prohibiting white men from becoming citizens of the republic. No such thing existed in it; and he knew the fact, for he wrote part of the constitution himself. But the 12th article, although it said nothing about colour, excluded certain persons from membership of the republic, under the following circumstances, viz:—The inhabitants of Monrovia, when they sat in council to draw up the constitution, taking into consideration the religious as well as the moral interests of the state, and fearing lest the security of their church, as a Protestant people, might be interfered with, enacted in the 11th article, that "no persons professing to be of the Roman Catholic religion should become citizens or freeholders in the republic (applause). And there was also a clause, that all persons, citizens of the republic, who should at any time confess themselves to be converted to the Roman Catholic persuasion, should be allowed sixteen days to collect their effects and remove to some other place of residence, otherwise they should be dealt with according to law" (applause). These were the only articles of prohibition in their constitution, and if there was anything wrong in them, let the matter be agitated. They had originated in the desire of the inhabitants, on escaping from physical bondage, to render themselves independent of spiritual bondage also (hear, hear). Having now given them a statement of the case with which he had been entrusted, he had accomplished his duty; and he trusted that God would deliver him from the difficulties through which, as a stranger, he had to pass, and would bless his exertions (applause).

The Rev. Dr. Camillo Mapei, formerly a dignitary of the Church of Rome, examiner of the clergy, and professer of divinity in the diocess of Penne, in Naples, came forward to address the meeting, and was applauded. While he had been listening to the eloquent address of Mr. Wood, and his descriptions of his country and its inhabitants, he had been reminded of Italy, the garden of Europe, and of the dark condition of her peasantry, deprived as they were of the light of the gospel (hear, hear). The rev. gentleman said that the same advocacy was suitable for the Christians of Liberia and Italy, and said that in the latter country, although political prospects were still unfavourable, gospel prospects were advancing (hear, hear). The Bible was generally read by the intelligent classes, in spite of the police and the Inquisition (hear, hear). At that moment hundreds of their brethren were groaning in captivity in Italy, and yet rejoicing in spirit because they were witnesses for Jesus Christ (hear, hear).

The Rev. Richard Wall, a reformed priest from the diocese of Lismore, came forward, and was received with applause. He made a very few observations in allusion to the address of Mr. Wood, and then sat down.

The Rev. Mr. Dowling announced that contributions in aid of the church at Monrovia would be received by the Rev. Mr. Wood, the Rev. Thomas Scott, the Rev. Hugh Prior, and the Rev. Mr. Hemphill, as trustees, to be forwarded by them to the president of the Republic of Liberia.

The Rev. Alexander Hurst then briefly addressed the meeting, after which the doxology was sung and the meeting separated.

Literary Associations.

This is an age of wonderful things, superior to all its predecessors. Mind is exerting itself to its utmost tension; and genius applying its powers to the accommodation of man. Leaving the lofty and sublime themes which inspired the [illegible] of poets and orators, it is assisting in the subjugation of matter. Mountains and valleys are to its pediments to its force, nor can w[illegible] and tide hinder its progress. It laughs at distances, and makes the lightning an obedient messenger.

This is also an age of intellectual and moral progress. In all civilized countries, intellect and virtue are on the advance. Science is also on the march. All nations are tending to the broad platform upon which they will unitedly chant the praises of truth and liberty. And it is gratifying to find that in Liberia, there are some who give place to the importance of furthering the cause of learning, and of diffusing general [illegible] among the people, and who have set it their duty to associate for the purpose, not [illegible] Conservatives, but also all who may come [illegible] the reach of their influence.

An Association under the denomination of "The Literary and Social Club." has been lately [illegible] city. We had the pleasure of being present at its introductory meeting held on the evening of the 29th, ultimo. It was of a very interesting character.

Rev. F. Burns, the President of the society having delivered his inaugural address, Rev. L. W. Stokes interested the audience by a lecture on "moral suasion." After which, the constitution of the society was read by the Secretary, H. W. Dennis, Esq: from which we gathered that its meetings would be held on the first and third Wednesdays in each month, on which occasions, the time will be spent in debates, conversations or lectures, as the society may deem expedient. Now is the time for the aspiring young men of Monrovia; will they not appreciate and improve their advantages?

But the gentlemen of Monrovia are not alone in their noble efforts, for the advancement of learning. We understand that the "Gentlemen's Lyceum" at Sinou has again gone into operation with flattering prospects. A few weeks ago, a letter informs us, that a very spirited debate was conducted in that institution, on the question "whether the exploring of the county of Sinou, would be beneficial to its inhabitants." The debate was decided in the negative. We earnestly hope that these institutions will prosper, & vying with each other in such laudable efforts, be the means of accomplishing much good.

It is also gratifying to find that a desire for literary improvement is obtaining in a good degree among the Ladies. In each of the lower counties a female literary institution has been organized on a plan similar to that of the "Ladies' L. L. Institute." of this city. Of these, however, we know but little. The Ladies' Institute in this place is in a prosperous condition, and is exciting a lively interest among the younger ladies of this community; though there are a few persons who from motives strange and unaccountable, are disposed to object against it, but their objections are so trivial a nature, that, instead of impeding, they appear to accelerate its progress. Mr. Burns, in his inaugural address above referred to, while alluding to the L. L. Institute, spoke of the "noiseless and unobtrusive character it has maintained since its formation." We were reminded of the saying, though it may not be peculiarly applicable here—that, "deep rivers flow with majestic silence, but small brooks are noisy." The studies pursued in the Institute, are of a very profitable character, and cannot fail to prove so to all who appreciate them. Mr. B. V. R. James, who has conducted the studies of the ladies, since the death of its founder, is still at his post, we hope he will not grow weary in so noble a work, but continuing faithfully therein, urge the pupils to higher and greater improvements. We have heard it intimated that it is probable the ladies of the Institute, will attend the meeting of the "Literary and Social Club," on the delivery of their lectures. We think this an excellent idea. Will not the young ladies of Liberia embrace the opportunities, for mental culture, which are held out to them in these Literary Institutes?

The peculiar circumstances of the people of Liberia, demand mental and moral culture—well disciplined and balanced minds. And so limited are the means which they enjoy, for improvement, so few the facilities they possess for competing with other nations, and keeping up with this advancing age, that it becomes them to be inflexible in their endeavours, and untiring in their efforts, adopting every measure that may be calculated to advance learning and science in our land.

Historical facts, or the first reformers of pain

Spain occupies a peculiar yet singular interesting position in the history of European kingdoms. At the period of the great revival of learning in Europe it stood foremost among the nations of christendom, as distinguished for wealth, chivalry and national enterprise. It exhibited the gorgeous magnificence, of architectural & artistic display in its cathedrals & palaces, such as still remains unequalled as a whole in Europe. It was also a spot of peculiar interest then, as the last scene of the protracted struggle, between the cresent and the cross, between the Mahometan and the christian arms and where then existed so many memorials of the civilization and the magnificence of the Moorish conquerors who so long maintained their empire in the peninsular. Legend and ballad and song still preserve in the sunny vales of Spain the memory of its chivalrous Moorish conquerors; in the gorgeous ruins of the Alhambra attest their architectural skill, and their refined learning, and numerous remains even in the Temples—consecrated to the worship of the Romish Church prove the extent and [illegible] rance of their dominion. From this ancient kingdom, whose the followers of Mahomet had settled down to rest, and abide as the natives of the soil. They were at length driven forth by the enthusiastic Spaniards they retreated step by step, contesting every inch of ground, and yet no sooner have they crossed the narrow strait that separates the rock of Gibralter, from the African shores, than they seem to vanish like the genii of their own eastern legends, leaving no trace of that learned wise and skilfull people whose sages and doctors surpassed in knowledge the learning of northern Europe and whose artists have left such lasting proofs of genius and skill.

Doubtless however, the contest with such a people exercised an enduring influence on the Spaniards and contributed its share towards the production of that peculiar national character which still distinguish the natives of the peninsula from every other people of Europe. In Spain as in every other kingdom of Europe, the history of the church when minutely studied exhibits numerous striking evidences of the influences of apostolic teaching, and the struggle between truth and error; before the papal sway was recognised in all the full force of blighting tyranny which has so long oppressed that unhappy country one of its most interesting connections with the east, was so early as the seventh century when in its decision with reference to the Ecumenical Council which was held at Constantinople in the year 680, it clearly shows how strong even at that period was the power of that early teaching in its effects in the Spanish church. M. Cire, remarks of it in his history of the Reformation in that country.

"There is a Spanish piece of history which throws great light on the state of the Spanish church during the seventh century, and which I shall relate at some length as it has been either passed over or very partially brought forward, by later historians. The sixth Ecumenical council held at Constantinople in the year 680 condemned the heresy of the Monothelites, or those who though they allowed that Christ had two natures, ascribed to him but one, will, and one operation. In 683 Leo II, Bishop of Rome, sent the acts of that council which he had received from Constantinople to Spain requesting the Bishops to give them their sanction, and to take measures for having them circulated through their churches. As a council had been held immediately before the arrival of the papal deputation and a heavy fall of snow prevented the re-assembling of the members at that season it thought proper to circulate the acts among the Bishops who authorized Julian Arch-Bishop of Toledo to transmit a rescript to Rome intimating in general their approbation of the late decision at Constantinople and stating at considerable length the sentiments of the Spanish Church on the controverted point. A council convened in Toledo during the following year, entered on the formal consideration of this affair, in which they proceeded in such a manner as to evince their determination, to preserve at once the purity of the faith and the independence of the Spanish Church.

They examined the acts of the council of Constantinople, at which it does not appear that they had any representative, and declared that they found them consonant with the decisions of the four preceeding ecumenical councils particularly that of Chalcedon of which they appeared to be nearly a transcript.

Wherefore they say, we agree that the acts of the said council, be reverenced and received by us, in as much as they do not differ from the fore said councils', or rather as they appear to co-incide with them. We allot to them therefore that place in point of order to which their merit entitles them, let them come after the council of Chalcedon, by whose light they shine. The council next took into consideration the receipt for which the Arch Bishop Julian had sent to Rome, and pronounced it a copious and lucid exposition of the truth concerning the double will and operation of Christ adding, wherefore for the sake of general instruction and the benefit of ecclesiastical discipline, we confirm and scantion it as entitled to equal honor and Reverence and to have the same permanent authority as the decretal epistles.

The council of Constantinople had condemned Pope Honorious I, as an abetter of the monothelite heresy a stigma, which advocates of papal infallibility have labored for ages to wipe off. But the Spanish council, on the present occasion proceeded farther, and advanced a proposition which strikes at the very foundation on which the Bishop of Rome rests his claims, by declaring that the Rock on which the church is built, is the faith of St. Peter, and not his person or office. But this was not all the Spanish clergy did. When the rescript of the Arch-Bishop of Seville reached Rome, it met with the disapprobation of Benedict II, who had succeeded Leo, in the popedom. Having drawn up certain popedom animadversions upon it, his holiness gave them to the Spanish deputy to communicate to his constituents that they might correct those expressions, savouring of error which they had been led incautiously to adopt. An answer not the most agreeable to the Pope was returned by Julian in the mean time, and the subject was afterwards taken up by a national council held in 688 at Toledo, instead of retracting their former sentiments or correcting any of the expressions which the pope had blamed. The Spanish prelates drew up and sanctioned a laboured vindication of the paper which had given offence to his holiness of whom they speak in terms very disrespectful and contemptuous. They accuse him of a careless and cursory perusal of their rescript, and of having passed over parts of it which were necessary to understand their meaning. He had found fault with them for asserting that there are three substances in Christ, to which they reply, we will not be ashamed to defend the truth, so there are perhaps some other persons who will be ashamed at being found ignorant, of the truth. For who knows not that in every man there are two substances, namely soul and body. After confirming their opinion by quotations from the Fathers they add:—But if any one shall be so shameless as not to acquiesce in these sentiments and acting the part of a haughty inquirer, shall ask whence we draw such things, at least he will yield to the words of the gospel in which Christ declares that he possessed three substances. Having quoted and commented on several passages of the New Testament. The second council concludes in these terms. If after this statement and the Fathers from which it has been taken any person shall dissent from us in any thing we have no farther dispute with him, but keeping steadily in the plain path, and treading in the footsteps of our predecessors we are persuaded that our answer will commend itself to the approbation of all lovers of truth who are capable of forming a divine Judgement though we may be charged with obstinacy by the ignorant and envious: Here then we have evidence of a strangely different state of things from that which has prevailed for so many centuries with reference to that morally degraded and enslaved country.

A. How far different then was unhappy Spain to what she is now, then she was able and willing to speak fully in her own defence, maintaining the true principles of the religion of Christ, and fearlessly maintain the faith once delivered to the saints, but now how is she fallen, she was once a rising star that shed a mellowing beam around, and religion and high honor contrasted with the lovlines of her climate, & the lines drawn for her rising march, were like a sun beam but now alas the glorious days of Spain have passed.

Clay Ashland Correspondence of the "Liberia Herald."

Mr Herald:—In my last you had a remark in relation to our agricultural interests, a further trace of which shall be reserved for a future scribble; the present scrip you find devoted particularly to our building improvements. We are not fecund of bideds in this almost geometrical line, the influx being steady but slow, hence, whatwe would demand to be set down to our credit, justice would unhesitatingly mark upon the debit side of old Gotham. Amid the rusticities of our present life and homely habits, which would doubtless extort from the moving embodiments of mawkish refinement, in reconoitering us, a wildness of mirth far exceeding what Aschylus styles the "countless laughters of old Ocean's cheeks," still we are paying attention to improvements in civil architecture. There is a principle to float, though by so doing all others are made to sink, which proves that "there is something rotten in Denmark," but with such a principle we claim no kindred, and for it we feel no sympathy; hence we disclaim, altogether, any design of reflection or invidious comparison between this and other settlements, conceding this to others, they we presume, will reciprocate the feeling.

There are in course of erection, and in preparation for building these drys, four brick houses in this settlement. On that beautiful eminence, westward from Russelville, our friend and fellow citizen, Abram Blackledge is engaged preparatorily in ereceting a fine two story edifice, which from his plans and design will be equal to any in the county when finished and completed. The site is desirable, commanding a view east, west, north and south, and as to salubrity and pleasantness the "local habitation" will not be easily surpassed. A half mile or more higher up, the Presbyterian congregation are about erecting a fine brick edifice to worship in for the future, they having, unfornately lost their former house of worship, some weeks ago, which fell during one of their festival occasions with a frightful and tremendous crash—and while, too, the house was literally crowded with people—no one, happily, getting seriously injured. The site for the new building is some few hundred yards eastward of the old, upon a fine lot ceded to them by government for that purpose. Those who are friendly to religious worship, both in Liberia and elsewhere, will not do any harm by contributing to the completion of this building.

A mile or more still higher up, our friend and neighbor, Outland, has already commenced a fine building, the bricks having been made and the timber cut by himself on the premises. The dimensions of the house are 27 feet long, 16 wide, 2 stories high with basement and attic. A few yards to the south of the flat rock, Sion Harris Esq, is about putting up a fine two story brick building also There are other houses to be erected among us also, but the materials for which have not yet been decided upon.

Politics are on the qui vive. The delegates for here are holding and discussing preliminaries are fundamentals for the convention. We hear of a coalition about being formed to energise the claims of a certain talked of and individually nominated candidate for the Presidency But the folks here will stand by the nominee of the convention.

The citizens are combining of certain grievances and confidently expect a redress by the ensuing Legislature, of these you shall be apprised in my next.

Yours.
X. Y.

CHARITY. THE "UNION SISTERS OF CHARITY SOCIETY" celebrated their 19th anniversary on Tuesday the 9th, inst. at 11 o'clock, A. M. The Ladies, (members of the Society) marched in procession from the house of the Directress —preceeded by the Agent of the Society—to the Presbyterian Church—where was gathered a large assembly, and listened to an address by Mr. E. W. Blyden.

We were much pleased with the exercises. The choir, though small, acquitted itself well.

The ceremonies being concluded, the Ladies again marched in procession to the house of H. W. Dennis Esqr.—where, with a few friends they enjoyed a delightful repast, and spent several hours very agreeably.

It was with no little regret however that we noticed that this Society, which was once, numerically considered, the most important in Monrovia, numbered so few this year.

The Agent in his annual report, states that, during the last year while some of the members had died, others, from various causes had withdrawn. O why is it that they have left so noble a cause? Is it that they have grown weary in well doing? Have they forgotten to do good and to communicate? Or do the poor and needy now require less assistance?

To those who still cling to the cause we would say, persevere in your laudable efforts, and gather encouragement from the assurance that the "liberal soul shall be made fit, & he that watereth others, shall be watered also himself."

SPECTATOR.

Monrovia Nov. 11th, 1852.

For the Liberia Herald.

M. Editor:—I have been much amused while looking over your last number, at falling on some critical remarks in two different columns, and one on a piece of poetry signed "E. W. S." (wrong), and the other on the "Great Commission."

I therefore, beg leave to say to the author of those remarks, that the beautiful and touching hymn, has been sung often on that solemn occasion of which it speaks, in Rhode Island, Massachusetts, and also in Connecticut, where it was composed by one of the clergy of our church, and has been read often in this place Having been here for three years fully, &c. In tearing up the christian witness the other day, my eye fell again on those well-known lines of my friend and brother, and by way of preservation, I copied them out, and sent them to the Herald without any remark or note or knowing that it is well known at that office, that whatever is my own composition, my name is attached to it without fear, and when it is not, I never make any claim. This can be fully proved at the office. And when I received the paper I remarked to persons present, that they ought not to have put my initials to the hymn, because it was not my composition, but one of our clergymen's.

Please therefore known, that I do not coy without giving credit, or at least do not claim by any mark whatever, &c.

A critic is good for the improvement of society, and you may be a blessed one sent of God, and if you only knew how much I admire a good critic, if you have a desire to shine in my favor you would equip yourself fully, and stand in the lists with the noble band, who have purified the literature of the world. And let your bold pen, tell on error wherever it shows its deformed head.

May success, happiness and peace, ever attend you through all the journey of life. And as to "The Great Commission;" go dear one and bear that message to every door, now I do not flatter the simple lines, but since you are a critic, I wish you to make them better than I may learn of you, for it is good to learn, and always know that it is by criticism we are made perfect

I should not have noticed any remarks made, had it not been necessary to set one part of the matter fully right as to the commission, it is a plain [illegible] that is all I care for, whether it is observed or not, and can only say that I am sorry such a liberty was taken in writing my initials without my knowledge or consent, but I can easily conceive that it was done under the impression that it was mine, and therefore signed as other pieces of mine have been.

And now would be critic, I tenderly advise that before you commence this work again, that you supply yourself with better implements, for it is a sage remark grown old by time, and bright by use, that little people catch at little things. I have done.

E. W. STOKES.

We owe an apology to the Rev. E. W. Stokes for having placed his initials below the contributions, referred to in the above communication. It was done without reflection, and we sincerely regret it, in asmuch, as some of our good friends have rather critically referred to it. Mr. Stokes frequently, and very kindly too, furnishes for our paper very interesting matter, and when his name is not written in full, his initials are attached to them. Now it so happened that the two peices of poetry referred to, had neither his name nor his initials, and our compositor imagining that they were inetended to be signed, but through inadvertency was not done,—attached to them the initials of the Rev. Gentleman, knowing them to be in his writing. We hope this explanation will be satisfactorily received.

Monrovia Nov: 13th; 1852.

Mr. Editor, While it is gratifying to see that you have correspondents, who are regularly contributing to your paper, it may not be amiss if you will give some of them a word of caution. In your last number, "X. Y." your Clay Ashland correspondent, after prating very exultingly, and for all I know truthfully too, of the improvements, going on in his neighborhood, took the occasion to throw one of his harmless shots at Monrovia. I say harmless, because our city has stood too many fiery and ungrateful assaults without ever flinching, to be now disturbed by a "Pop Gun." X. Y. says. "Let the Government encourage the farming interests of the country, and the recurrence of panic-stricken, death like times such as that now setting like a pall upon Monrovia, will be seldom. While edibles are now so scarce at the emporium, and have been for weeks past, that Gotham sues for pity, the enterprising of this, and other St. Paul's river settlements fall back with rustic independence upon their cassadas, &c. &c;"—your readers, will not fail to observe the slander of a traitor in these lines, & for his sake I regret, that they do not bear the impress of his credit. I say traitor for reasons which some readers will readily join me. Did not "X. Y." at one time live at Monrovia? Was it not in this city that he received the first impulse to "estrange himself, and find in the St. Paul's a local habitation and a name? While residing in this city "X. Y." thought it the best place for living of any in Liberia— but now he changes his tone—another class of people is to be pleased & pleased they shall be, even tho,' it be done to the injury of that place which first welcomed him to Africa, and gave him the first shelter It is asked by scores of persons, what is meant by panic-stricken, death like &c. &c;"—You must tell them Mr Editor. If the employment of thousands of dollars for improvements, in buildings and other occupations now going on in this city—the solvency of its merchants, and the healthful condition of the people are proofs that "death like times &c. &c;" are now setting like a pall upon Monrovia, then X. Y." speaks the truth, otherwise he is ridiculously wrong. I will not Mr Editor, attempt a comparison between this city, and the banks of the St. Paul's. Indeed, a comparison cannot be made. I did not believe that any man would be so simple as to speak of Monrovia in connection with any settlement in Liberia, so far as regards its ability to support its inhabitants.

I forbear to extend this communication to a greater length but would kindly recommend to X. Y. to be more careful in future and not be guilty of the great sin of ingratitude.

I am Yours
CONSISTENCY.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, NOVEMBER 17th, 1852.

In our present number, our readers will find an address delivered by Alfred T. Wood, which, to say the least of, is a tissue of the most glaring falsehoods. We copied the address from an English paper. On former occasions, we pronounced this man an IMPOSTOR, and not entitled to the least credit. We had no idea that he was still carrying on such a wholesale system of fraud among the good people in England When we say that Wood is, and has been travelling through England under false colors, we wish it to be understood, that he is known here, as the most consummate of swindlers. We hope to hear by the next mail from England that he has been arrested, and severely punished.

Our merchants, will no doubt be rejoiced to learn, that through the mediation of Mr Lewis R. Crocker at Little Bassa, the interior trade of that country is now opened, and that the natives are bringing their produce to the sea coast in search of a market. The President a few months past, commissioned Mr. Crocker for this service, and we tender him our congratulations for the successful termination of it.

It will no doubt be gratifying to our readers, to know, that despatches of 21st, Sept. last have been received from President Roberts; and that Liberia has still many true and valuable friends in England. The British Government do not seem disposed to insist upon anything unjust of humiliating to Liberia. The greatest difficulty yet, is the claim set up by British traders, and their denial of the sale of certain territories to our Government by the chiefs. We apprehend, however, that President Roberts will find no difficulty in successfully resisting such a claim. President R. has also visited Paris and was kindly received by Prince President Bonaparte's Ministers—the Prince was not in Paris—and from them he received assurances of good feeling for Liberia, and that their Government would certainly lend their aid to the advancement of our infant State. President Roberts expects to be home in all this month.

Hon: S. A. Benson of Buchanan, Grand Bassa, has sent us for publication, a communication seting forth reasons for the reoccupancy of Fishtown, and why the settlement should be sustained It will appear in our next.

The Ladies of the Union Sister's of Charity Society, celebrated, on the 9th inst: their 19th: Anniversary. An address which is well spoken of, was delivered on the occasion by Mr. Edward W. Blyden.

Bob Cain and the other chieftians of Grand Cape Mount have sent down Sally Curtis, who is nearly allied to Prince Cain,—and who is supposed to be well acquainted with all the affairs of the country, to represent to the Government the true state of matters in that region. The chieftians adopted this course, instead of coming themselves, knowing that they had violated their treaty stipulations, and were apprehensive that the Government might have recourse to rigorous measures to remind them of it. Our readers are aware, how frequently, even in the past six months, Cain and his associates have been called upon to cease their wars and restore peace, and that all pacific measures have hitherto availed nothing. Sally Curtis, the ambassadress is not there but will return in a few days, with assurances, that no further notice will be taken of the ill behavior of the chieftians, provided their conduct in future, proves them worthy of such forbearance.

The Legislature, will meet on the first Monday in December next. It it supposed that many subjects of great importance will engage its attention, and it is probable that the session will be a lengthy one.

We have not since our last issue received any definite information as to the intentions of the Fishmen. That a large number of them have come up the coast, and are now, at River Cesters no one doubts The people of Grand Bassa are aware of this fact, and maintain a vigilant watch to give the alarm whenever an enemy aproaches. Fish Town, in Buchanan, is well fortified, and capable of repelling a large force.

The Gallenas. It is said that Prince Manna of Galleñas, will now readily adopt any measure which may be proposed to him by our Government for the Government of that country. He may have said this, but we do not believe him, Prince Manna is not to be trusted. We are creditable informed that he is secretly engaged in attempts to revive the Slave Trade. Most certainly this will be looked into.

We have received from a correspondent some historical facts, from a review of history as far back as the sixth century, embracing a review of the first reformes in Spain &c.

As anything connected with the glorious reformation, cannot fail to be interesting both to the middle class, as well as to the most refined scholar, in all countries where the light of the reformation has broke forth with its vivifying influence.

therefore we have much pleasure in presenting them to the citizens of Liberia, as they will have much of history brought into a small compass, which in detail can of fail to be highly instructive and interesting to an inquiring mind, &c. The first number appears in this present number and the succeeding numbers, in the regular issues of this paper.

EXPEDITION FOR LIBERIA.—We take from the "New York Sun" of 20th September the following item The "Oriole" may be hourly expected.

EXPEDITION TO LIBERIA.—The New York State Colonization Society have chartered the brig Oriole, Captain Prandt, for a voyage to Liberia; with colored emigrants, to sail on the 1st day of next month from New York. It is stated that upwards of fifty emigrants are already engaged for this vessel, and others are applying daily. All but one whose applications have been accepted, this far are from the non-slaveholding States It is also said that more than 500 have applied to the Parent Society for a passage in vessels to sail from other ports between this and January next.

Nov: 15th,—arrived American brig Louisa Josiah Webber, 56 days from Salem Mass.

Nov: 15th. Arrived Liberian Govt. shooner "Lark." R. Cooper, Lieut. Commanding; 19 days from Sierra Leone.

POETRY.

Moral Principle.

In all the walks of life
And in all we say or do
If we are only guided right
Its moral principle that moves

But man when left alone
Is weak and helpless still
Because to sin he's daily prone
Guided by a wicked will

Every day we see him stray
Of principle there's no regard
Truth cannot guide his way
To morality, his heart is barred

Though wisdoms charming voice
Is heard as sweet as ever
The opposite his loving choice
And from which death only severs

Thus virtue saw and was ashamed
That man should be so vile
When there is immortal fame
Promised him beyond these wiles

THE VIRTUE OF A GLANCE.

"The might—the majesty of loveliness."

Bride of Abydos.

When he reached the court he was rather calmer and less insane, but his pulse still beat with a masterless energy, and his mind was still glowing with new and splendid emotions. He cursed the place, and ordering the herd of attendants that clustered around him, to get about their business he walked to a large and unoccupied apartment, the most simply furnished in the pile, and opening the casement, which commanded a glorious view of the western hills, threw himself on a sofa, and gave himself up to his tumultuous thoughts.

"Holy prophet! what a glorious creature! splendid, gorgeous, superlative, ineffable! Gods! what a darling woman! exquisite, superb, magnificent, perfect! was there ever anything like her! there never was anything like her! 'Thank you'—those were her very words—'thank you, I shall have great pleasure in seeing them,'—I shall have great pleasure Sir—great pleasure—I shall have great pleasure in seeing them.' Why did not I continue the conversation? Oh, oh," burying his face in the corner of the sofa, "What a miserable fool I made of it. What a wretch, what a beast I am."

He rose and walked to the window. "Ha! what a splendid view! is it possible that I have lived in this world before? Amid such beauty, have never know it till now. What a horrible existence has my past life been? How could I live, how could I get through the day without knowing her? it must have been a dark and miserable monotony. Ha! this is life, for this is love! what a glorious energy is infused into my being!

O, that some minstrel's harp were nigh
To utter notes of gladness

Away with the miserable fooleries of a court! give me this ecstacy, whose sting, if it has one, is but delight. What miserable beasts are kings! it is their cursed destiny never to love, and never to be loved. I thank heaven that I have broken through that fate."

Disdaining to occupy the usual Royal Chamber, which was rich with the purple splendours of the East, Ismali passed the night in his new apartment, for its novelty jumped with his acquired humour, and its sobriety suited the neatcleanness of his thoughts.

When the King awoke on the following morning, he turned to his attendant who entered his room, "Saith not the holy Prophet (upon whom be blessings and honor) that women have no souls."

"Even so, saith my lord the Prophet, (upon whom be blessings and honor,") said the attendant.

"Blessed be the name of my lord the prophet," quath Ismali. "But women have souls."

"There hath never been an edict issued, we think, during our reign," said the King, after a pause. "Let the first edict of our reign, then, command the departure of all the king's women, and their perpetual banishment from the palace. (That I am sure she will approve of, added he to himself.) And let the edict be dated in the sixth year of our reign, and the second day of our life. These miserable bestialities being suppressed, we intend farther wholesome reforms. We do shrewdly suspect," continued the King, drumming on his upper lip, and nodding gravely, "that we have heretofore been a pretty considerable kind of a foo-ool."

"God forbid," said the courtly attendant, as he handed him his Mocha, "that I should contradict your majesty in anything."

The rest of the day was spent by his serene Highness in scheming bombastic enterprises, discussing flowers with his gardener, beating the wall with his knuckles, and strutting round the room on the tip of his toes.

When the afternoon had arrived, Ismali sat out with a large bunch of roses, of which his hundred-times-repeated questions had ascertained that one half were immensely difficult to produce, and the other half quite impossible. He found the object of his search alone in her garden.

"My darling," said he running forward, "Madam, I mean, I have brought you the flowers which you were gracious enough to say that you would accept."

The lady did accept them with a most sweet smile, and a most timid courtesy, of which the natural grace was quite enchanting. "It is really a very elegant present," said she; "I doubt whether the garden of the king himself could produce a richer variety."

"Have you ever visited the King's grounds," enquired the other; "I am sure that his majesty would be most happy to show you all the flowers he has."

"I was there once," said Emily, "with my father; but we did not see the King. I suppose he was asleep; I am told that he generally sleeps half the day, and for all the good he does he might as well sleep the other half."

"Indeed," said Ismali, quite baulked, "indeed! I was not aware that he had so bad a character."

"If he does not arouse himself pretty soon, the Arabs will awake him rather rudely."

"Arabs! what Arabs are you talking of?"

"Why, those who have declared war against Persia."

"What! I have heard of no war."

"One would think," said Emily, smiling, "that you were the King himself; from your ignorance of the state of the country. The Arabs have invaded Persia, commanded by a young man: and a noble creature he must be. His are the qualities which are admirable in a man—qualities of daring resolution, and skill. Such tastes as belong to yonder unworthy king, were disgraceful to a woman. Action, not reverie, is the true sphere of man; and the more he does and the wider he spreads his name, the more noble in his character. He has but a short time to live, and unless he employs every moment of his existence without which he has lived in vain. What is life without glory? We are here that we may be immortal."

Ismali hastily took his leave. "She says well," he exclaimed, as he stalked along with a burning cheek, and the tread of an Alexander. "By heaven, she says well! I am a King, King of Persia. I must leave these paltry weaknesses of love; I must grasp in earnest the sceptre of my kingdom. An invasion of the Arabs. I will summon an army and place myself at the head of it, and exterminate the foe. The energies of the man are roused within me, and cold feelings shall no more be fellows of my heart. Ambition shall be the tenant of my soul, and Fame the mistress of my life. The affection which was budding within me shall be strangled; for though she was its object, it is still a weakness. I will plunge into untried and absorbing spheres; sensibility shall grasp other objects—hope, warming in pursuit of nobler quarries, shall feel no defeat—my heart, filled with sternness, shall know no void. My country shall be made just, the most glorious on the earth, and men shall tremble at the name which they now deride."

Let us leave for a moment the regenerated monarch, to trace a different history, which has a bearing on our tale.

In the extreme south of Italy, within sight of the waters of the Mediterranean, resided the Count Alstarmi, a noble of ancient descent, but of decayed fortune. Both himself and the Countess were persons of great purity and virtue, and of considerable kindness of heart; but nature had denied to them all trace of sensibility. Their son, Pierre, on the other hand, was born with the most morbid and acute susceptibilities—the greatest misfortune that can befal a mortal—a gift as Du Quesnay has justly described it, at once precious and fatal, which is the source of beautiful conceptions, deep impressions, great talents, great success, and too often of great faults, and much misery. Kindness to such a heart is a thankless offering; its craving is for sympathy, and sympathy alone. Thus the benefits which his parents daily extended to Pierre, seemed to him like insults and wounds, for their coldness mocked the fever of his passions; and they more often generated hate and rudeness than gratitude and love. Had all favours been withheld, and had he been suffered instead to throw himself into his father's arms and weep upon his breast in silence, he would have been virtuous and happy. But the calm and moderated air with which his parents spoke to him of their love, though in an ordinary breast it would have been like rain upon the desert plant, only served to outrage the boundless exactions of such a heart as Pierre's. O, that parents knew that one heart is as little the measure of another, as the horizon is the boundary of the world, and that to tender souls one ray of kindred emotion is dearer than the wealth of Midas.

This unnatural impressibility, and these exaggerated feelings, soon wrought in Pierre, as they do in all men, their polar opposites; for the heart which nature has commanded to beat wildly, if it cannot grow with love must swell with hate. Between the extremes of these two emotions the young man for a long time vibrated—sometimes panting with intense affection for his parents, and sometimes maddening with demoniac aversion to them—one while kindling with enthusiastic piety, and at another raging with defiant blasphemy—now long for the softness of a poet's life, and anon cold with the sternness of a hero's schemes. But "in the moral straits there is always a current from right to wrong, but more from wrong to right," and the darker tendencies of young Alstarmi's nature waxed stronger and more decided. He secluded himself from all society, and when in company with any one, was usually gloomy and bitter; he spent most of his time in wandering over the hills, and along the shore, planning gigantic undertakings, and contriving schemes of boundless empire. In fact, Pierre was rapidly becoming a very bad fellow.

One day when he was about twenty years of age and had all the violence of a despot of forty, and all the impracticability of a boy of twelve; he was sitting at the dinner-table, when his father remarked that it was time for him to think of some profession, as he was too poor to live without one, and proposed to him to go up to Parma to read the Civil Law. Had the worthy Count set before his son a tureen of lava soup, with red-hot cannon-balls for dumplings, Pierre would have essayed the feast with all imaginable good will; but to read civil law at Parma! to grope through Heineccius and Bynkerschock! what a ridiculous idea. He did not know whether to knock his father down for his insolence, or laugh in his face for his absurdity.

When the dinner was over, Pierre stalked out, and having consigned the novels to the keeping of St. Peter, and sworn to throttle Justinian in the vestibule of Hell, marched on to the border of the sea. When the free roar of the mighty ocean burst upon his hearing, and the wild lashings of its unmastered waves, rose full upon his sight; his soul swelled with the glorious vastness of the scene. The contracted ties of home, and the narrow obligations of duty shrunk from his remembrance, and he breathed the splendid wildness of solitude as if it had been air. He leaped upon the beach, and his resolution was taken in a moment. He would pass over at once to Africa, and in the limitless vastness of its deserts would call his soul his own.

The next morning beheld Pierre on board of a vessel, bound to the opposite coast, and he whose fancy would have rebuked a seraph for want of feeling, was leaving his home and his country without a sigh, or a doubt of conscience. When he reached the "arida nutrix leonum," (the dry-nurse of lions,) he possessed himself of a powerful Arabian, and rode off alone without the faintest consideration of the object of his journey.

Driven by his wild and impatient mind he galloped through the sandy deserts in a whirlwind of excitement, finding no relief from his thoughts, but in rapid motion. He passed the Isthmus and entered Arabia, and among the savage and lawless tribes of that country he enjoyed the fullest happiness he had ever know—solitude without its monotony, and society without its annoyances. He went and crossed the Euphrates, and the rich plains, and cultivated vallies of Irak extended before him. As he looked over the beautiful prospect, the idea of conquering that country, and possessing the whole of Persia, rushed into his mind. The whole scheme was laid, and its execution resolved on; he left the spot where he stood, and he at once set about its fulfilment. An intense application, and the extraordinary powers with which nature had endowed him, made him in a few weeks master of the Arabic language, and of so much of their history and national character as was necessary to the contrivance of effective appeals.

When this was done he addressed himself to some of the border tribes, and proposed the conquest of Irak; this country, he declared, belonged naturally to Arabia and quoting a saying of Mohamed, which Mohamed had never said, that the time would come when the Arabs should drink of the waters of the Tigris, declared himself sent from Heaven to accomplish the prediction. It was in vain that the more reasonable chiefs protested against such a violance of right, and pointed out the unfitness of an agricultural country for their people; the eloquent lies and ardent blasphemies of Alstarmi were irresistible. He assured them that he had no intention of invading Persia Proper, as he called it, but only Irak, well knowing that an attack upon a part of the kingdom would at once produce a war with the whole; and upon this assurance the Arabs crossed the Euphrates.

Having succeeded in this part of his scheme, Alstarmi set about the fulfilment of the rest, and as a preparation for action, determined to enter Persia privately, and inform himself of the resources of the kingdom, and the character of the people. He accordingly visited several of the cities, and at length arrived at Tehraun. It so happened that on the afternoon of the day he reached there, he met a Frenchman of his acquaintance, who proposed to show him some of the beautiful seats in the neighbourhood, and presently brought him into the very park of which our friend Ismali had made so transforming a discovery. Emily and one of her friends were now walking there, and Alstarmi's companion being acquainted with them, presented him to them, and, joining the stranger lady, left Emily and the Italian to follow at their leisure. The moment that the eyes of the latter fell upon those of the love-enctured girl, he was conquered to the soft influence that floated round her like an atmosphere. Feeling, like a resistless tide, rose over his soul, and his splendid memories, and his more splendid dreams, faded from his mind like a veil of air; the oblivious conqueror was again a boy. Conversing with her in the child-like prattle of love, they walked on till they reached the summer-house. They entered it, and Alstarmi threw himself upon an Ottoman, and gave himself up to the delicious sensations which flowed in upon his heart.

"What a lovely spot is this!" he exclaimed. "What a rapturous peace pervades the very air! Do you not love this place? Surely you love it better than England!"

"Ah," said the lady, with a sigh, "one's native country is ever the dearest one can know. Certainly this garden is unusually beautiful, and leaves little for any one to desire:

A spot for childhood's opening bloom,
For sportive youth to stray in
For manhood to enjoy his strength
And age to wear away in.

Here there are books and lovely flowers, and when you go to the door there are hills and the boundless sky. What more could be wished for? But still I cannot look upon it as on the green fields of my own land."

"Certainly we can love no land like our own. Italy is to me sweeter than all others," said Alstarmi, totally forgetting his present relations to that country, and speaking with the feelings of long-past years—and, perhaps, even fancying himself in the land he spoke of. "And do you not wish to return to England?"

"If I had only my own will to consult I should certainly return," said Emily. "But it is rarely that any one can virtuously obey his own exclusive wishes, but in this life, duty must triumph over will. My parents wish me to be contented with this place and I am contented. I am happiest when I know that I am making them happy, and it would be but little gain to sacrifice for pleasure all that makes that pleasure pleasing."

"Yes," said the unconscious Italian, and he spoke with the sincerity of the moment: "yes, it is only when we are good that we are happy, and there is no goodness like true filial affection."

Thus talked they for some time, till Alstarmi rose and retired to his lodgings. He threw up the window of his chamber, and looking down on the beautiful rose-gardens beneath him, leaned upon his arm in a pappy reverie.

"What a lovely girl that is!" he exclaimed. "I have never been so happy in my life. I will marry her and live with her in peace. This is the very life I have so long coveted; peace, virtuous peace. My life has been sadly wasted: ah!" at that moment the recollection of the past first burst upon him—the momentous realities of his situation first occured to him. He started up wildly; "Where am I? What have I done; I, madman that I am? I have plunged a peaceful nation into war; I have broken my kind father's heart: oh!" and he burst into tears, and wept in utter prostration of heart.

"This must not be," said he when he grew more calm. "I have got altogether wrong, and my errors, I fear, are fatal. Apprehending that the affections were a source of deeper suffering than happiness, I had gone on hardening myself against the ills which nature had in store for me, wishing to stand alone and aloof. But nature will not be wronged. This encounter, and the feelings it has raised, and the irresistible weakness which just now overwhelmed me, teach that the heart will not exist for itself only—that its affections will not be smothered in selfishness. Duty, the commonest and lowliest, is the only source of happiness; nay, there is no power that compels us to our duty."

To be Continued.

The first to love is to play with fire. There is a "freedom from starch" in the intercourse of young people of this relationship that ripens as naturally into affection as buds into fruit, or tad-poles into bull-frogs.—Yankee Blade.

THE FAIR MAID OF CADIZ.

A TALE OF SPAIN.

BY E. CURTIS HIXE, U. S. N.

"With a breeze sufficient to curl the surface of the slumbering sea, and our little craft lay like a wearied sea-bird, resting her snowy wings, as Ned Rivers and myself were seated forward upon the windlass, conversing of by-gone days. I had just been relieved from the helm, having been relieved by one of my subordinates, and not feeling disposed to sleep, determined to while away the remainder of the watch in discourse with my friend.

"Tell me, Ned," said I, "do you take you promised me some time since about the fair maid of Cadiz, whom you rescued from the bandit, and for which deed you received the reward."

"O, yes, I believe I did promise to spin you that yarn sometime," replied he, after musing for some moments in silence. "Well, I suppose I may as well tell you to night as at any time; so here goes.

"The ship to which I was attached sailed for England a few days after the event, and you may be well assured that I felt a severe heartache when the white walls of Cadiz faded in the eastern horizon, and I found myself once more fairly out on the wide, wide sea. Still I kept my own counsel, and did not impart the cause of my grief to any living person, for I knew full well but little sympathy among the rabble that composed a ship of war. The truth is, I had learned to feel something more than friendship for the fair creature I had rescued from the bandit, and resolved if I should ever succeed in getting on shore again, I would procure my discharge from His Majesty's service, and hasten back to Cadiz, the place where I had left my heart.

"After a fine run of twelve days, our gallant ship dropped her anchor at Portsmouth harbor, and five days later, through the interest of the captain, I obtained my discharge, and was a free man again. But I did not, like too many of my class, spend my hard-earned gains in riotous debauchery, but after a visit of a few weeks to my mother, who resided at Lymington, I engaged a passage to Cadiz in one of the regular packets, and in the evening of a lovely day in August, beheld the white cliffs of my native Albion fading away; for the first time in my life, strange as it may appear, without regret. You will not wonder, my friend, when I inform you how eager I was to reach Cadiz, and to again behold the lovely creature who claimed my every thought.

"Well, after a fine run of ten or twelve days, I was again rejoiced with a glimpse of those white walls beside the sea, which a short time before I had left so reluctantly. As we sailed up the bay, how eagerly my gaze was bent upon every well known object, and how I longed to again set my foot upon the crowded mole of the city.

"It was not until dark that the packet dropped her anchor, as the wind was light, and during the afternoon we had made but little progress. But, when at length the mud-hook was fairly on the bottom, I hailed the captain, and requested a boat to convey me on shore.

"'Holo, you must be an Italian, I should judge by your actions,' said the skipper. 'Now tell me, isn't there a lady somewhere that interests you?'

"'I cannot answer that question,' said I, 'but will you set me ashore?'

"'Certainly, if you wish it; I am just about to leave the ship myself—so get ready.'

"In a few moments one of the quarter boats was lowered down, and hauled to the gangway, and jumping into her, the men shoved off, and I was quickly land on the mole of the city.

"I had but just reached the shore when the clanging of a hundred bells told that a fire had broken out, and was raging at the most uncontrollable fury; crowds were flocking to the scene, eager to arrive at the scene of the conflagration, and impelled by a natural curiosity, I followed the dense mass of human beings crushing forward, and soon found myself in the main plaza of the city.

"At this point the devouring element was raging with the most ungovernable fury. A large palace-like building was completely wrapped in flames, and twenty or thirty engines were playing upon it, but apparently without any effect. Soon the word was passed that a young lady was in one of the upper rooms, and must inevitably perish if not immediately rescued.

"'Will no one volunteer to save the girl?' inquired a venerable-looking old man, coming forward, and crying out at the top of his voice, 'five thousand pesos to the man who shall rescue my daughter!'

"Still no one offered to run the fearful risk. The danger was too great, and the Spaniards are proverbially careful not to put themselves in harm's way when it can be avoided. A ladder had been raised to the roof, and in order to save her, it was necessary for some one to ascend it to just abreast of the window of the room in which the lady was imprisoned by the flames, which was something like sixty feet from the ground, and then to jump from one of the rounds of the ladder, a distance of at least six feet, into the apartment, where by means of a rope he must lower her down to the pavement, trusting to good luck and circumstances to make good his own retreat. You will see at once that it was a most perilous act, and it is not to be wondered at, that of all the immense assembly, not one could be found to attempt it.

"Just at this crisis, the young lady herself appeared at the window, and although pale as death, her bearing was firm and self-collected, and seen as she was at the centre of the window, her features lit up by the devouring flames that were leaping and crackling on every side, she resembled some beautiful Madonna, with dishevelled hair floating loosely over her naked shoulders, framed in the wall of the burning palace. One look at those peerless features sufficed for me; I could not be mistaken. It was the same lovely creature I had rescued from the bandit! Just at this moment the old man, her father, who had gazed with agonizing looks upon his child, without the power of assisting her, again called out:

"'Will no one venture to ascend the ladder and save my child? Must I see her perish before my eyes? Were I not so old, you would soon see how I would fly to her rescue! Ten thousand pesos to the man who shall deliver my daughter from the flames!'

"'Look here, old gentleman,' said I, coming forward from among the crowd, 'I don't want your money, because I've enough of my own; but, tell me, if I succeed in rescuing your daughter, shall I have her for my wife?'

"'Hem!' answered the old man, dryly, and casting his eyes upon a tall military officer near by, who did not offer to move a peg in the matter himself, but who scowled upon me from beneath his shaggy eyebrows, 'I don't know about that, young man. Who are you?'

"'That matters not, sir—if I save your daughter, will you give her to me for my bride?'

"Again the old man cast his eyes upon the officer, as if hoping that he would bestir himself in the matter; but he did not; he only regarded me with a snake-like glance, and with a look that seemed to say, 'I should like to see your winning hope, old fellow.' Finding, however, that there was no hope in that quarter, the father of the girl turned to me steadily for a moment, and then hesitated. It was quickly broken, however, by a scream from the young lady, followed by the crash of a portion of the roof, which fell to the pavement with a terrible velocity.

"'Quick, good, my lad! Quick, be quick, and save her, and she is yours!'

"I did not wait for further inducements. Tearing off my coat, I seized a rope from the hands of one of the firemen, and rushed to the window where stood the lady imploring my succor. The window was a little sixty feet from the ground, and when at length I came abreast of it, I found I should have to jump at least six feet to reach it. It was a fearful leap, for, were I to fall but one inch short of my mark, all of science in grasping something, I well knew that I should be dashed a helpless mass upon the pavement below. However, I must risk the daring venture, nothing saved, so here goes! With a desperate swing I threw myself forward, and just caught the edge of the window sill, and there, with my left hand I clung suspended until the young lady seized upon me, and locked me into her embrace. The rope which had been given me at the foot of the ladder, I had coiled around my neck and shoulders, and was now in a situation to render effectual assistance to the child of my heart.

"No sooner did she behold my face, than she recognized me as her former deliverer, and forgot for the moment her thanks and gratitude, unmindful of the perils by which she was surrounded. But I cut her short, pointed to the blazing roof above her head, and assured her that no time must now be lost. Making fast the rope around her waist, I lowered her in safety to the pavement, where she was received in the arms of her delighted father, who bore her off amid the cheers of the vast multitude, which rose like the moans of the ocean upon some lonely and weary coast.

"Having succeeded in saving the young lady the next thing to be done was to save myself. This was no very easy matter, to be sure, but you know a sailor will always find a way to do anything that may help can do. After revolving for a moment in my own mind the best method to pursue, I at length made fast one end of my rope to a pillar of the apartment, and clambering out of the window, I lowered myself to the pavement, which I had but little more than reached when the roof and the entire walls of the building tumbled in with a horrid crash, reminding me of what must have been my fate had I delayed my departure another instant.

"With the destruction of that noble edifice the fire was completely checked, and the engines continuing to play upon the blazing ruins, soon put an end to the confusion and dismay.

"No sooner had I reached the ground, than I looked around among the crowd in order to find the lady I had saved, but she was nowhere to be seen. Some of the bystanders assured me that I had got my labor for my pains, that the old man never intended to ratify his promise, but only made it from motives of policy, and that now he had taken his departure, no one knew where, and I should have hard work to find my promised bride. And then the rude mob laughed as if they thought I had been a fool to risk my life to preserve that of an entire stranger. However, 'let those laugh who win,' thought I, for I knew well where to hunt for the lady, and so taking my way to the hotel, I threw myself into bed, and dozed the remainder of the night away.

"Early the next morning I was on my way to the little cottage in the suburbs of the city, where dwelt the lady of my love. I was not long in reaching the well-known spot, where so startling an adventure once befel me, and knocking at the door, I was kindly received by the father, mother and daughter, the latter of whom had informed her parents of my having twice rescued her, and they were of course very grateful to me, and willing to gratify the wishes of my heart, and also those of the girl herself, who loved me tenderly for the service I had rendered her.

"'But,' said the old gentleman, 'you must not expect to obtain her without opposition. The military officer whom you saw with me last night, and who receded from the perils of saving her life, claims her hand, and has a promise of the same from me. Now, although I revoke the promise, you must expect trouble with him, and so you had better be prepared for it.' Last night he attended my daughter to a party given at the palace of the Marquis Pontirov; but when the building took fire, while she was in the dressing-room in the sixth story, and retreat was cut off to the rooms below, he had not courage enough to dare anything for her rescue; and had it not been for your efforts, she would have perished. But look, there he comes now. Beware of him!

"I looked out of the window and saw him coming up the gravel walk towards the cottage, and at once I became convinced that he meditated mischief. He was dressed in the full uniform of a captain of the Spanish army, and a frown of blackness and hate was on his brow. As he entered the apartment, he called out:

"'Sir, what is this low fellow doing here?'

"'He is not a low fellow, Captain Cortez,' replied the old man, firmly, 'but a brave and generous gentleman, who has twice saved the life of my daughter.'

"'I care not,' cried the officer, scarcely able to express his anger, 'he must first fight me,' at the same time taking a pair of duelling pistols from his pocket, and laying them upon the table.

"'Very well, sir,' replied I, 'if that is your game, come on! We'll settle this little business on the green here.'

"The parents remonstrated, the daughter echoing their entreaties, and bathed me with her tears; but it was all in vain. We rushed out on the green; one, two, three—we both fired—and my rival fell dead! A bullet had passed directly through his heart, while I was unarmed!"

"And what then occurred?"

"O, the affair was hushed up, the captain was buried with military honors, and six weeks after I was wedded to the young belle of Cadiz, and took possession of a large estate given me by her father, where I passed the days in unalloyed happiness."

"And what else?"

"O, I'll tell you some other time. A breeze is springing up, so I must cut short my yarn."

"'Brace round the yards! Up with the fore-mast stud'n-sails!' cried the little mate, with his sharp, shrill voice, and so Ned Rivers, my noble watchmate, and myself separated to other duties, and the little brig sped merrily onward over the deep blue sea.

Some constables in Maine, hunting for rum, entered a house and found a woman rocking a cradle, and singing "Hush a-by-baby." Not finding "the critter," one of them, more cunning than the rest, made a dash at the baby-clothes, exclaiming, "Sweet little baby—how much it looks like its father!" And sure enough, so it did—for, lo and behold, the little offspring turned out to be a keg of rum with a nipple on it.

☞ Parson Brownlow says that every candidate for the Presidency has an especial friend in Congress who can vouch for his orthodoxy on all subjects likely to come into the canvass; and who is authorized to give any pledge in his behalf suited to any latitude, North or South, East of West, for California or Canada, Hungary or France, Heaven or Hell, and which is to be as binding as if it came from his own lips!—Especially is it understood that he is not to be a candidate for re-election.

Beware of Kissing.—The Cumberland Union says we heard a case talked off as being before the Baltimore Conference, in session in this place, which should render those preparing for the ministry shy of kissing—a young lady. A young man—Goodfellow by name we believe—was objected to on this score, but as it appeared he was about leaving some loved friends, and had kissed the old woman and all the rest, he was suffered to pass.

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Herald:—Allow us through the medium of your paper to inform the public, that our steam saw mill is in full opperation; and that we are ready and shall be happy to receive orders for lumber from all the friends of internal improvement.

Being situated at the confluence of three well timbered rivers we trust that we shall be able to keep on hand a quantity of superior lumber, and fill all orders with promptness and despatch We indulge the hope, therefore that we shall enjoy the patronage of the public, and that we shall by diligence render general satisfaction.

Our Engine is one of E Ames & Jas. D. Green of Baltimore, excellent machines—and the saw mill is patented by Page of Baltimore, and has so far worked admirably well; it is simple in construction, but efficient in operation, and saws our hardest wood with facility—success to the engine inventors.

We offer lumber at the mill seat at the following rates per. hundred feet.

Plank, Thick whitestone pr.	100ft.	$3	50
" Thin do. "	"	" 3	00
" Thick poplar "	"	" 3	00
" Thin do. "	"	" 2	50
" Superior lumber "	"	" 4	50
" Thin " "	"	" 4	00
Scantling whitmore board measure		" 2	50
" poplar "	"	" 2	00
Lathing per. 1000		" 2	50
Sheeting " 100ft.		" 3	50

Being novices at the business and having incurred heavy liabilities to commence our opperations, we can not venture to offer lumber at a lower price; but if our friends will encourage us and give us an opportunity to see what may be done at the business, we trust that we shall be able to conduct our operations with benefit to ourselves, our fellow citizens, and our country.

Address orders to A. W. Gardner Esqr Sec. L. S. S. M. C. The Secretary will promptly attend to all orders for lumber from any place in Liberia or elsewhere. The postage on all letters must be paid by the persons ordering.

Yrs. most respectfully.

For the Liberia Herald

Through the patrotism of our ladies, we have mounted a double fortified twelve pounder, that had been laying upon the sand and rusting for years.

The ladies of Liberia are not surpassed in patriotism by those of any country.

Buchanan.

For the Liberia Herald.

The Good Old Way.

Mr. Herald:—Will you suffer in your kindness, an unflinching friend of the present Administration to make a few general remarks and queries? Changes will come, and ought to come, when the majority of the wisdom of a Republican people sees them necessary. The need of a thing, should cause men to seek it, and without good reasons, men should beware how they move. I cannot say that I am crasy for "a change." I cannot bring out the strong reason for one. The real necessity has failed so clearly as some pretended, to move me. I do not wish to drop substance for shadow. An article well known to be of the very best quality; better than new to day, may not be laid aside for a shining tin-thing, that no power could better. The present is seen: the future unknown, and to come. I see that every day—that says if coming events cast their shadows before, if shadow is the shade of substance, that seems to cause the lover of solidity, to label some of these would be's with "Thin," "Meger," "Naught," "self-seeking," and in so doing no injustice is done to the quality, nor to the agents that brought it about: "all that shines is not gold."

Some men talk of making Presidents', as of making an idle hour! It is the fault of untried ambition to think great things of itself, when no one else thinks any thing of it, very honorable, but a fool. Such can in their idle conceit, do more than a man of knowledge, and would acknowledged ability! I am not of those who are said to bow to the opinion, that "we have but one man." (as the enemies slanderers, and God less inventers of the present goodly administration, in their lies and slander, preach). I spurn the idea. God will give our needs if we do right, But I tell you what I do say, Mr. Herald;—and say so earnestly.—Not every man learned in confab, and who can jaw in a town meeting;—not every cuttado planter;—not every one who tries to be a preacher;—not every half missionary;—not every starved empty headed attorney;—not every counter hopper;—not every embarrassed merchant;—not every wearer of an old second handed cocked hat;—good to prance our streets in time of peace, will make a President, for the Republic of Liberia; think they what they may. And king numbers, and princes majority, who are both too often when taking men merely numericaliy fools, had better pause and reflect. In every country, there are leaders of the people, men of reflection, who know how the thing exist, who hold it together; men of the burden and heat of the day. The elders of the people; sound men; safe men; true men the hearts of the country, known and read of all men, and who should be heard. We are waiting for them: why are they so silent, and we hear them not? Do they mean to say we are waiting for all this fog to blow off? and strangers are done shouting? I hope so.

Sound men, according to our Lord, "follow not a stranger;" strange men think they are getting very huge. They are some of them very dictatorial. Great ideas of running after new things are afloat. I fear them, I doubt them, I listen to them as a good musician hears a one-cent whistle. My heart says this teacher is of yesterday. I have seen such before, with well dressed words, stuffed with selfish pride, & ambition, and pretended patriotism, looking for the end without the means, coming before called,—running before sent. Their words wrankle in my ear; I spit them out of my mouth. From such, I pray deliverance.

I see men worthy of better leaders caught by strangers. I ask why was that man not heard sooner. Why did he tarry to this late hour, and now he is come, instead of making some provisions of his own, for himself and family, and be careful not to "forfeit his hand;" why is he finding fault with all before him, and so careful about what he has not tried to build except in words only? Asking and trying to get so much more than his share? I turn off and ask for—for the man of the soil. The Liberian. The pillar man, as being of old as well as to-day men—to give counsel, men of renown. Such and such only, I want to lead me. The movings of such Liberia should watch. Are they figuring very largely in calling of conventions to nominate Presidents? Excuse me, I am not against a change if we can change well. The time may possibly have come. The man can be found if we must. We have men of experience with good heads and sound hearts—if we look them out.

Still I am not crazy for a change.

I fear of whig, democratic, free soil and abolition parties, in the United States, sent up by the great parties, differing in politics.—In that great country, over three hundred years old, with twenty three millions of civilized, enlightened and christian people, strong, established, stand self-poised and erect. But I am in Liberia, a child, hardly numbering ten thousand,—Such struggling still for life and existence, surrounded with hosts of untutored savages, that do not learn men very fast. The political parties do this convention business, to consolidate the party, fix the intrigue, raise higher the distraction. These parties spring from differences as to the best and safest modes of conducting the government, and ruling the people. But who are the whigs, and who the democrats, &c, of Liberia? I have seen nearly twenty years in it, and have missed them:—whence sprung they?—what their difference now? all hands go in for a change? I thought these differences were the deductions & productions of the profound statesmen, based upon—to him the strong reason and good policy? And not that a poisle of idlers, instead of being usefully employed, run over the land, for purposes of intrigue, and hope of being government housed, fed and clothed. Run over the land to make parties and call conventions in these hard times, without a reason? Will not those who rule—rule in the convention? If so why the expense and trouble? I have been asked if this "Venuum" nominate a man we think unfit, are we bound to vote for him? No: what must we do? Do like you have always done; vote for whom you may chose;—vote for the man of your choice freely. We have had our simple and suitable elections all this time, and they have done very well. Our people met in town-meetings, picked their men and voted for them; if they chose; "the longest pole knocks down the most persimons; all worked good until the continually defeated ever pushing themselves on the people, has at last deviled out a new plan, to do nothing. Who don't know electioneering policy, and voting promises? Who is so blind as not even now to see these office hunters dodging, wincing, changing, pledging, and watching the popular tide as it ebbs and flows—changing like the camelion, and looking among birds, and beasts, like the bat?

Buchanan Nov. 12th 1852.

Mr. Herald:—I feel sure, that it is a source of gratigcation to yourself and readers as it is, time, that we can inform you, that on the 9th, inst, a meeting of the stock holders of the Liberia Saw Mill Company, was held in the town hous of this city, when Mr. John Smith engineer and Mr. G. L. Seymore superintendent, announced to the company, that they had successfully accomplished the business with which they had been charged by the company; (viz: putting the saw mill in operation), and were then fully prepared from the quantity of logs collected during their progress, to secure any orders for lumber, and furnish the same, as the Board of Directors might direct. These two gentlemen are certainly entitled to the thanks and praise of their fellow citizens, for the assiduity and skill with which they have discharged their duties. From the time it was put in motion it has worked with almost undeviating regularity, attracting large crowds of spectators daily.

It cuts an ordinary size poplar plank in half a minute, and I am strongly of the opinion, that from the rapidity with which it cuts,—the almost unparelled abundance of timber up our rivers and the facilities, the confluence of our three rivers, afford, for getting all kinds of timber to the spot, it will prove a profitable affair to the stockholders and an incalculable benefit to Liberia.

The object of these lines is only to announce the good news to the public, that she is in successful operation.

The Secretary is directed by the Board of Directors to give you particulars.

Believe me as ever, Respectfully,

Yours,

STEPHEN A. BENSON.

From our Clay Ashland Correspondent

Mr. Herald.—In my first you represent me as saying "death-like" instead of "dearth like," and in my last you make me say "shades" instead of "bipeds;" will you please to correct? The people of this and other St. Paul's river settlements are grieved at an invidious arrangement of the military system as practised at present: i. e. that they should be required to assemble at Monrovia twice in the year for military parade, while the Monrovians remain at home for that purpose. They supposed that in a republican government the laws and regulations affecting the people, would be fair, just, and equal; but they hold that a law which requires them to go 5, 10, 15, 20, and 30 or more miles to Monrovia, through the inclemency of the weather, at their own expense to muster—getting there as they may, but to be in the line at the hour required of the Monrovians, and getting home as they can, and when they can after being kept upon hard strain of useless duty, until nightfall of Saturday, while the Monrovians are allowed to remain and muster in Monrovia, is unjust, invidious, and oppressive.

In view of this, several of the settlements intend holding meetings, or a joint meeting, to petition the legislature, or instruct their representatives to labor, to redress these grievances at the ensuing session. They question the constitutionality of the present military system, it is true, but they are willing (i. e. the St. Paul's river people are) to meet the Monrovians' on some central ground, say at Caldwell, once a year to muster, if not, they muster in their own settlements two or four times annually. These, Mr. Herald, seem to be their ideas in relation to this subject.

Politics are in statu quo

Mr Herald:—Allow me a space in your columns to acknowledge the receipt from the United States, of a large assortment of elementary and other school books, together with a few miscellaneous works for the benefit of schools in the Republic.

These books arrived in the brig Helen, lately from Baltimore, and were kindly forwarded to my address, by Wm: Jenkins, M. D. of Cincinnati, Ohio, to whom I am pleased to record the expression of my sincere gratitude, and that of the people of Liberia, for the deep interest which he has thus manifested in our welfare.

It is a source of no small satisfaction to find that the mental culture of Liberian youth is gaining the attention of our friends across the waters. These books have come just at the time when they are especially needed—and are another among the numerous evidences which we have from time to time, that Liberia, though sometimes misrepresented and traduced, is not forgotten by the good people of America

Yours truly.

Historical facts or the first reformers of Spain. Continued.

Nor is this a solitary instance, of Spaniards of high stations and occupying influential offices, in the church, all proved from history to have maintained in early ages the same opinions which formed in the sixteenth century the basis of the protestant movement throughout Europe, Claud Bishop of Turin, a name memorable among the early fathers of the church, condemned in the very strongest terms not only the worship of images and the veneration paid to the relics and sepulchers of the saints, that he so far opposed himself to the devotees of superstition, as to maintain on the authority of the earlier councils of his native church, that no pictures or statues should be admitted into churches, and nothing painted to be painted on their walls by which the most ignorant could be deceived in, so far as to be induced to worship or adore, wise indeed was this pious and holy catholic Bishop, of our holy church, for when there are images of saints set up, the ignorant leave that which is signified, to worship the symbols. How strangly does this contrast, with the present state of Spain

When a recent traveller there, that intelligent and most interesting observer, the author of the Bible in Spain had completed a tour through a large portion of the country and witnessed the manners of the people and the nature of their religious worship, he felt compelled to acknowledge the devout observances of the ignorant Mahometans of Africa to be more consonant with the symplicity of the worship of God, than the bigotry of the Spaniard with his image of the blessed virgin, elevated in every cathedral and church. This perverted system of mediatorial intercession, he pronounces a gross and idolatrous superstition, that shuts up from a benighted nation, the only access to God, even the blood of his dear Son.

It is interesting however, though a painful study, to investigate the history of this people during the long lapse of time that intervened between the seventh and the nineteenth centuries, it has not been by any means so unbroken, decent from light to darkness, from light to little light to less. Spain on the contrary enjoyed many of the same—advantages which contributed to such glorious results, in the history of the now enlightened nations. She had her Bible and her reformers, and her martyrs for the truth as well as England, she had her struggle for liberty of conscience and the victory of truth as well as we, and when the dawn of a brighter day on benighted Europe broke first in the diffusion of learning—proving how clearly scriptural truth is born of the light and cometh to the light, that its fruits may be seen, may be manifest unto all. then Spain partook largely of that promising influence and added to the literature of Europe, some of those valued treasures which we still most esteem, for the pure doctrine on the one hand and the beauty of literature on the other which they contain.

Let us take a hasty glance at this interesting country and at the incidents that characterize its upward progress to such a magnificence, and its fall back into the degradation in which it has so long been sunk, a degradation far more painful to look at than the untutored barberism, on which the Roman legions burst with harsh but vivifying influence, and on which the teaching of the great Apostle of the Gentiles fell like the refreshing dews, that wakes up the parched earth and withered mead to burst forth into newness of life, showing to the ravished eye a healthful green (q) not that the conquest of nations, through carnage and blood shed, is commendable at all but it appears to be, something like divine decree that, the foot steps of the great apostle should follow the flying legions of the Roman Eagle, with the banner of the cross.

There is something majestic says a recent writer on the Geography of the Peninsula, in the claim the appropriation of that word though it must be applied often on a larger scale. The Atlantic Ocean rolls upon its western shores, the Mediterranean, sea girds its eastern cliffs, the bay of Biscay defends it on the north, the straits of Gibralter guard it on the south, that lofty, naked rock the Calpe, the pillars of Hercules, according to ancient nomanclature and methology—rises as a natural bulwark a defiance point a throne from which to rule the subtending continent, a palace, in which the ancient god terminus might dwell; from the opposite boundary, the pyrences heave up their granites—a barrier and rampart which no ordinary foe can contest, throwing vast shadows upon the plains beyond them enclosing ancient monarchs in their bosom, their foundations on Leviathan, their pinacles in the clouds their declivities in the waves.

But for a nation thus—situated and blessed by nature in such a high degree to suffer its privileges to be curtailed, and as a whole to be enslaved under the galling yoke of superstition, is appallingly to think upon, how greatly infatuated must a people be who for outward pomp and show, forsake the worship of the true God, for that of images, and other vain things which by no means profit the immortal soul. But in sorrow be it said, such is the state of once happy Spain at this day, and while we mourn over her follies how earnestly should we pray to almightly God for grace to enable us to shun that dismal path which led her down to that low spiritual condition in which the true worshippers of our Lord Jesus Christ now behold her with weeping eyes. * * *

And there is no interest to be taken in the history of England. Its stain is that of lofty heroism it is not only diversified by incident, but pregnant with principles it is a thing of range, of marvel of moral might, like the rainbow of heaven, large in its span and wide in its embrace. But alas it tells of no departed tempests of no settled calm, the vermilion of war reddens it, and the reflection of roosted light blends it.

(C) True indeed England has come down through many struggles, and has gained many honorable victories, which causes her to shine as a blazing meteor in the world, while we gaze at her through the vail, but alas when we look beyond a bloody stream, a vermilion sea, meets the eye of the enquiring lover of history, while the thought ripens into maturity, and the expression breaks forth, such is the history of man, such is human greatness.

It is indeed a story that stands alone in the history of nations, and one pregnant with lessons of deepest interest to the faithful student of history. We have seen, the state of comparative independence and purity in which its church remained in the seventh century and how—decided was the independent position it assumed when contending for liberty of conscience and freedom of thought against the encroaching tyranny of Rome. The following century however witnessed its struggling at a disadvantage with a very different enemy.

After the overthrow of the empire of pagan Rome and the incersion of the Gothic nations of the north into the ancient kingdoms of Southern Europe Spain had experienced similar influences to those which produced such remarkable changes in the Italian peninsula. A Gothic power had gradually arisen there and was moulding the whole nation into form and consistency, when a far different current setting in from the south, and east produced the remarkable changes to which we have already alluded, as exercising so much influence in the formation of the Spanish national character.

In 711 the great battle of the Guadalete was fought near Xeres, in which the standard of the crescent was borne victoriously through the ranks of the Spanish forces, and the kingdom of the vizigoths was over thrown. But although their power was thus prostrated, the spirit that had pervaded their rule was not so easily extinguished, Spain was indeed conquered, and in the Moslems power,—Roderic, the pesoic, leader whom the Spanard still commemorates in the traditional songs and legends of his native valley, had perished in the fight, and the christians of Spain were at the mercy of the infidel. The Saracens however were by no means the barbarians that superstitious prejudice delights to picture them. They governed the conquered land with wisdom and moderation, cultivated the most valuable arts of peace, and settled themselves down as those who had come to possess and enjoy that land (q),—a land where the sun beams rest, when they promise the sons of the vale a happy and glorious morrow, they were content to enjoy that, sunny land in peace.

And can any man repel the thought that must arise here viz, that if instead of the sword the gospel of peace had been preached to those highly cultivated barbarians that they would have improved under the banner of Christ, and their arts and sciences would have been a blessing to the world at this day, but alas for fallen man, blood, carnage and death mark his foot steps where ever he goes. Can any numbers tell the awful amount of injuiry done to the world at the fall of a nation by the sword; in one day and at one blow, the world may sustain an injury, that will require the time of 200 years to redeem, and it may be that redemption has no power, all lost forever lost. How earnestly then should we pray, that the sword should cease to devour, and that cruelty of every kind should be done away, and that the kingdom of peace and the religion of Jesus Christ our Lord should be built up and fully established on the earth. Mr Herald.

About twenty-days having elapsed since Fishtown was re-occupied, I now sit to pen you a few lines in relation to the same, for the better information of yourself and your readers. A few weeks after the return of the campaign from Trade Town in Janry. full and successive public meetings were held in this City by a vast majority of the more thinking part of our communities, for the purpose of adopting such measures as would lead to the re-settling of Fish-Town, which had been by the Legislature, a few months previously, incorporated into one settlement with this, under the name of the city of Buchanan. My health, owing to exposure during the campaign, being bad, I did not attend the first two meetings; but at the third, I was present and was much gratified in witnessing the unanimity of desire manifested for the consumation of our long cherished wish.

This latter meeting (held in March, I think,) appointed a committee to communicate with, and ascertain of President Roberts if he would make a grant of a town, and farm lot to a definite number of old settlers, if they would engage to go down as permanent settlers with the immigrants by the Zeno and Morgan Dix who had been sent expressly for Fish-town.

President Roberts in a communication to me, replied, that such a grant would be made to any number not exceeding twenty old settlers; and that such was his desire that Fish-town should be occupied—permanently, securely and immediately, as that he would assume the responsibility of allowing the immigrants, that would go down with the twenty old settlers—a farm lot in addition to the town lot they were entitled to draw.

The rainy season having so far advanced before an organization could be effected, and it not being deemed prudent for the immigrants to go down at that stage of their acclimation without good shelters, it was determined to postpone further action (more than going down and cutting bush occasionally) until the beginning of the dries, when the place was to be re-occupied permanently. Consequently in the months of Sept. and Oct; successive public meetings were held and the twenty old settlers and over that number of immigrants volunteered and organized themselves into a company.—Capt. Brunskin was elected Captain, A. Rudd, David Mason, and L. Morgan, Lieuts. (men whose valor has been more than once tried,) they marched down on the 11th inst. determined to maintain the strictest discipline and die to a man before they abandon the place, of which they have held quiet possession up to this day, not a fishman having shown his face as yet. For seven months, anterior to the moving off of the volunteers for Fish-town, our settlement were at least every week excited and thrown into commotion: and the inhabitants prevented from prosecuting their necessary avocations. A canoe could not be seen passing to windward, though three miles off, without a false alarm, six natives were seen coming up the beach with rice—oil &c &c; with which to feed us, before they could reach town, imagination would convert them into the enemy, and the community aroused to arms. The fishmen too used to visit the Cove once in a week or fortnight to get potatoes and cassadas and to see if the progress we were making down there were such as to preclude their hope of our abandoning the place and their re-occupying it which they contemplated early in the dries. Add to this the fact that 9-10ths of the immigrants by the Zeno, Morgan Dix, Liberia Packet, and Ralph Cross, who came out expressly to settle at Fishtown (after once seeing that place) would not consent to settle elsewhere in Liberia, many of them proved to be men of industry and steady habits, & wished to be settled on their own land and was very unpleasant to see them of necessity walking the street, having no way to procure a livelihood, and frequently asking their brethren the old settlers, when will you assist us in possessing and occupying that place of our destination? How long shall we await your co-operation; we are ready to go down and do our duty like men—we had better do so than remain here idle and suffer. Let us go and possess the land at once for we wish to settle no where else in Liberia; we have many friends and volunteers who will be out shortly and we wish to be preparing a place for them—of course the old settlers responded to their reasonable appeal, and soon as the weather justified commenced action; and as the executive had not authorized any expenditure in the premises, many of the patriotic, old settlers contributed (in the total over $ 200) toward the support of the settlers (until their crops could mature) and for fortifying the place. Besides this, many of the first men in the county agreed to go down and spend a week with them day and night gratuitously, and after their return home to be in attendance there, at a moments warning in case of danger. There is one thing that does not admit of a doubt in the minds of us who live here and ought by this time to understand our affairs, that is if we had not occupied Fishtown so soon, the fishmen would have attempted it this month and had they succeeded any where in its vicinity and showed themselves regularly at the Cove, at least one half of the inhabitants of Buchanan would have moved to some other settlement not in juxtaposition to a ruthless enemy, and if Buchanan is once abandoned, Edina, and Bexley, will follow in the train being mutually dependant. It would have been a shame and disgrace to the inhabitants of this county, if they did not (when they really could) prevent a heathen enemy occupying the most desirable part of the city of Buchanan—a point hardly two miles from our doors. Why Sir, the ten sentiments of all with us who have the spirit of a man are that if Fish-town, (which is not a distinct and distant settlement to Buchanan) can't be kept by the valor and patriotism of the men of this county.—If our good citizens and especially the inhabitants of Buchanan would fold up their arms—parade the streets stare each other in the face, and let a heathen enemy to come within twenty minutes walk of their doors, their wives, children & property, when we are fully able to occupy that point by which means alone the enemy is to be kept away, it would be time for every man of sense and pride to leave the county if not the country. I assure you sir that death is preferable to such a state of things and so would most men in Liberia think if their lives, their wives, their children, and property, were permanantly located here as ours are.

The foregoing facts (and not fame, nor bounty lands) are what induced the Fish-town volunteers to forego the happiness of the domestic circle and to make a sacrifice from which some will not perhaps recover for a year. They were the inducement to the liberal contribution of so many of our patriotic citizens for to secure the desirable object 9-10ths saw plainly, that the Cove must be settled, at once, or the sooner the settlement in this county abandoned the better; and as our highly esteemed President Roberts had with his wonted sagacity and magnaminity encouraged the interprise so far as his authority and the circumstances of our Government justified, it became us as patriotic citizens of Liberia to accept the will of the Government for the deed, to gratefully accept of such aid as it could render and trusting in God, go forward in the discharge of our duty which was and is plainly marked out before us. The volunteers to Fish-town have not been idle they are prepared at any moment to stand as heavy (if not heavier) battle as this place Edina or Bexley, in fact with such officers and men as are there, whom I well know not every Fishman between this and Cape Palmas can take the place, many of them bear marks of honour about their body received in defence of their country, and Even David, (Mason) who slew Goliath, (Tappler) is among them—they are all in good spirits and with the assistance of about 40 native laboures, (bush cutters) who have been employed there the last three weeks they have the surrounding wood cleared, thus presenting an open view for some distance around and have fortified the garrison admirably well, erecting shantees, planting vegetables, and by the blessing of a kind Providence will in a few months be doing as well as any community in Liberia if not better. It is astonishing to see how the immigrants' health hava improved since going down, their spirits are revived they declare they feel better than they ever did before in Liberia—they are working manfully on their own lots, but all sleep in the garrison and will for months, or untill it is deemed safe to move on their own lots, and their lands, is convenient to the garrison. Some few citizens have had to advance something independent of contributions, to assist in the support of the settlers for a couple of months & fortifying the place & haying bush cut. They indulge the hope that the Govt: will reasonably consider the matter and re-imburse them, or if the government should not, they hope some other source will, and if they should be disappointed in this reasonable expectation,—why they must stagger the best they can under the sacrifice and that I hope without a murmur, I am Mr Herald as ever. Most Respectfully.

STEPHEN A. BENSON.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, DECEMBER 1st, 1852.

As we have repeated evidences of the interest which our friends abroad feel in the educational training of the youth of Liberia, and as it is a subject in which every Liberian should feel a deep concern; we have no doubt but that the following facts will be interesting to our readers generally.

During the past year two fine institutions of learning have been opened in our City—the Alexander High School" under the tuition of Rev. D. A. Wilson of the Presbyterian Board of For: Missions—and the "Bastion Seminary" under Rev. Francis Burns of the Methodist E. Mission. Both of these institutions are well attended.

We learn that the annual examination of Mr. B. V. R. James' school (an institution well known to our readers) took place on Tuesday the 23rd ultimo. The pupils had made encouraging progress. Among the institutions of learning in Liberia this school holds a respectable position, and, so far as numbers are concerned, takes the lead of every other. Mr. James has been under the necessity of obtaining the assistance of a female teacher who takes charge of the smaller children. During the past year the school numbered upwards of 70 scholars with an average of 60 in regular attendance; all the energies and efforts of the teachers were, as a consequence, in constant demand. On Wednesday the 23rd. being the anniversary of this school, the usual "Exhibition" was held in the Baptist Church. The house was densely crowded. The exercises being opened with prayer by Rev. E. W. Stokes, the choir sung the beautiful tune "Coronation," the hymn beginning!

"Come children hail the prince of peace"

After which the children began to recite, several interesting pieces were recited, among which were a few original. We were particularly pleased with the piece entitled "The Bible" recited by a girl whose name we did not learn. The speaker seemed to enter into the spirit of her subject, and spoke very impressively. The exercises were concluded with an address on the benefits of knowledge by Mr. Edward Blyden.

The whole affair was quite interesting and reflects creditably on the talents and diligence of the conductor. We were well entertained, and left the house pleased that we had spent the evening so agreeably.

We cordially wish success to this institution and all others of a similar kind in Liberia. We hope that those who are engaged in the work of teaching the young, amidst all the labors and toils, may gather encouragement from the fact, that theirs is a "labor of love," that in the training of youth they are rendering an important service to their country and to the church—and thus, instead of feeling it laborious to teach they will be able to adopt as their motto those lines of Thomson—

"Delightful task! to rear the tender thought,
To teach the young idea how to shoot,
And pour the fresh instruction o'er the mind."

President Roberts had completed his business with Her B. M's Government, and he expected to leave for Liberia in Her Majesty's steam ship "Dee," on the first of November.

The Legislature will meet on the 6th: inst.

POETRY.

'TIS NOT FINE FEATHERS MAKE FINE BIRDS.

BY J. K. CARPENTER.

A peacock came, with his plumage gay,
Strutting with regal pride one day,
Where a small bird hung in a gilded cage,
Whose song might a seraph's ear engage;
The bird sang on while the peacock stood
Vaunting his [illegible] the [illegible] brood;
And the rad[illegible] sun seemed [illegible] bright,
Than the [illegible] basked in his [illegible] light.
But the sw[illegible] to his own sweet notes,
"'Tis not fine feathers make fine birds."

The peacock [illegible] a bird so [illegible],
Never before had ventured there,
While the small bird hung at the cage door—
And wh[illegible] a peacock [illegible] more
Alas! the bird of the rainbow wing,
He was [illegible], he [illegible] sing!
And they who gazed on his [illegible] light,
Scared by his screaming, so [illegible] flight.
While the [illegible] in her own sweet [words,
"'Tis not fine feathers make fine birds."

Then pray take warning maidens fair,
And still of the [illegible] beware;
Beauty [illegible] our way;
Though they're attired in plumage gay;
[illegible] know,
[illegible] outward show,
[illegible] gift of mind,
Or else poor beauty is left behind!
While the small birds sing in their own true [words,
"'Tis not fine feathers make fine birds."

THE WHITE MOUNTAINS.

The everlasting hills of God,
How awful here they rise,
With paths no human foot hath trod;
And tops that reach the skies.

For ages they look down on man,
And mark his varied lot—
St[illegible] in their caverns deep,
The changes time hath wrought.

How small, [illegible] weak, and low I am,
As at their base I lie,
Fearing to scale their summits vast,
No wing to soar on high.

Tremble my soul, the Lord is here,
Be silent and adore;
As more his wonders strike my gaze,
Aspire to fear Him more.

Yet listen, there's a gentle voice—
Long has the promise[illegible]—
The mountains tell the Lord is great,
But whisper 'God is good.'

For as on Zion's ancient site
The sacred hills look o'er,
The Lord around His people is Henceforth, and evermore.

While Alstarmi paced [illegible] dexterity, one of the [illegible] camp, came into [illegible] the intelligence that the Arabs, [illegible] Irak, prevailed upon by the [illegible] of some of their coun[illegible] the terror, and fearing the power of [illegible] Persia had [illegible] behind the E[illegible]hrates, and voluntarily sent offers of reparation to the King.

As if a mountain had been removed from his [illegible] was the relief of Alstarmi as he listened to the words. "Blessed be God for the deliverance," he exclaimed, when the attendant had retired. Light lay the slumbers of repose that night upon the eyes of Pierre Alstarmi. His first suggestion when he awoke confirmed the resolution which he had deeply made, of returning home at [illegible]. The gentle affection which had arisen in his heart perished in the stronger agitation of his breast. The vehement sense of duty which now urged him drove away the mild selfishness of love. Indeed he looked upon Emily with a [illegible] feeling, as a being who had restor[ed him] to reason and virtue. He determined at once to take leave of her, and then to seek the shores of the Mediterranean.

Meanwhile Ismail had followed up the designs which we left him arranging, and had been appointing energetic and judicious measures for the resistance of the enemy, when the intelligence reached him of their having retired. Ex[illegible] the escape of his country from the sufferings of war, the event occasioned no relaxation in his ardor, for a [illegible] so decided, being once excited, was in little danger of being ever extinguished. He resolved even more [illegible] to consolidate its strength, and now for the defence of the country, [illegible] once to make a progress through every part of his dominions, and [illegible] It was amazing to see [illegible] summer [illegible] Alstarmi [illegible].

THE SECRET VAULT.
A TALE OF VIENNA.

BY SYLVANUS COBB, JR.

CHAPTER I.

The wall-bound city of Vienna, nestled in its fertile plains between the dark, rolling Danube and the overtopping Vien, was just receiving upon its lofty spires the last rays of the setting sun. A warm, calm day in June [illegible] about [illegible] began to impart to the atmosphere [illegible] invigorating power. [illegible] the streets are [illegible] towards the [illegible] a small [illegible] at a [illegible] sixty-five winters, and from his present appearance, [illegible] years [illegible] Vienna who [illegible] the poor mason, R[oland] E[ppendorf] [illegible] support [illegible] yet his wants [illegible] scanty [illegible] charity.

Eppendorf sat and smoked over and anon [illegible] that stood upon the [illegible] passed two hours after the sun had gone to its rest. He was just upon the point of rising to enter his humble dwelling, when he observed some one approaching from the centre of the city, and feeling a natural curiosity to see what a well dressed gentleman could want in that part of the town, he [illegible] man.

"Does there one Roland Eppendorf dwell hereabouts?" asked the stranger, as he came up the door.

"In truth there does, good sir," replied Roland, as he cast a curious glance over the rich dress of his questioner.

"Where could I find him?"

"Here, sir, and at your service."

"You!"

"I am Roland Eppendorf."

"[illegible]"

"Exactly."

[illegible] who was a man of some sixty [illegible] the mason with a [illegible] look, and after being satisfied with [illegible] survey, he asked,

"Have you a room [illegible] we could repair for a few moments?"

"Yes, sir," replied [illegible] follow [illegible] I will show you."

As he spoke, he led the [illegible] the short, narrow entry, and turning to the right he entered a small, dingy room, in which were a table, two chairs, and a low bed.

"Here we are," said the mason, as he closed the door after his visitor had entered; "just let me light my candle."

The tinder box was procured, and in a few moments a tallow candle was burning upon the table.

"Eppendorf," said the stranger, as soon as his humble host had seated himself, "I believe you have no family."

"My self and my cat compose my whole household."

"Then you are just the man I want. How would you like a job that will fill your purse with gold?"

"Nothing would suit me better," returned the [illegible] his eyes sparkled at the bare idea of [illegible] gold.

"[illegible] you cannot return here until the work is [illegible]."

"If I can only eat and sleep, I shall care not for that."

"Of the former you shall have plenty, and of the latter you shall have as much as you need; but," continued the stranger, "the work will require the tact of an experienced workman."

"Vienna does not contain a piece of masonry that I cannot equal," said Eppendorf, with a [illegible] of pride.

"So far, so good," the stranger returned, while a look of satisfaction beamed upon his countenance, "but there is yet another thing."

"[illegible]"

"[illegible] allow me to blindfold you, and you [illegible] keep secret the work which you [illegible]."

[illegible] moments in silence. To [illegible] blindfolded through the city [illegible] was not so agreeable; [illegible] upon him, and he [illegible] to the compact, [illegible] as he noticed the [illegible].

"[illegible] you my object. I am an old [illegible] have, during a lifetime, amassed large fortune, and now I desire to have a secret [illegible] where I can effectually [illegible]."

"I will build it, and agree to your terms, provided you pay me well."

"What [illegible] to one hundred ducats?"

"One hundred ducats!" exclaimed Eppendorf, fairly starting from his seat at the bare anticipation of receiving such an amount.

"Yes, [illegible] in gold."

"I will go."

"[illegible] swear to keep the secret?"

"[illegible] most sacredly."

"[illegible] come on."

As the stranger spoke, he drew from his pocket a silken handkerchief, with which he effectually blinded the mason; and having done this, he led him forth into the street. At a request from Eppendorf, he locked the outer door and handed the key over to its owner, and then started off. For a good hour the mason was led on his darkened way, by a varied, circuitous route, and at the end of that time he was led up a flight of stone steps, after which he knew that he had entered a spacious mansion. To be sure his power of seeing was gone, but then there is something about the atmosphere of a stately [mansion]—a sort of perfume arising from the rich furniture, and a coolness from the smooth marble pavement, that cannot be mistaken. Eppendorf was led through several passages, down two long flights of stone steps, after which the bandage was taken from his eyes, when he found himself in a low arched passage, lighted only by a lantern, which his guide held in his hand.

"This way," said the stranger, as he started forward, and at the end of a few moments they had traversed the long passage, and stopped by the side of a dark looking hole, where one of the wide stone slabs appeared to have been lifted from its place, and up through which projected the end of a ladder. On all hands lay heaps of [illegible] stones and mortar.

"[illegible]" called the old man, as he leaned his head [illegible] the hole, "come up here."

In a few moments the head of a man appeared above the flags, and its owner soon stood on the pavement beside them.

"[illegible] Gaspard, is the mason who has con[illegible] build the vault," said the apparent owner [illegible] and you will render him all the [illegible] you can."

[illegible] Eppendorf, he continued:

"[illegible] you [illegible] stones and mortar, together with [illegible] requisite tools, sufficient for the work [illegible]. Gaspard has the plan of the vault, [illegible] will easily make it out if you [illegible]. Let the stones be [illegible] even [illegible]—and, above all have [illegible] the work as smooth as possible. Beyond in [illegible] room, you will find [illegible] are well supplied with [illegible]."

During three weeks Roland Eppendorf and his assistant worked on assiduously at their task. Every morning their mysterious employer brought them food enough to last through the day, with oil to replenish their lamp, and gave directions about the work. On the morning that closed the third week, the mason reported that his job was completed, and their employer descended with them to examine the result of their labors.

The vault was about twenty feet deep, perfectly round, being twelve feet in diameter, and the top gradually curved in, till it reached the movable slab, which formed a sort of arch to the whole. The employer gazed around with a careful eye, and after having expressed his entire satisfaction, he started to ascend the ladder. Just as he reached the top, his hat fell from his head, and turning back, he called upon the mason to pick it up. No sooner did the mason and his assistant stoop—one to hold the light and the other to [illegible]—than the old man sprang quickly upon the pavement above, and drew the ladder up after him!

Roland Eppendorf cried aloud to be released from the vault, and so did his companion; but they called to a man who knew not mercy. The old villain threw the ladder on one side, and then moved the wide stone slab [illegible] were it swung a moment, as though it [illegible] upon pivots, and then, as he placed his foot upon a small spring, it ceased its vibrations, and with a sharp click, it came to its place. There it rested, so like its neighbors that no one could have mistrusted that it was different from the rest. The old man had accomplished his purpose. The secret vault was constructed, and the only living beings, beside himself, who knew of its existence, were incarcerated within its massive walls!

"You may cry out till doomsday," muttered the villian, to himself, as the dull sound of the poor men's calls fell upon his ears; "no power upon earth can release you from that prison. You built it, and you should know its purpose. They will suffer but a short time,—death will soon still their hearts!"

As he spoke, he moved the ladder away into another place, and gathering up the tools, he deposited them within a small cell which led out from the passage a few steps from the secret slab, and having locked the door, he took up the lantern which he had brought with him, and made his way out from among the vaults.

Go [illegible] old man, and as you go, take with you the memory of the deed you have done!

CHAPTER II.

One of the noblest residences in Vienna, situated within a pistol shot of the royal palace, was that of the old Baron de Sigefroi. What people thought of the baron they generally kept to themselves, for, at the period of which we write (1782) the less people expressed any thoughts against the nobility the [illegible] were off; but what people said [illegible] have been all very well, for he was [illegible].

In a sumptuously furnished apartment of Sigefroi's dwelling, sat the lady Celeste, [illegible] child of the old baron. Other children had been given him, but only the youngest was permitted to live. She was now in her eighteenth year, and was as lovely as the dew gemmed rose at early morn; nor was her loveliness of the form and feature alone, but the soul—[illegible], spoke out in her beaming eyes of gentleness and virtue, and of a goodness that knew no earthly trammels. Had she been less good, and more proud, she would have suited her father better; but as it was he loved her, and, as [illegible] tenderly.

By the side of Celeste, upon a low ottoman, sat a young man, over whose raven locks some twenty-one years had rolled, and [illegible] gazing into the face of his companion, [illegible] and yet half hopefully, it would not have puzzled a beholder to tell the thoughts that were burning in his bosom. Lubin Bronsdorff had been engaged as a music teacher to the [illegible], and for a long time he gave [illegible] lessons with no other thought than that of his glorious [illegible], alas! at an evil moment [illegible] young [illegible] out the teacher and his fair pupil for his [illegible], and when we see them now, they had already pledged their mutual faith.

"Alas!" said Lubin, as he [illegible] the [illegible] of his companion within his own, "I fear you speak too truly. Yet, why should your father object? I am a bosom friend of [illegible] Mozart, and the emperor himself has already looked favorably upon me."

"Yes, Lubin, I fear me our love is hopeless," returned the fair girl, while a [illegible] expression overspread her features; "for I know that my father has contracted with [illegible] Count de Gudios for a marriage between himself and me."

"But he surely would not sacrifice you to that graceless libertine!" uttered the young man, starting up with horror at the very thought.

"Ah! de Gudios is wealthy, and that with my father is all-sufficient. Then he has a [illegible] title, and that adds still more weight to the [illegible]."

"And you are to be offered up on the altar of avarice?"

"I fear so."

"No, no, it shall not be—it cannot be! I will myself see the emperor, and beg his royal interposition."

IKE DAYLIGHT:

OR,

THE SOLDIER'S DODGE.

A Sketch of Camp Life in Mexico.

BY CORPORAL WILDO.

"He had a tear for pity,
And a hand open as day to melting charity."

"It takes all sorts of people to make a world" our old grandmothers used to tell us, and a truer saying never existed. Without variety, life would lose its charms; and if all men thought and acted alike, there would be no room left for advancement or improvement. Men would then be in each other's way, like a parcel of pigs pursuing a rolling apple.

Were we to attend a ball, we would all, as a matter of course, select the belle of the room for a partner, and a row would be the natural consequence—that is something that the ladies have no particular partiality to. Therefore, it is essential that we should have "all sorts of people." Some to go aloft and furl the sails, while others hold the helm, to keep our vessel of existence off the numerous breakers that intersperse the sea of life. Every man has his peculiar characteristics, either mentally or physically.

A rare bird is Ike Daylight; his equal he never has, and I am pretty certain never will meet. The world would call him a "hard case," yet an honester or more open hearted fellow than Ike Daylight I never met. He was the life of our regiment during those long and lonely marches through the hot, sandy plains of Mexico. Ike was in my mess, and I had a good chance to read and study his character.

Often have I known him to share the last drop of water from his canteen with a suffering comrade. Selfishness found no seat in Ike Daylight's breast; what he possessed was freely shared with us all. Yet Ike, like all others, had his weak points. One of these was, he would take too much of the "craythur," when he could get it—as it was strictly prohibited in the regulations of the army. Ike would sometimes get, in classic parlance, "tight," or, in the vulgar way, "a brick in his hat," when, by some means or other, it would become known to Col. G——, of our regiment,—for we were not going to turn traitors, and inform of him,—when he was sure to receive a regular "setdown."

Col. G., for motives of his own, had a fashion of moving his tent from place to place, so that he rarely, if ever, let it remain two nights in one spot. This we supposed he did in order that he might better know what was going on in camp. By this little stratagem, the boys often came in contact with him, when they least expected or desired it.

We had been encamped for three or four days on the banks of a little brook of as pure crystal water as ever I beheld in that southern clime, when an incident took place, which I shall try to relate.

It was a sweet spot, that encampment; the cool, northern breezes were gently wafted down from the snow-capped Cordilleras, and cooled our weary frames. The water from the little brook hard by, seemed as refreshing to our parched lips as a glass of ice-lemonade would be to a heated dandy at a fashionable ball! But that which seemed to fascinate our eyes most at that time was a small doggery, or grog-shop, just a few paces beyond the little branch before mentioned. The boys had often meditated an attack on this tabernacle of sin; but the vigilance of Col. G—— had heretofore baffled all their attempts. Ike Daylight at last swore that "she was not agoin' to see so much good licker stand idle for want of anybody to drink it—no, not for all the colonels in the army."

"Boys," said he, "if you'll just promise to keep mum about it, we'll fleshen the nose in spite of old G——"

Well, as a matter of course, we all gave the required promise, and that night, about 9 o'clock, Ike took his canteen and started out on his enterprise. He managed easily to pass the guards, by letting them into the secret, and safely crossing the branch, reached the doggery in safety. Much elated at his success, Ike had his canteen filled with the "craythur," and after taking two or three hearty pulls he set out on his return to the camp. Crossing the little brook, he was in the act of passing a tent, when unluckily he trampled upon the tail of a Mexican dog, which belonged to some of the boys. The animal uttering a long yell ran behind the tent, whereupon a head popped out of the entrance.

"Hollo, soldier!" said a voice from the tent.

"What the duce do you want?" exclaimed Ike, turning round.

"What have you got in your canteen, soldier?" again asked the voice, which, to his horror, he recognized as belonging to Col. G——.

"Water, sir—water, nothing but water, sir," answered Ike.

"Let me see that water, soldier," said Col. G——, knowingly.

Poor Ike! He had no alternative so putting on the best face possible on the occasion, he walked up and presented his canteen for inspection.

G——smelled of it, and knowing a why or wherefore, deliberately turned it up, and emptied its contents on the ground.

"Now be making tracks amazing fast, and don't let me ever hear of your disobeying orders again," said he, looking hail-stones and pitchforks at Ike. Ike, as a matter of course, "scratched gravel," and left a blue streak behind

"Nor he didn't wait till after tea"

but he swore that "he would chaw the giraffe over old G——, if he was put in limbo the next day."

So on the next night he started out again—but this time he took two canteens with him, instead of one! At this time he met with no interruption, and had, one of the canteens filled with the "red eye," and as he crossed the branch on his return, he dipped the other full of water from the brook!

"I guess I'll head the old chap off now," he said to himself. He began to congratulate himself on his lucky escape, when he came full upon Col. G——.

"What! out again, soldier?" said he, in a severe tone.

"Why, yes!" said Ike, quite innocently; "I didn't know it was any harm to carry water to the camp"

"Water—fire water, I should guess," said G——; "let me taste it."

"By jingo, can't a feller carry a bottle water to the camp without bein' sarched?" said Ike, quite indignantly—at the same time presenting the canteen containing the water with his right hand, and holding that with the liquor behind him in the left.

The "dodge" succeeded, and the colonel becoming satisfied that it contained "nothing but water," returned it, as he said:

"I was mistaken—pass on, soldier."

"Wall, I guess you was," said Ike, and ex't.

* * * * *

That night we had a rousing time, I tell you, and a merrier crew never pledged in a bumper of good liquor. Many were the toasts drank on the occasion, and the last of all was:

"Ike Daylight and his 'dodges;' always successful."

Historical facts or the first reformers of Spain. Continued.

The history that follows is one of the strangest in the annals of great national events. For eight hundred years, the Saracenic power maintained its footing in Spain. It established itself in complete independence of all other powers, and had sprung from the fanatic zeal of the Arabian prophet's followers, it took up a position of high civilization and wise toleration, and yet during all that period the faith of the Spaniard unconquered maintained its vitality, while the spirit of self dependent nationality was maintained, and slumbered on to awake at length, and successfully to contend for independence. On the subject it has been remarked.

Our astonishment does not diminish when we behold the Saracen or Moor addicting himself not only to commerce but to agriculture. The use of irrigation the cultivation of plants, the production of sugar, show at once the habits of peace and the advance of sciences.

The princes of the line were like Omar, the lover and destroyer of learning, as some shines brighter in time, that of Alaeken, the collector of books and the patron of scholars during his succession's reign. The monarch empire was broken up and annulled, little principalities sprang out of it. Whence it may be asked, are we now to look for the christians God. He is not lost, of the twelve thousand body guards which the monarch summoned around him four thousand were always christians. Whatever we may think of the incongruity, such was the fact. (E) It is easy to see here that the Moorish kings in Spain might all have been made christians had not the avaricious spaniards backed by the powers of Europe there I for their gold, there were christians interspersed among the polished Moors who were eager to learn from them, arts and science and belis letters, who would have, no doubt been willing to have taught the religion of Christ, but alas, there is such an aversion of the white man, to the black man, that nothing will satisfy but utter subjugation, if not extirmination. But there is hope for the African through a channel that finds but one common level that is commerce, here all must meet on equal ground. We see that social intercourse fails on either hand, however much some well meaning parties on both sides may endeavour to give it a polished gloss, to keep the deformity in the matter under the vail. Such is the undeniable fact, but in commercial interests there is no distinction, and in this there is hope for the African, a hope now looming in the distance, that he will again arrive at his former grandure, redeeming his time under the peaceful reign of Christ but they had been thought generally well—governed forced to the higher parts of the country. They sheltered themselves among the Austrinas, they were not contented vassals, there was still a christian Spain. She did not forget, that all was once her own, of this we are not certain. She did not indifferently look upon the gleaming cresent. She did not ungrudingly resign her power and fame. They were soon seen pressing downwards upon the Ebro and Douro, at the close of the eleventh century they had victoriously approached the Tagus. There is now beheld a banner of no mean note. The Cid the Cid, is the battle cry.—The victory of Navas de Tolosa 1212 secured the safety and the deliverance of the christians, henceforth, they but little jeopardied. But the Arabian strength was not crushed. Retreating before the arms of those whom they had so long subdued, whom they had treated capriciously and some times truculently, they disputed each, fought with their face to the foe, while they retired from the ground they so much loved, nor betook themselves to an inglorious stand when they made good the possession of Granada for themselves. It was here that they exchanged the hopes of extension for those of defence. They found a natural fortress; they knew from the number of their enemies, that it was in constant seige. The mountains round about them were their arsenals, their lines, their redoubts, their gates. They could shut out the pursuer, or themselves could sally at will, many a foray did they wage; still it was a garrisoned nation. Sentinel called to sentinel, post signaled to post.

It was a region not only of security but of fertility and beauty, the vega beneath the capital laved by the Xenil was a plain, covered with miracles of vegetation. Lovely gardens bloomed grim defiles. Almeria and Malaga, unfolded their ports to the Baleanic isles and to the Levant. Therefore in the midst of the province overtowering the metropolitic height, the Alhambra out of which have marched fifty thousand warriors, whose frescoes of richest tint, to this hour are undimed, whose fountains still make mournful music in their play and [illegible] whose firmer architecture has not yet, (though they have stood the wreck of time for over eleven hundred years) begun to nod. Nature yet keeps her nobility amidst these proud monuments.* In these proud domes Africs pagan sons once bore sway, under the iron septre of Mahomets kingdom* and her dominion is only the more sweet for the shrinking away of man and his tumults. The golden citron flashes from its green leaf, the fair olive mantles, in its wide spreading luxuriance, and the Nighten-gale rest not from its lavish song.

(E) Such was the place in Europe where the African Moors settled down in as their nomd sporting among the hills and the valleys of this pleasant Eden, but the kingdom of the Arabian prophet was not destined to continue on European soil, it fell down to rise no more like its founder. But the christian at this day no doubt will ponder, think over the past and then enquire, was there no other way but this shameful, destruction and final extermination, could not the gospel have made a better conquest. But while we answer in the affirmative, we must also inform the enquiring christian, that these were times when human slaughter was hardly considered crime, and to kill a man for the good of his soul was called righteousness, again it was European Rome, or Rome in Europe, bearing what the pope would call his cross as the vicar of God, for the aggrandizement of that apostate church was called doing God service in the very highest degree the more blood shed and plunder the happier she is because the richer, these many hundred years has she oppressed and drank blood and is not yet satisfied and for her. Queen Mary in England, to use Foxe's words, for three years drank the martyrs blood, and died without her fill.

This course events is interesting in almost every view, but in none is it more so than as intercourse with the Moors affected the Spanish character.

From them it borrowed much of its stateliness, gravity and refinement. They were the most scientific and lettered people of their age, they were versed in astronomy, chemistry and mathematics. They venerated, Aristole, they were the earliest discoverers of gun powder, and to them we owe that which has produced far greater as well as far more benign effects, viz the invention of paper. Their presence enlightened, and dignified a people who afterwards conquered them, and who were now called to take a signal chief part and to exercise so stirring an influence in the Drama of the world. Nor is it less observable that between two nations so extremely opposite, there existed many original conformities. Both were of that temperament which is called the cavalier, there was the knightly bearing common to them, they were alike the heirs of a religious enthusiasm. They equally united the fierce passions of blood with the propagation of avengment of their most different creeds. They acknowledged mutual conditions of treaty or armistice or truce, they were honorable foes, they were generous rivals, and had not war been their national glory, or the threatenings of it appeared to them, exciting ambition or awaking fear, each might have been stimulating in social improvement, and hence their happiness. But this only historical conjecture for we cannot conceive that a people who were looked on as vassals by the proud Afin, could have been received as their equals l this the subtle Spaniards felt and saw, refore when Europe flocked to their aid, un-

the interdict of the Pope, the Spaniards emboldened and encouraged to fly to arms, l the ally of the great prophet, fell, not under nish valor, but under the blow of the strong d over powering arm of Europe. That the trines of the Imposter should meet a just reke on enlightened Europe, we do not wonder out had there not been a burning animosity the European breast, against African, would re not have been some other means resorted in order to establish the religion of Christ.
s must ever call for deep consideration.
it is thought that had it not been as above
ed, both nations might have resistlessly l behind their mountain battlements while ons had dashed themselves in pieces against base. But an implacable hatred had suc-ded to a political jealousy, fanaticism influenced it, and it became a plot of extermination.
Neither found occasion of boasting triumph of the Spaniard was bought at a price accompanied with a shock which no foreign wealth, which no distant settlements can ever compensate or repair (q) in the absence of the bold and intrepid African, in his grandure Spain with all her natural advantages, looks gloomy, feeble, in anarchal slanders; superstitious, ignorant, and idle. When the proud Saracen, left Spain to the power of the people, then she fell, and it is no lamentable, to behold, because her ancient grandure has ceased to be and al is the way-ward traveller exclaims I hear the glory is gone: (q)

Here then we find the formation of that peculiar national character going on, which marks the Spaniard, to this day, as a being differing in many respects from every other native of a European soil. It is desirable to watch its formation and diligently to note the sources from whence it sprung. Since to this must be ascribed much of the natural character, and history of these two remarkable nations, and thus the Saracens must be ranked among the reformers of Spain.

(q) These memoirs, reviewed back to the sixth century calling to their aid the transactions of the past to give weight and truthfulness to each consideration. Although much is passed over, yet a review of the dark ages cannot fail to be interesting to every lover of history, though in a community like the present, many may not be produced. If however there are Abraham's number, there will be an ample reward, and encouragement to continue to review. S.

To be Continued.

From The African Repository.

AFRICA AND ITS FUTURE.

The following thoughts are much condensed. They express my own views on the great scheme of Divine Providence for blessing Africa, and constitute the pillar of cloud by day and fire by night, to guide my judgment and my action, and give me confidence and hope in the regeneration of that great continent, and the deliverance of our own land from one of its greatest evils.

1. Africa is yet to be evangelized and civilized. This certainly rests on divine prophecies and promises. I need not here cite the testimony of the Bible.

2. History affords no instance of a great heathen nation, or continent, being evangelized and civilized by foreigners alone. They must begin the work, carry christianity and its institutions to them, plant the good seed, and lay the foundations of education of the social state. But the greater work of the universal diffusion of these through the nation, must ultimately be done by the natives, or their descendants trained and educated for this work.

3. On what continent, or among what christian nation of the earth, could the natives of Africa, who, either themselves or their children, are to be its future evangelizers and civilizers, have been placed where they would have obtained any correct ideas of civil and religious liberty but in the United States? We believe that, notwithstanding their oppression here, they have obtained better ideas on this subject than they could have found in any other country. This the love of gain has done, and made them slaves; and in doing this it has done an enormous wrong. There is no apology for it. Yet out of this enormous wrong, God, in his wonder-working providence, may, as he has done in a thousand instances, bring immense good to Africa.

4. The colony at Liberia has been, and now is, going through the same providential discipline which all christian colonies on heathen shores have ever been subjected to, and which have so at length flourished, as to extend their influence over the nation.

The Plymouth colony, good as were the men who composed it, did not for many years so grow and flourish, as to attract to any extent the attention of Europe, and thus to draw to it the ignorant, degraded, and vicious of the Old World, with no sympathy for the character and object of the pilgrims, as to overpower them by their number and thus defeat their design. Divine Providence permitted them to be hid in those sands and there suffer on, until by suffering they had laid deep, in their own character and principles, and by the future influence of their example of hardship, heroism, and faith in God's faithfulness, the foundations of a new empire of freedom. They must have time to gain strength by suffering, before they could bear the pressure of aliens and of evils from without.

Which of the nations now most advanced in civilization and christianity has not been subjected to an early baptism of suffering in its progenitors, or has not come up from early barbarism and slavery, by the aid of foreign christian men, carrying to it the Gospel and planting the seed of all which now adorns and blesses it?

We find in the history of the christian colonies on the coast of Africa, a course of providential discipline, of struggles and suffering, parallel with that of the Plymouth colony. We believe that this parallel will hold in the influence of those colonies on the destiny of Africa.

How common is it for us now to plead the sufferings and hardships of our pilgrim fathers, as a motive to urge our countrymen to spread and establish, over all this broad land, the civil and religious blessings derived from them. This is a common feeling, and an honorable and powerful motive. So one hundred years hence, and we hope in less time, the children of the colored men now in bonds in this country, or their grand children, will be found traversing the mountains and plains of Africa, as ministers of the Gospel and missionaries, pleading the hardships endured by their fathers in this house of bondage, as a motive to persuade Africans to spread the Gospel all over that great continent.

5. There is as much or more gold in Africa as there is in California. Gold is washed down from her mountains by rivers and drains to her plains and coast, just as it is in California. "The golden sands of Africa" are as true in reality as in poetry. It is said that England, by her commerce with Africa, has already taken away more than two hundred millions of dollars in gold. Not long since, an African chief, residing about one hundred miles from the coast, came to Liberia literally loaded down with ornaments of pure gold, and carrying a large cane of the precious metal. As the influence and power of those colonies extends into the interior, those deposits of gold will be discovered by intelligent and scientific men. Then the cry of gold will be heard, coming from the interior of Africa, as loud and as earnest as has fallen on our ears from California.

6. Our commerce with Africa will soon demand regular steam communication with her. A project for this is already before the public; and when this is accomplished, access to those colonies will be easy and cheap.

Then, too, will be heard from Africa, that startling cry, gold, gold, stirring the mind of the colored man here, and drawing him to Africa as that cry has stirred and drawn thousands from these States to California. Whoever lives to see the year 1900, will find as large an immigration of colored people going from this country to Africa, as we now see coming from Europe to us. Even now this tide to Africa is annually increasing, indicating most clearly the coming exodus. In the mean time, the Republic of Liberia will have gained a position of strength, prosperity and influence, to bear this pressure from without, and to assimilate to itself those foreign elements, and to use them for diffusing its blessings far into the interior.

Many of the pious colored people in this country will, ere long, be moved by the missionary spirit to go to Africa, for the purpose of aiding in spreading the Gospel there. From all we have been able to learn we believe that as large a proportion of these people are truly pious, as can be found among the white population. It is reported on good authority that there are 50,000 colored persons connected with the churches in South Carolina. We are safe in saying that at least half a million of these people have so learned and embraced the gospel, in the last one hundred years, in spite of their bonds and degradation, as to find their way to heaven. How many of these would have found their way to that world, had they or their fathers been born and bread in Africa? No thanks to Slavery for this, but adoration and thanks to that God who can thus educe such good, from the evil and wrong which man inflicts.

If this brief view of what we regard of God's providential plan for the regeneration of Africa is true can any one doubt the present and prospective importance and agency of the American Colonization Society. It has already done greater good than the present can appreciate. It has already been subjected to trials, discouragements and obloquy; the same course of discipline by which God, in his providence, educates and train those men, those societies, and those nations, which he employs and bless s, to do the greatest good to the human race.

Funeral Rites of the Chinese.

The following description of the funeral rites and ceremonies of the Chinese, has been prepared by Mr. Peet, as the result of his personal observation and inquiries. It is interesting both as exhibiting the opinions of this people in respect to the nature and condition of the soul after death, and as showing some of the obstacles which the gospel must needs encounter in its progress among them.

Immediately after the death of an individual, a hole is made in the roof of the house with a bamboo pole, to let the soul or spirit depart. It is well known that the common belief among the Chinese is, that each person has three souls and seven animal spirits; and the object of the above ceremony seems to be, to let the latter escape and fly away, to prevent their becoming injurious to the living. This is succeeded by another ceremony, called t'houng to peng; which means to remove a small garment, worn in front next to the body, in form like a short apron, containing a pocket for carrying money and other valuables. This is thrown away. "In order to assist the soul in the next birth." Here is distinctly recognized and taught the transmigration of the soul from one body to another.

The use of the pwang keo sai is another development of what is supposed to be the condition of the soul after death. This is a wooden frame, resembling a small round table, coming to a point in the centre, on which are suspended several tens of lamps all lighted, the largest being on the top. This is placed near the corpse soon after death, to give light to the soul. As the eyes of the body became dim, and are closed; so it would seem the soul is supposed to be in need of artificial light. The use of the "painted face," is another illustration of what is thought of the soul, after it leaves the body. Soon after death an artist is called to paint the face of the deceased, if not the whole body, in a miniature form; and this fixture is used as the representation of his personal presence during the season of mourning; which continues forty-nine days. Afterward it is laid aside, or exchanged for the ancestral tablet.

Previous to being laid in the coffin, the old clothes are removed, and the body is dressed in new garments, the best that can be afforded. Food is then presented to the mouth of the deceased; but it is not received; and it is immediately thrown away. A paper sedan is now prepared, brought into the presence of the corps, and burnt. The object is to convey the soul of the individual, in this way, to the invisible world.

After the body has been placed in the coffin, it is removed to the principal room in the house; when a large chair is placed near it at the head of the room, with the painted image of the deceased suspended from the wall behind. Then follows seong mah chea, literally the "mounting horse offering." The meaning seems to be, that, the soul is now, as it were, mounted on a horse ready to take its departure to the spiritual world. Food is consequently presented to it for the journey. Cooks are employed, whose profession it is to prepare food for this purpose. The best that the family can provide is made ready, and placed on one or more tables, which are arranged before the chair and the painted face. The relations and friends then partake of it and the soul is supposed to be present, occupying the chair, and enjoying the feast. This ceremony of providing a feast is continued on every seventh day after the death of the individual, till the seventh day has been seven times repeated, or till the forty-ninth day. In the case of a parent, the female portion of the household gather around the coffin and the great chair, about eight o'clock in the evening, and weep and wail and call upon the soul of the deceased to take rest. In the morning a bowl of water and a napkin are brought to the same place, when they invite the deceased to wash. A breakfast and dinner are also daily provided, and presented in the same way. One or more of the children (sons, if there be such) lie by the side of the coffin during the night, accompanying the soul during this season of mourning.

During the same period, usually preceding the seventh day, the priests are called in more or less frequently, according to the wishes and wealth of the family, to chant prayers, to deliver the soul from punishment, and to take away its sins. On these occasions a bamboo pole is erected outside of the house, from the top of which are suspended various figures made of paper, in the form of birds, lanterns, &c., to invite the assistance of spiritual beings from a distance. At the same time paper boxes are provided for the purpose, containing paper representing silver and gold coins, clothes, and other valuables, all of which they propose to transmit to the soul by burning them. On the evening of the fourteenth and thirtieth days of each month, after the forty ninth day of mourning the females of the family burn paper and incense, and present food and drink before the soul, which is accompanied with weeping and mourning. This should be continued three years, according to the custom of the Chinese.

There is a feast preceded with mourning and lamentation, which takes place at the house, and before the painted face and great chair, on the evening before the burial; which may occur in a few days after death, or it may be delayed for months or even for years. When the burial takes place, the relatives dress in white, with an upper garment of coarse brown cloth, the same that in Scripture is called sackcloth. Females put off their mourning at the end of the year, males at the close of three years. When they go out to bury, they take the small painted face of the parent and the ancestral tablet; and on returning home they burn the former, and set the tablet in its stead. On the evening of the fourteenth and thirtieth days of each month, incense and offerings are presented before this tablet. Offerings of food, with incense and paper money, are presented at the tombs once or oftener every year. So on the anniversary of the death of the individual, a similar offering is presented before his tablet.—The Richmond Religious Herald.

Our readers have already been apprised through the daily papers, of the intention of the Hon. Mr. Stanly of North Carolina, to endeavor to introduce into the House of Representatives a Bill for the disposition of the fourth installment of the deposites of the public money. On the 4th ult. Mr. Stanly, by unanimous consent, introduced the annexed Bill, which was referred to the appropriate Committee. We confidently look for a favorable report by the Committee; and we trust that the provisions of this Bill will meet the favorable consideration of Congress. Should it pass, it will place at the disposal of the States $468,360 75 annually for purpose of Colonization.

We regard this as one of the most important and least objectionable movements in favor of the free colonizing of the free people of color of the United States, who may desire to emigrate to Liberia, that has yet been suggested. And we cannot conceive any reasonable ground of objections to the measure.

We hope our friends will give their aid to this important movement, by memorializing Congress in favor of the passage of the bill.

A BILL

To authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit with the several States the fourth instalment of the deposites of the public money directed to be made with said States by the Act approved June 23, 1836.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be and he hereby is authorized and directed to deposite, as hereinafter mentioned, with those States that received the previous instalments, the fourth instalment of the deposites of public money directed to be made with said States, under the provision of the thirteenth section of the act approved the twenty-third day of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, in sums to which each State was entitled respectively to wit:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That to carry into effect the provisions aforesaid, for the purposes hereafter mentioned, the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States be directed to cause to be prepared a certificate of stock for each State, containing the amounts as specified in the first section, to be deposited with it, signed by said Secretary, and countersigned by the Register of the Treasury, bearing an interest of five per centum per annum, payable, half-yearly on the first day of January and the first day of July, commencing on the first day of——, in the year——.

Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, That this deposite is to be made with said States, to transport to Liberia in Africa the free people of color within said States respectively and to provide for and to educate said people, as each State entitled to the stock may direct: And when any State aforesaid by an act for that purpose, shall agree to accept the deposite and appropriate the interest accruing thereon for the purposes aforesaid, or either of them, the said Secretary of the Treasury, on being notified thereof by an authenticated copy of the act, shall deliver to the Governor of said State so accepting said deposite, the certificate of stock, prepared for said State in manner aforesaid, or to such other officer as the State may designate.

Sec. 4 Be it further enacted, When a State that accepts the said stock shall thereafter decline or omit to appropriate and expend the interest, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, the interest on said stock so deposited with that State shall cease, so long as the State shall thus decline or omit to carry this act into effect.

Sec. 5. Be it further enacted, The principal of said stock is not to be paid without the express direction of Congress.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That when said States shall have removed all such free persons of color residing in their respective borders, as hereinbefore mentioned, then the balance of the money to which they are entitled shall be appropriated by said States to the education of the poor, or to internal improvements within their respective borders, as to each State shall seem right and proper

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, DECEMBER 15th, 1852.

The Legislature convened on Monday the 6th inst. and the message of Vice President Williams was read the next day. We have delayed our paper in the expectation of the pleasure of furnishing our readers, with a transcript of it. We are sure that the document gives a concise history of the domestic concerns of the government, and recommends to the Legislature sundry measures, which, if adopted and promptly carried out, will, no doubt, have the effect of materially lessening, if not entirely abolishing the difficulties now existing between the Golah and Vey Chieftains. Mr. Williams, strongly urges the forming of a settlement at Grand Cape Mount, as the most effectual method of putting an immediate stop to the disturbances now existing, and in this opinion many of the most intelligent Chieftains concur. In equally strong terms, he invited the attention of the Legislature to the fact, of Boombo's having crossed the Little Cape Mount river with a band of warriors—attacked one of the most considerable towns of the inoffensive Deys raised it to the ground, murdered more than a hundred of its inhabitants, and carried off as many more into slavery. It is sincerely hoped, that some measure may be speedily adopted to punish this daring chieftian. The Deys are looking to the government for redress, & they should have it. They are true to their engagements with the Government, and as far as we know, gave no cause to Boombo for his unprovoked attack on their town, and murdering, and carrying into captivity hundreds of their people. George Cain of Grand Cape Mount is impreeated in this daring outrage. There are many complaints of an aggrivated character against Cain, and justice should be most rigorously meted out to him.

The affairs in Grand Bassa were refered to at length, and the recent apparent hostile attitude of Boyer and Grando, towards the settlements in that county, was properly descanted upon. It is now, however, pretty well ascertained that the large number of Fishmen, recently congregated at Trade Town, have returned to their homes, and taken Grando with them. Their reason for making such a hasty retreat, is not fully known. It may be, that their spies found the settlements too well defended with fortifications, and it is truly said that at no former period, have the settlements in that county been as well prepared to resist attacks, as now.

The revenue of the State, though as large as usual, has not been sufficient to meet the expenditures of the Government. The receipts are stated at $ 24,365 00, and the disburaments at $ 30,243 00; showing an excess of expenditure over and above the receipts of nearly $ 6000 00.

This excess is to be attributed to the large demand on the Treasury for the cost of the military expedition against Boyer and Grando in January last. Mr. Williams recommended an increase of the tariff, to meet in future, all such expenses, as there is no calculating as to the duration of friendly feeling with the aboriginees, especially, if the slave trade is attempted to be revived by them.

We learn that Chrispo, one of the slave traders of Gallenas notority, who it was said, intended to re-establish himself on his old cite, in the Gallenas river, for the prosecution of his nefarious trade, has reconsidered the matter, and gone some where in the river Sherbro. We expect soon to hear, that the British authorities at Sierra Leone, have found out his whereabouts, and given him a rough handling. It must be constantly borne in mind, that Prince Manna of the Gallenas, Prince George Cain, of Grand Cape Mount, and Boombo, of Little Cape Mount, are determined to use all their influence for the revival of the slave traffic, and to encourage the trade, will if they are not prevented, continue to create and carry on their petty wars against the weak and inoffensive.

The Stratagem.—It is known, that Boyer permitted the Fishmen to take Grando away, and in doing so, agreed on a plan with the Fishmen, to lead the Government to believe, that Grando contrived to escape from the country, and that no one now knows where he is secreted. It is contray to the custom of the country to surrender a chief for punishment and in the case of Grando, tho' Boyer was often tempted in the hope of gain, to deliver him up, yet the fear of violating so ancient a custom as that of protecting a friend & an ally, prevented him. It was determined by the chiefs of the Fishmen and Boyer, that a disinterested party should be procured, to visit the Government, and to assure it that Grando had succeeded in making his escape from the Trade Town country, and that it was not possible to ascertain his whereabouts, and that as the interdiction on trade was laid on certain points, on account of the aggressions of Grando, and through him alone, that the government had looked on all the Fishmen as enemies; and inasmuch as Boyer, in whose power Grando was, give assurance that Grando had escaped without his consent and contrivance, and as it is not now probable that Grando will ever again be in a condition to molest any of our settlements; and as Boyer professes a wish to be on terms of friendship with the government, that the Government would be solicited to raise the interdiction, and permit the people living in interdicted parts, to carry on business like their neighbors. The personage elected as the envoy, is one Brown of Settra Croo—he is a very intelligent croomen, and known to be sufficiently wily, to put the authorities on their guard when he presents himself Arrival of President Roberts.—Her Britannic Majesty's steam ship "Dee," G. T. Crosmith, Esq: Commander, arrived from England, on the 10th inst: with President Roberts and family—we are happy to say that they are in the enjoyment of good health. The British Government, after the completion of the business which carried the President to England, very kindly sent him home in a national ship. Preparations had been made by our city authorities to give the President a handsome reception, but His Excellency did not allow them the pleasure of carrying out their wishes. The first certain intimation that they had of his arrival was in a note received by Vice President Williams from him, stating that he would be on shore by the time the note reached the Government House. This information was rapily circulated, and when the President reached the wharf, a large number of citizens was there to welcome him. The "Ladies of the Literary Institute," however, would not be satisfied with thus being foiled by the hasty movements of the President, but about seven and a half of the clock in the evening, they went in a body to his mansion where they were most cordially received. The Directress of the Institute, Miss Francis Cyrus, then delivered a neat and appropriate address to the President, which he responded to promptly, in his most happy style. After singing the lines which were written for the occasion:—the ceremonies ended.

A public dinner was given at "Ellis's, "Naval Hotel" on the 11th, inst:—President Roberts, His Hon: A. D. Williams. & Chevalier Niteroi, were invited guests. Admiral Bruce was also invited, but excused himself on account of public business requiring his attention afloat. The entertainment went off handsomely.

First of December.—This day was celebrated as usual. Salutes were fired, and matters of business were partially suspended. A very interesting address was delivered by Mr. John D. Moore. The peculiar event which this day brings to our remembrance, is one of deep interest, as upon it was suspended the destiny of Liberia. It was the anniversary of that day when the little band of pioneers successfully defended themselves from the host of savages who surrounded them, and threatened their destruction.

President Robert's Message. On the 15th inst: President Roberts delivered his message before the Legislature. It embraced a complete history of all his doings while in England and France. We are delighted at the result of his mission to England;—Subjects of a perplexing character, and which in our opinion, were calculated to disturb the friendship which the British Government have constantly shown towards Liberia, are now favorable arranged, and we hope definitely settled. The President had many adverse circumstances, to contend against—the most unfounded charges, were brought against the people of Liberia, and they were to be met and refuted—this he done satisfactorily—and gained many strong and influential friends for Liberia.

The President, in his message, acknowledges the kind attention extended to him by the Governments of England and France: and makes gratifying mention of the interest manifested for the welfare of Liberia, and the assistance rendered him in the objects of his visit to England, by our old fiends S. Gurney, G. Ralston, Dr's. Hodgkin and Waterhouse, M. F. Tupper, &c. &c. Their Excellencies A. Lawrence and J. R. Ingersol, U. S. Ministers in London, are also mentioned as entertaining deep interest for the future well-being of our infant Republic. In France the President found in Admiral E. Bonet-Villaumez a warm friend to Liberia, and from the U. S. Minister in Paris, Mr. Reeves, he received every mark of attention.

The President's visit to France & his interview with the Prince President will—it is presumed, have a happy effect. The Prince President proved himself familiar with the history and present condition of Liberia, and assured the President that he had watched the growth of Liberia, with great interest, and would do all in his power to advance its prosperity—that he felt certain that Liberia would succeed, and that it was worthy the sympathy and kind feelings of every nation. The Prince consented to present to the Liberian Government several hundred stands of arms, and as many uniforms, and it is beleived, that an armed vessel will be presented also.

We have not the space to notice the message, at present at greater length, we hope to be able to do so in our next.

Funeral Oration.

PRONOUNCED OVER THE DEAD BODY OF HENRY CLAY, AT ASHLAND JULY 19, 1852.

By Rev. Mr. Berkley, of Christ Church, Lexington

A nation's griefs are bursting forth at the fall of one of her noblest sons.

A mighty man in wisdom—in intellect—in truth, lies in our presence to-day, insensible, inanimate and cold.

The heart which once beat with a pure and lofty patriotism shall beat no more.

The renowned statesman, who was learned in the laws of diplomacy and government, will never again give his counsel in affairs of state—and the voice which was ever raised in behalf of truth and liberty, is silenced forever.

'Indulge me in a remark or two, while I speak of him, and in consideration of the personal comfort of this immense assembly, my words shall be few.

This is neither a proper place nor a fit occasion to dwell on the peculiar and striking incidents of his public life and I mean to say a few words only of his character as viewed in connection with religion

We have not come here to weave a garland of praises for the fallen statesman, or to throw the incense of adulation upon the urn which encloses his ashes—but we have come here to pay the last offices of respect and affection to a neighbor and a friend, and to draw from the visitation which has stricken down one of the mightiest of our mighty men such lessons as are calculated to teach us "what shadows we are and what shadows we pursue."

Our venerated friend has been before the public eye for half a century, and for nearly the whole of that period in the occupancy of high public places. He has done the State great service. He combined in his character such elements as could make him no other man than he was, except that he might have been as great a soldier, as he was a statesman and orator. But the crowning excellence of all his virtues, was this—he was a Christian. As he was eminently open, candid and honest in his long public career, so he was deeply sincere in his adoption, as the rule of his life, of the principles of our holy religion.

Although the suns of seventy summers had shone down upon him before he made public profession of Christ, yet, when he did make it, he did it not mechanically, and, as matter of course, because he was an old man—he did it heartily and upon conviction, because he felt himself to be a sinner and because he felt the need of a Saviour. And when he came to make the inquiry, "What shall I do?" and it was told him what he ought to do—he did it gladly—he made haste to fulfill the purposes of his heart. And this great mind being brought to the investigation of the pure and simple doctrine of the Cross—new beauties, in a new world, broke in upon him, of the existence of which, to their full extent, he had not dreamed before. And I know that in times when he lay under the hand of disease, and of great bodily infirmity here at home, he clung to these doctrine, by a lively faith, as the highest consolation of his soul

Although he had his church preferences, yet the power and influence of the teachings of Christianity, rightly understood, gave rise to sympathies in his nature, which extended to all Christian people.

Surrounded, as he was, by the allurements and fascinations of a high political place, nevertheless, he strove to walk in the pure and perfect way, and, by a steady maintenance of the principles which bound him to religion and to God—like the eagle, with his eye fixed upon the sun his course was Onward and Upward.

And these principles, which our illustrious friend found so comforting and consoling in life, did not forsake him when he had nothing else on earth to cling to. In reference to some of his last hours, a lady, connected with him by family who recently spent several days at his bed-side writes: "He is longing to be gone, and said something of the kind to me, which caused me to ask him if he did not feel perfectly willing to wait until the Almighty called him? He replied, 'O, my dear child, do not misunderstand me. I supplicate him continually for patience to do so. I am ready to go—no, not ready but willing. Ye cannot trust in our own merits, but must look to Him entirely."

The writer adds, "He is the most gentle, patient and affectionate sick person I almost ever saw, thanks you for everything, and is as little trouble as he possibly can be."

And this is the power of religion upon a vigorous and discriminating mind—a mind fully capable of meeting all the great emergencies which have ever arisen in its collisions with other great minds at the bar, in the Senate, and upon the forum.

THE STARS IN THE STREAM.

Between the steep and sunny hills
That all the dreamy vale enclose,
With many a bright and graceful curve
A clear and placid streamlet flows.
There soft, green banks slope gently down,
And groups of fragrant trees bend o'er,
Fresh blossoms nestle in the grass,
And shining pebbles gem the shore.

Here in the spiritual night,
When all the glorious earth was still,
As if the hand o' God was spread
Above the deep woods of the hill,
A fair faced boy, with deep blue eyes,
And hair light sunlight's wavy beam,
Would come and set for hours, and gaze
Upon the thick stars in the stream.

He wondered why the golden stars,
That hung so far amid the sky,
Should also in the wave below
In such a trance of beauty lie
And there for many a balmy night,
He lingered by the silver shore,—
So innocent with dear desires,
That questioned all things more and more,

A lonely, thoughtful boy was he,
In love with all things good and fair,
Great hopes and wishes filled his heart,
Before he hardly knew them there.
But still that heart grew bold and strong,
That love more broad and earnest grew,—
He saw the inner sense of things
And Nature's mystic meanings knew.

Long years had passed since he reposed
Upon the bank of that fair stream—
Long years of thought and holy toil
Had taught him life was not a dream,
The same stars in the placid wave
Were still the same, soft crowns of light,
And all along the banks, flowed down
To his great heart the same delight.

He wondered not now they were there,
So sweetly, tremulously bright,
Nor why star looked again to star
From waters to the fields of light;
For he had learned that love's own law
Is to restore what it receives,
That each kind look and tender word,
Its image in the bosom leaves.

He wondered not that at his feet
The space-born orbs so brightly shone,
He knew the heart when turned to Heaven
May make its starry joys its own;
And that the more seriously pure
That heart shall keep through day and night,
The more divine shall glow within
The love-stars of celestial light.

THE SECRET VAULT.

A TALE OF VIENNA.

BY SYLVANUS COBB, JR.

CHAPTER II.

Continued.

The young man spoke earnestly, for he loved the gentle Celeste with a deep and pure affection, and that affection had grown more powerful still, since he had learned that it was returned. To loose her now seemed a shock too deep for endurance. He was the only son of a brave officer, who had lost his life in the emperor's service, and for that reason, at least, he was entitled to some consideration from his sovereign; but under the care of Wolfgang Mozat, he had made himself a master of the musical art, and more than once had the emperor, Joseph II., signified a desire to assist the deserving youth. These circumstances led him to hope that he might yet gain the object nearest his heart; but if the old baron meditated the match in question, there was but little ground for that hope.

Celeste gazed tearfully into her lover's face, and at length she murmured:

"O, I shall be miserable if I am forced to wed the count; and yet I see not how I can escape it. It is a fearful future for me, Lubin—fearful!"

As the young girl spoke, she dropped her head upon her lover's shoulder, and burst into tears. Lubin was more than ever touched by this grief, and imprinting a warm kiss upon her brow, he uttered:

"You shall not be sacrificed thus; I will see the emperor—"

He spoke no further, for at that moment the old baron stood within the apartment.

"So, so," uttered de Sigefroi, between his clenched teeth, while he trembled with rage, "this is the manner of your instruction is it? A pretty tutor have I engaged for my daughter. She shall not be sacrificed, eh? There, sir, go—go! and dare ever to set your foot in my house again. The door is open!"

Lubin Bleinkoff felt the angry words rising to his tongue, but, with a strong effort, he kept them back, and bending a look of earnest appeal upon Celeste—in which was shadowed forth a hopeful prayer—he turned towards the open door.

"Fravherr Sigefroi," said he, as he hesitated a moment ere he reached the threshold, "is it my fault that I have loved your daughter?"

"You love my daughter?" iterated the baron, in a tone of utter contempt. "Don't urge me to strike you. Leave the house at once."

Lubin hesitated a moment, but that was all. On the next he had quitted the apartment; and as soon as he was gone, the de Sigefroi turned to his daughter.

"Celeste," he said, as the door closed behind the retiring youth, "are you prepared to tell your father the truth?"

The weeping girl looked for a moment up into her father's face, but she saw no spark of sympathy there, and folding up the wings of half-fledged hope that had almost fluttered in her bosom, she calmly replied:

"I never told my father a lie."

"And never deceived him?"

"No," answered the fair being, while an expression of conscious rectitude added a new charm to her features.

"Then tell me—do you love this music teacher of yours."

"But he is not—"

"Do you love young Bleinkoff?" sternly interrupted the old baron, while he bent a threatening look upon his daughter.

"He is a good and virtuous father, and is already in favor with the emperor" said Celeste, as she held up her hands imploringly towards her iron-hearted parent.

"Do you love him?" thundered the old man, while his brows knit darker and more threateningly.

"I do," murmured the noble girl; and as she spoke, she settled back upon her seat, and buried her face in her hands.

For a full minute the old man paced up and down the apartment, almost struck dumb by the passion that raged within him; then stopping in front of the seat which she occupied, he said or rather gasped, for passion still overcame his free utterance:

"Look ye, Celeste, you will never see this young plebeian more. Now, you may either marry the Count de Gudius, or you may enter the convent. One of the two you must do."

"Then I will enter the convent, father," meekly, but yet firmly, returned the young girl.

"No!" exclaimed the baron, still more exasperated; "you will marry the count—and that, too, within the month."

As Sigefroi spoke, he shook his long, bony finger most menacingly at his child, and then left the apartment. For some time after he was gone, Celeste sat like one bewildered; then rousing herself from her stupor, she sprang from her seat, and for several moments she stood in deep thought. Hope came across her path, but it flitted quickly away—then came fear, but though that stopped longer than did hope, still it found no resting-place in her bosom; at length the pride that belonged to her race settled down upon her soul, and nestled snugly in its home. Celeste de Sigefroi might have been moved by the least breath of a parent's affection, but the iron heel of tyranny only steeled her heart to a purpose as firm as was that of her father's.

CHAPTER III.

A week passed away after the unexpected meeting between the Baron de Sigefroi and Lubin Bleinkoff, when, one morning, as the former was sitting alone in his study, he was aroused from his reflections by the entrance of an old monk.

"Is this the Baron de Sigefroi?" asked the monk, as he stopped midway in the apartment.

"Uncover thy head when thou speakest to me," exclaimed the baron, considerably angered at the bold assurance of his visiter.

"The holy father of St. Francis uncovers not his head in the imperial palace, and thou mayest rest assured that he will not do it before thee."

As the monk spoke, he looked sternly upon the man before him, and the proud baron quailed beneath that glance. He was not in a fit state to meet the representative of his church; but forcing back the anger which even he dared not offer to the holy father, he said;

"I am the Baron de Sigefroi; now the sooner your business is done, the better shall I be satisfied."

"One moment will suffice," returned the monk. "The emperor would see you at the imperial palace immediately."

"And wherefore?"

"He will tell thee himself."

As the monk returned this laconic answer, he turned and left the apartment. For several moments the baron stood by his table, buried in deep thought. First, there was something in the bearing and tone of the man who had just left him that made him feel uneasy—why it was he could not tell, but still an undefinable sensation of dread crept over him, as the tones of his visiter rang in his ears. Then what could the emperor want of him at such a time? and why send a monk after him? But the mandate must be obeyed; and in a short time he started for the imperial palace.

Joseph II. sat within one of the smaller drawing-rooms of the palace, and when the baron was ushered into his presence, a deep, dark frown rested upon his brow; but as he addressed his subject that frown passed away, though his countenance was still stern.

"Fravherr Sigefroi," said the emperor, as the old man bent low before him, "we have sent for thee touching a matter of some importance—no more nor less than the happiness of two of our faithful subjects."

"What is your will sire?" asked the baron, with a gesture of impatience.

"First, that you contract no marriage bonds between the Count de Gudius and your daughter; and secondly, that you will give the lady's hand to him who already possesses her heart—young Lubin Bleinkoff."

"And does your majesty command this?" asked Sigefroi, with a show of resentment which he could not conceal.

"O, no," returned Joseph. "I do not command it—merely ask it as a matter of justice to the parties concerned. Bleinkoff is already carving out for himself a fortune, and he will be no mean match for your daughter. He is under our royal patronage, and if you consent to the union, you shall not regret it."

The baron knew enough of Joseph's benevolent disposition to be aware that an expressed wish on such a subject as that amounted to a command; and he also knew that if he had taken the idea into his head, he would eventually see it carried out, and after a moment's thought, he asked:

"Will your majesty grant me a few days, in which to think of this matter?"

"Certainly," replied the emperor, "certainly; and I trust that you will see that your happiness depends greatly upon the happiness of those around you. Our throne would be a sorry place were it not upheld by the love and esteem of our virtuous subjects, and you well know that a benevolent heart alone can win that prize. We shall expect thy answer anon."

As the baron left the reception room, there was a wicked expression upon his features, and one who knew him might easily have told that some evil design dwelt within his bosom. As he walked forth into the open air, he mumbled and muttered to himself, until at length, just as he stepped upon his own pavement, the troubled expression passed away, and one of fierce determination took its place.

All day he remained within his own dwelling, and at night he sent one of his trusty servants in quest of Lubin Bleinkoff. The youth was easily found; and as he entered the baron's private room, he was somewhat surprised at the cordial manner in which he was welcomed.

"A week since," said Sigefroi, as he motioned Lubin to a seat, "we parted somewhat in anger, but at the present time I have somewhat relented from my purpose. I have no desire to make my daughter miserable, and if I thought you would cherish her as her virtue and goodness deserve, I might consent to your union."

"Cherish her!" exclaimed the almost enraptured youth, as he started from his seat. "O, sir, if you would but give me her hand, I would willingly lay down my life if 'twere needed to secure her happiness."

"I ask no such sacrifice as that," returned the baron, while a sort of half-smothered expression of contempt passed over his features.—"You had better hold on to your life as long as possible."

"So I will; but yet it shall be devoted to the happiness of your child: and if you but give your consent to our union, I know that she will join with me in blessing you."

"There is one condition, however," said the baron, in a business kind of manner, without seeming to notice the fervent expression of his young companion, "on which I will give my consent to your union."

"Name it; and if it conflict not with my honor, I will abide by it."

"I have an estate in Ostend," said the old man, "and there is much that needs attention about it. Now I wish to entrust the business to some one who can feel interested in its settlement, and if you will depart at once for that city, and perform the duties faithfully, you shall not only have my daughter's hand, but that whole estate shall be made over to her as a dowry. Will you undertake the task?"

"Willingly,—most willingly," quickly answered the young man. "I have friends in Ostend, and they will readily assist me."

"I would see you see the papers at once" remarked Sigefroi, as he arose from his seat and took the lamp in his hand.

As he spoke, he passed out from the room, but in a few moments he returned to relight his lamp which had accidentally been extinguished, and as he pricked up the wick, he said to Lubin:

"The papers are below, in my private vault and if you will accompany me, to hold the light while I open the safe, you will accommodate me much."

"Certainly," answered the youth, as he started from his seat, and prepared to follow the baron.

Lubin knew not that an old man of such standing in the empire could harbor evil against one like himself, and with a comparatively joyous tread he started forth after his guide. At the end of a short but circuitous route, they descended a long flight of stone steps, and in a minute more they descended another, which entered upon the paving of a long, low, arched passage. On walked the baron, and, all unconscious of danger, on followed Lubin.

Lubin took one step, but that was all. The wide stone slab upon which he stood gave way beneath his weight, and with a sharp, quick cry of anguish, he fell through. He caught at the sides of the aperture as he sank, but it offered him no support, for they were too far apart, and his hands slipped from the stones! He had gone to seek the poor mason, Roland Eppendorf!

"There, master Bleinkoff," uttered the hard hearted old villain to himself, as he swung the slab into its place, "you will trouble me no more, and I doubt me much if the tender-hearted emperor will ever find out your last resting place. You marry my daughter, indeed! I would not have taken thy life, hadst thou not prated to the emperor, and thus made thyself dangerous to my plans."

When the baron reached his room he could not but feel somewhat troubled at what he had done, for Joseph would most assuredly use every exertion to hunt up his young favorite, and suspicion might fall upon himself. But the secret vault was too nicely contrived for detection, and the only men who could betray him had been consigned to its dismal depths; hence he took courage, and tried to feel satisfied with his work.

CHAPTER IV.

Three successive days did Wolfgang Mozart attend at court without his youthful companion, and the emperor began to fear that some foul play had been used against him. Inquiry was made in all parts of the city, the guards at the gates were all questioned, but no tidings could be obtained of the missing man. Joseph sent for the Baron de Sigefroi, and questioned him sharply, and at the same time a large party of police were sent to examine his house, but all to no purpose.

When the baron returned to his dwelling, he called for his daughter, and as she entered his presence, her eyes were red and swollen, her hair dishevelled, and she was weeping bitterly.

"What ails thee, child?" asked the old man, as he looked up at the grief-stricken girl.

Celeste gazed through her tears for a moment, but her grief was too deep for utterance, and sinking into a chair, her flood of sorrow burst forth afresh.

"Are you weeping for Lubin Bleinkoff?" continued the baron, while a flush of anger passed over his features.

"And why should I not weep for one like him?"

"And why should you?"

Celeste made no reply to the taunting question, and her father arose nervously from his seat and approached her.

"Look ye, child," he said, "you may weep, or laugh, as best suits you, but ere another week rolls by, you shall be the wife of de Gudius."

The fair girl started up and threw the long hair back from her pale face. Her eyes stopped then flowing, and where but a moment before had dwelt the leaden hue of exhaustion, now flashed a keen fire,—her bosom heaved with the firm purpose that dwelt within, and she uttered the simple word—

"Never!"

"I have sworn it," exclaimed the baron, not a little startled by the fearful energy with which his child had spoken.

"Then here,—before Great God, I swear I will never do it."

Celeste fell upon her knees as she spoke, and clasped her hands above her head. Her father gazed upon her as she knelt thus, and for a moment a peculiar feeling of paternal pride took possession of his soul, but it was quickly swept swept away; and seizing her by the arm, he raised her to her feet and bade her seek her room, adding as he did so:

"Remember my oath, for it shall be fulfilled."

"Not while Austria contains room for my grave," uttered Celeste, as she closed the door of her father's room behind her.

PRONOUNCED OVER THE DEAD BODY OF HENRY CLAY, AT ASHLAND, JULY 19, 1852.

BY REV. MR. BERKLEY, of Christ Church, Lexington.

Concluded.

And O! the recollection to mourning friends and to a mourning country is of the most consoling interest, that as in his life, by his genius and wisdom, he threw light and peace and blessing upon his country—so, in his death, the glorious Giver of grace and wisdom threw light and peace and blessing upon him—borne upward as he was by the aspirations to Heaven of a million hearts.

But his earthly career is run.—Full of age, and full of honor, he goes down to earth, to ashes and to dust. A man of extraordinary genius, a man of the highest practical wisdom, possessing the largest powers of true eloquence, a pure patriot, a sincere Christian, and a friend of his race

His friends will grieve for him, the church has lost him, his country will bewail him, and hereafter, when the passing traveller shall come to Ashland, and look for the liberal, hospitable and agreeable host, he will not find him here! His aged wife, who for more than fifty years has grieved with him in his sorrows, and rejoiced with him in his public success, shall go down into the grave mourning; and men in every civilized nation of the earth will shed a tear at the fall of such a man! But he is gone to a better and a brighter world; while this memorial shall remain of him here, that he was as simple and sincere in his religion, as he was great in wisdom and mighty in intellect.

God is no respecter of persons. Neither genius, nor wisdom, nor power, nor greatness can avert the fatal darts which fly thick and fast around us. All public services of the highest value—a fair fame, which reaches to the utmost habitations of civilized men, and an integrity as stern as steel, could have done this—a nation had not been in tears to-day.

But the great and the humble—the useful and the useless—the learned and the ignorant—the mighty and the mean—the public and the private man must all alike lie down in the cold chambers of the grave.

Death is the common leveler of all men and of nations. Temples and monuments which have been erected to perpetuate the achievements of statesmen and of heroes in past ages, have been ruined and robbed of their grandeur by the insatiable tooth of time—not a vestige remains of the glory that once covered the earth and not a stone to mark the spot where the master of the world is laid.

And this is the end of man. This the obscurity and oblivion to which he shall come at last. But his end may be worse than this, if he have no hope in the blessed Saviour's death. For whoever confides in the world for the bestowment of true happiness—whoever trusts in its gains, its pleasures, or its powers to bring him peace at last, will find himself miserably imposed upon and grievously deluded. He will find that this misplaced confidence will involve himself in ruin as inevitable as it will be eternal.

"Lean not on earth, 'twill pierce thee to the heart—
A broken reed at best, but oft a spear—
On its sharp point Peace bleeds and Hope expires."

If we aspire to a true and deathless immortality, let us not seek it in the praises of men or in the enrollment of our name on the page of history—for these all shall perish—but let us seek by obedience to God and a resignation of the claims of religion, to have our names written in the Saints' Book of Life. This and this only will guarantee an immortality as imperishable as the heavens and as certain as the life of God.

The observation is almost universal. That all men think all men mortal but themselves." And yet there is nothing more surely reserved for us in the future disease and dissolution, and these things too, may and very often do come when we are least expecting a disturbance of our plans.

"The Statesman falls with plans of future glory yet unaccomplished—the Poet expires in the midst of his song, and the magic of his muse lingers on his his dying lips—the Sculptor drops his chisel before he has taught the marble to breathe—and the Painter his pencil while the living figures on his canvass are yet unfinished—the sword slips from the hand of the Warrior before the battle is won—and the Orator is silenced while the words of wisdom are yet dropping in sweetest accents from his lips."

"I said ye are gods and children of the Most High, but ye shall die like men."

No consideration can purchase a moment's respite when the decree shall go forth, "this night thy soul shall be required of thee," whether it be uttered at the doors of the stately mansion or at the cot of the lowly poor. And not to be wisely and well prepared to hear this summons, is destructive of the best interests of the soul. Happy they who have made a friend in God. Happy they who have done and do this in early life—the failure of which in this case, our revered friend so often regretted—thrice happy they in whom greatness and goodness meet together. Imperishable joys shall be accorded to them. They shall shine as stars in the firmament forever and ever. In each succeeding generation "their memory shall be blessed," and "their names be had in everlasting remembrance. And, their "conflicts o'er, their labors done," the ransomed spirit shall escape from the prison that confines it to the earth, and the King of Kings shall bind on its victorious brow wreaths of unfading glory in that blest place.

So live that when the summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan that moves
To that mysterious realm where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death.
Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged, to thy dungeon, but sustained and soothed
By and unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Our great friend and countryman is dead! He has no more connection with the living world; and we are about to bear his honored remains to that beautiful spot, where our own dead lay, and around which our memories love to linger. What to him, I ask you, are now the politics of the country? What to him are the nice points upon which turn the honor of the State? What to him now is the extension of empire?—the rise or fall of nations?—the dethronement, or the establishment of Kings? His work is done and well done. As it is with him, so shall it shortly be with every one of us!

One word more. The distinguished subject of our present attention has fallen a martyr to his country. The cause of his sickness, and of his death, originated in his last great efforts in securing the passage through Congress of certain measures known as the Compromise. In more cases than one may he receive the heavenly welcome, "well done good and faithful servant." His love of country—his enthusiasm in any cause in which her interests were involved—his great and singular powers—his wonderful and controlling influence over even great minds, marked him as the man of the age, and adapted him in a peculiar manner to act and to lead in grave measures of government.

And, if in the future, any one section of this great Republic should be arrayed in hostility against another, and any cruel hand shall be uplifted to sever the bonds which unite us together as a common people—the Genius of Liberty shall come down in anguish and in tears, and throwing herself prostrate before his tomb, implore the Mighty Ruler of Nations—for the preservation of our institutions and the protection of our Liberty and our Union—to raise from his ashes—another CLAY.

THE SECRET VAULT.

A TALE OF VIENNA.

BY SYLVANUS CORB, JR.

CHAPTER II.

Continued.

Another morning's sun rose upon the city of Vienna, and as the first golden beams danced o'er the house tops, the baron de Sigefroi was startled from an uneasy slumber by the weight of a heavy hand upon his shoulder. He raised himself quickly upon his elbow, and a thrill of dread went to his soul as his eyes rested upon the monk. A bitter curse was upon his lips, but there was something in the appearance of the holy father that kept it back,—a sort of intuitive dread, the exact cause of which he could not comprehend.

"Freyherr Sigefroi," said the monk, "the emperor waits your presence at the palace.—You will make all possible haste."

"And does the emperor think that I am to be dragged hither and thither at his nod and beck?" exclaimed the baron, trembling with rage.

"He probably thinks you would much rather come at his nod, than come in the company of his guard," returned the monk while a meaning twinkle played in the dark eyes that peered out from beneath the cowl.

"Ha! and would Joseph force me?"

"I said not so."

"But you intimated as much."

"Then you had better profit by the hint, and show yourself at the palace as quickly as possible. The emperor is not in a mood to wait long."

As the monk spoke, he passed out from the apartment and left the house. The baron was sorely perplexed by this summary order, and had he not been a guilty man he would have disobeyed it; but as the case stood, he dared not allow an apparent fear to add still more to the suspicion that was already entertained against him, so he resolved to wait upon the emperor at once. Suspicion might run strong against him, but he knew that he could prove nothing, his work had been carried on too secretly for that, and deep down in the bowels of the earth lay the remains of those who might once have betrayed him. With these thoughts in his mind, he prepared his toilet, and then started for the imperial palace, determined to brave out any and all accusations that might be brought against him.

When the old baron was admitted to the presence of his emperor he was not a little chilled by the unusual frown that darkened upon the imperial brow. Upon one hand stood the monk, and upon the other, reclining against his master's chair, stood a youthful page.

"Baron Walter de Sigefroi," said Joseph, as the old man came to stand before him, "we called you thus privately, because we are willing that the business in hand should never come before the public."

"Your majesty is very gracious," returned the baron, with a spice of bitterness in his manner.

"We would always be gracious towards our subjects," said Joseph; and then changing his tone to one of more than common import, he asked:

"What know you of the fate of Lubin Bleinkoff?"

"Nothing, sire."

"Bethink yourself, frayherr, nothing?"

"Nothing at all."

"Was he not in your house on the night of his sudden disappearance?"

"He was, sire," boldly answered the baron

"What became of him then."

"He left me by nine o'clock."

"Did he leave by the same way at which he entered?"

De Sigefroi spoke boldly, but at the last answer, as he met the keen glance of the emperor, he trembled and turned pale.

"Suppose I should bring a witness to confront you?" said Joseph.

"Let him come at once," the baron replied; but he could not hide the agitation that shook his frame.

The emperor made a signal to his page, and the youth left the hall, but he returned in a few moments, followed by the witness to whom allusion had been made.

"What say you to this witness?" asked Joseph.

De Sigefroi raised his eyes, and had a thunderbolt crashed o'er his head he could not have been more startled. Lubin Bleinkoff stood before him!

"Ye gods of Israel, how came this man here!" uttered the almost stupefied baron as he raised his hand before his brow, and gazed upon what seemed a spirit from the other world.

"Perhaps the monk can answer that question."

As the emperor spoke the monk stepped forward and threw off the dark cowl and gown, revealing, as he did so, the person of Roland Eppendorf, the poor mason!

"What says the baron de Sigefroi now?" asked Joseph.

The old man returned no answer, but stepping nervously towards Eppendorf, he laid his trembling hand upon his shoulder.

"'Tis flesh and blood! The mason!—Roland Eppendorf! Great God—I am undone!"

As the baron uttered these disjointed sentences he sank back upon a chair and gazed wildly about him. In a few moments, however, a beam of returning reason shot forth from his eyes, and starting forward, he grasped the mason by the arm, exclaiming:

"Tell me, thou exhumed fiend, how didst thou escape the trap you yourself had so strongly built?"

"I'll tell thee," returned Eppendorf, as he shook off the old man's grasp. "Hardly had I commenced to lay the foundation of your vault, when I discovered fragments of stone and mortar that I knew must have fallen from the earth which had been disturbed, and upon further examination I found these fragments to have come from an arched passage-way, which was soon opened to my view. At night I took my lantern, and accompanied by the man whom you left to assist me, I entered it and followed through its windings till I found myself within the mote outside of the city walls. At first I thought of informing you of the fact, but some angel of mercy must have whispered into my ear, for at that moment the idea flashed across my mind that my companion and myself might be destined as the first victims of your infernal contrivance; so I artfully concealed the passage and laid the stones over its mouth in such a manner that they could be easily removed, yet bearing so close a resemblance to the others that the deceit could not be easily detected. My foreshadowings proved correct, and on my escape I assumed the charactor of a monk, determined to watch you, for I knew that you had some fresh victim in your eye. When the young musician was missed, I knew at once what had become of him, and I released him by entering your secret-vault through the subterranean passage."

For several moments after the mason had told his story, the old baron remained silent. Denial could no longer avail him, and with as much calmness as he could assume, he said:

"You have heard all, sire."

"Ay, and we knew it before, frayherr. But now you shall hear your sentence. Martin," continued the emperor, turning to his page, "lead forth the lady"

In a moment Céleste de Sigefroi stood before the emperor, but the old man had already been too much surprised to express any new wonder at this appearance.

"De Sigefroi," said Joseph, as the fair maiden entered "no lives have been lost by your evil deeds, and as we are unwilling to cloud the budding happiness of your child, we will forgive you your offence on two conditions, and furthermore, your crimes shall be kept from the world. Here are two papers. By this you convey to your daughter one half of all your estates as a marriage dower, & by this you give her hand in marriage to Lubin Bleinkoff. Will you sign them?"

As the emperor spoke he laid the two papers upon the table before him and awaited the old man's answer. De Sigefroi gazed first upon his daughter, then upon his sovereign, and then upon the two men whom he had so basely attempted to destroy. He trusted not his tongue to speak; but stepping up to the table, he seized the pen and traced his autograph upon each of the papers.

"Cherie," said Joseph, as a kind smile irradiated his benevolent features, at the same time handing the papers to Lubin, "take those documents and preserve them." Then turning to the baron, he continued:

"Let this be a warning to your, fryherr, and may you live long enough to atone for the wrong you have done. You are at liberty."

The baron lived not long to mourn the infamy of his crimes, but ere he died he blessed his daughter, and then placed her hand in the keeping of Lubin Bleinkoff. Roland Eppenhoff received as ample independence from the old man's store of wealth, and when at last, the death angel came to take the baron away, he had the satisfaction of knowing himself forgiven by those whom he had once doomed as victims to the dark, deep confines of his SECRET VAULT. —The Flag of our Union.

President Roberts and the "Ladies' Literary Institute."

Mr. Editor:—

You may already have learned the arrival of Her Majesty's Steamer vessel "Devastation" Captain G. T. C. Sandilands from England via Madeira and Sierra Leone, with President Roberts and family on board.

The President's arrival was not unexpected—for a fortnight or more, preparations were on foot for his reception,—and it is matter of regret to many of the citizens that the President's movements were so rapid as to deprive them of the pleasure of the public demonstration contemplated. As the steamer entered the roads, all were on the alert to learn whether the President was on board, and the first certain intelligence of his arrival, was on a note from him to Vice President Williams, announcing his arrival, and that he would be on shore almost as soon as the note reached the Govt: House. The news flew through the city, and simultaneously the exclamations was heard in every direction—"the President's coming"—"the President's coming." Crowds were seen wending their way to the landing, and looking out for him with pleasing anxiety. The president landed, and was received & conducted from the barge of Admiral Bruce, where he had been placed at his disposal by the officers of his cabinet and a large concourse of distinguished gentlemen of the city; and was escorted by them to the Govt. House, where also a large crowd had assembled to welcome him.

It is not my intention, Mr. Editor, to press upon your columns further than to ask the insertion of the following in reference to the part taken by the Ladies Literary Institute. The Ladies of the Institute had made suitable arrangements for the occasion but the short notice placed it beyond their power to carry them out as anticipated. However they assembled, or a large number of them, in front of the President's residence—lining each side of the entrance, two of their number bearing above a beautifully wrought wreath of flowers, and as he passed under it, all greeted him warmly. The Ladies returned to their hall, where it was agreed that the Institute would reassemble at 8 o'clock, and proceed in a body to the residence of the President, to pay their respects to him. The following is from the minutes of the Institute.

"December 10th—at the hour appointed, the Ladies' Literary Institute met at the residence of their Secretary, and, preceded by their Directress Miss Frances Cyrus, moved in procession to the President's dwellings they were shown into the drawing room—when two of their number were deputed to wait on the President to request that he would join them. The President shortly entered the room accompanied by the two ladies: when the Society rose to receive him, and the Directress, surrounded by a large crowd of spectators of both sexes, addressed him as follows.

PRESIDENT ROBERTS.

Your return to the shores of our delightful country, once more we hail with unspeakable emotions of delight, and we feel assured, that not only we who now surround you rejoice; but the hearts of hundreds to whom the news of your arrival has reached, throb, in unison with ours, with delightful emotions; and each, uniting with us in the moment, repeat the sound of welcome! welcome!

Look at the crowd which now surround you—composed of various classes of persons. See in their excited appearance,—in the joyful expression of their countenances,—see an evidence of their enraptured feelings—a proof of the cordial welcome, which every citizen extends to you—

"And permit your humble friend, as a representative of the Ladies' Literary Institute, to tender to your Excellency, in the name of that Society, their most cordial welcome—a welcome told over and over—a heart felt welcome to you the man who deserves to be honored, and whom we delight to honor. We congratulate you on the favourable reception which you met while abroad, and on the success which has attended the whole of your voyage, feeling, at the same time, grateful to a kind Providence, for thus preserving your life & health, and returning you to us in safety. And now our fervent prayer is, that the remainder of your days, wherever spent, whether in the engagements of public life, or in quiet retirement, may be crowned with peace and prosperity, and when your sun is about to decline, may it select its parting ray, on a horizon, which shall rise in glorious effulgence, and whose career, like yours, shall be one of light and blessedness to Liberia."

The President appeared much moved as the speaker proceeded, and at the conclusion of the address, he expressed to the ladies sincere thanks for the kind welcome they had extended to him. He remarked that during his absence, though he had been called to encounter many difficulties and had been greatly perplexed, still the interests of Liberia, civil, religious, and literary—were constantly the objects of his solicitude, and notwithstanding the Govt: and people of Liberia had been misrepresented abroad, and their character shamefully traduced, he lost no opportunity to correct these false statements, and vindicate the character of his fellow citizens, and he felt that his efforts had been attended with success.

At the conclusion of his remarks the Institute sung the following lines composed for the occasion.

We omit the first five stanzas for want of room Ed:

But we'd not be intruding be,
O God who gives the victory,
Let us to Thee our voices raise
In songs of gratitude and praise.

And let Liberia's Sons rejoice;
And every daughter lend her voice,
To spread the cheering truth abroad,
Jehovah is, our friend and God.

After the singing the President again returned thanks to the Society and expressed, his entire gratification at the performances, remarking that such a compliment was beyond anything he had expected. He said he did not feel worthy of the honors which the Ladies had so freely bestowed upon him.—He felt thankful to kind Providence, which had so favourably ordered things during his absence.

He expressed his approbation of the sentiments expressed in the above stanzas "God is on Liberia's side and if we put our trust in Him, we have nothing to fear,—ultimately truth will prevail over falsehood."

The Institute then sung the "National Anthem"—and retired to the residence of the Secretary, where, Mr. E. W. Blyden, requested that the Society be asked to order what was proposed the following resolution.

Resolved, that Mr. Blyden be requested to prepare an account of the doings of the Society this evening to be published in the "Liberia Herald."

The resolution was seconded and unanimously adopted, after which, the Institute adjourned.

Mr. Herald.

I notice in your paper of December 1st, that "X. Y." your "Clay Ashland Correspondent, undertakes to give the views and feelings of the "people on the St. Paul's river settlements" with regard to the present military system," &c. stating their dissatisfaction with it &c.

Will you please to inform the public how it happened that "X Y" has lately become so intelligent an "exponent" of the views and feelings of the St. Paul's river people?

Will you also inform us, whether since his arrival in Liberia he has been sufficiently patriotic to "muster"—if so, how often?

Yours for the present.

Historical facts or the first reformers of Spain. Continued.

Ferdinand and Isabella.

The contention between the Christians and Moors of Spain was one for national liberty and independence. The security of these was followed in Spain as in other countries, by a struggle of the people for free institutions. These we find developing themselves at a very early period. The feudal system lost its hold there sooner than in many other countries of Europe. Municipal corporations speedily followed, and a representative government was established so early as the middle of the twelfth century, and the liberties of the people continued steadily to advance till near the close of the fourteenth century. About this period however, the victory begins to incline in a less favorable direction, though still only partially and not without occasional popular triumphs; while the proud aristocracy of Spain was gradually rising into power. Mean while the church was not slow to avail itself of the movements we have described. A corporate influence there too had been at work, numerous and opulent conventual institutions had sprung up and were acquiring a strength pregnant with fearful consequences for the future reign of superstition. From this time till the middle of the fifteenth century, the destiny of Spain seemed to hang in a balance. Commercial guilds still maintain their influence in some sections of the peninsula, Learning also found its patrons, and spread abroad its genial influences, and good and evil seemed to be contending on equal terms for predominance in the kingdoms into which Spain was divided. When in the year 1451 Isabella was born, the great princes of Castile, scarcely a year thereafter, occurred the birth of Ferdinand, a Royal Prince whose name is forever linked with hers, and whose glory is due to the union that made him share in the glories of her reign. * * * It is a stormy period of Spanish history on which they were cast, and many tempestuous scenes had to be passed through, and many a danger over come, many dangerous escapes, ere even the right of the future sovereigns should be acknowledged.

Thus does an annalist of the events of the Princess Isabella, early career sketched some of the most important incidents, and depict the events under which a union was effected of the two chief kingdoms into which Spain was then divided.

Isabella's preferences were not consulted. She was made the puppet of State policy or royal caprice. One was the doomed to the arms of a man of as hateful character, and as low pretensions as any of that dotard age—but the master of Calatrava died while journeying to receive his bride. Her example, when removed to the licentious court of her brother, remained spotlessly pure. The battle of Olmedo only protracted the civil struggle which now raged through the land. She however sought the protection of her brother. Alphonso, a youth worthy of the highest esteem and admiration.—He fell, most likely, by treacherous means into an untimely grave. It is then that she was tried, as was lady Jane Grey, by the confederates to accept the crown, but she solemnly refused maintaining that so long as Henry lived it could not be vacant. The Marquis de Villane, unlike the English Northumberland, could not prevail. The reward of loyalty and purity came at last. At Toras de Goisardo amidst a splendid convocation of the highest dignitaries of the realms. Henry embraced his sister, recognized her as his successor while shortly after, the Cortes confirmed her title amidst the people's acclamation of applause. She was now the rose and expectancy of that far state. Many a suitor came, and the crook backed English Richard is supposed, though not by personal courtship, to have negotiated the important question from afar.

Her affections were fixed on Firdinand. He was rather younger than herself, of comely features and proportions, addicted to many exercises, and endowed with many generous qualities. She also perceived the immense advantage of this union of kingdoms. The disposition in this case was mutual. Their people were of the same race and tongue. Their national character was of one mould. Mutual safety required the intermixture. But when she gave her consent to her youthful admirer, when the articles of marriage had been signed, her cause of true love, like that of many humbler channels, ran not smooth. She escaped from espionage and durance to Valladolid. But where was Ferdinand? He must come as a bridegroom and king. Never had fortune appeared so dark so low. He was found at Saragossa. The frontier was watched by the enemies' emissaries were set to surprise and intercept him. He set out travelling by night, chiefly, on a mule or two. He had but six attendants, and the better to preserve his disguise, whenever the party reached an inn he waited upon them.—Princes do escape common accidents.

At one of these inns he left not a very well furnished praise behind. * * * Reaching Osma where friends awaited him, they mistaking him —a Lombard discharged from the Rampart a heavy stone, which shot very near his head. How many and various are the dangers to which we all are continually exposed, the king, the noble the wise, the great and the beggar are equal in this respect; there are none exempted, after escaping many dangers, and overcoming many difficulties. This noble Prince the hope of two tottering kingdoms was near being at the first slain by one of his own people, what is life, what are high hopes, if they do not reach to the throne of God. But now all is safe, success only was reserved for him he was in his eighteenth year: she a year older. The expression of his countenance, according to the pictures of him is rather serious and down-cast, hers more animated, steady and serene. Their moral physiognomies however, are far more interesting and useful to study.

The happy couple were about equally poor. The exchequer of Arragon was exhausted, that of Castile was not at command. But on the morning of the 19th of October 1469; their nuptials were celebrated most publicly, if not magnificently. A dispensation was necessary, as they were in the prohibited degrees of blood. This proved to be a forgery, but they were ignorant of it. When a true one was obtained some years afterwars, she learned for the first time the fraud that had been practised upon her, on the 11th of September, the death of her brother Henry placed the crown of Castile on the head of Isabella. The crown of Arragon has devolved on Ferdinand, and the limited rulers commenced a reign that placed their kingdom, at that period, foremost among the free nations of the world. Education was liberally encouraged. Chivalry found a wholesome stimulant under the genial influence of a female reign, that disciplined it to a more generous and national course, while it deepened its intensity. The protracted Moorish wars had sufficed to secure the triumphs of arms &c. The influence of the blind dogmas of its superstitious chivalry were exhibited, at an earlier period, in a romantic incident connected with Scotish history.

Robert Bruce the renowned asserter of his country's or nations liberties, died without accomplishing a vow he had made, i. e. to take the pilgrims' staff, and as an humble pilgrim, to visit the holy sepulchre. His faithful follower however, undertook, at his dying request, to fulfil the letter of his vow, by depositing his heart in the sepulchre at Jerusalem. And we catch among the romantic scenes of Spanish history, a glimpse of the famous Douglas as he turns aside in accordance with the impressions of the time to bear the dauntless heart into the fields of Spain, where the infidel was contending most fiercely against the christian, to wrest from him the lands he had over run—The fearless, the bold & intrepid Douglas perished there, & burried the Scottish Monarch's heart on the field of victory—But it was a very different spirit, from this which animated the court of Isabella, it had less of superstition, more of refined gallantry, and undoubtedly its influence was favourable to the people as they followed in the course of their victorious arms," citadel after citadel was scaled from the Moores. * * * Granada was entered in triumph by the royal conquerors, the gorgeous halls of Alhambra were thrown open to them. The cross was reared on the Saracenic minaret, and the church bell rung for its joyous peals from the towers that had been reared to call the modem to prayers. Such were the conquering sovereigns for which Columbus found a new world.

Now Spain was in her glory under Spanish rule, and the Africans foot steps were no longer heard in the halls which he built or the halls he his dwellings and his home. The light of the sun at its meridian splendor smiled on the peak the noble the great, in Spain nor the moons cradle beams, light a path to guide the traveller home nor sweet cherubs at their twilight gambols. The cares of the forest no longer disturbed him the comforts of their balmy shade, and the land where he looked on as his own ceased to own him its lord. Such are the events of life. Such the results of war and such is man's fortune. And now to view matters as they then stood, we would be natur lly led to predict for Spain great prosperity. An eye witness of the transactions which freed Spain from Saracenic rule, would place and Godly have prophesied for her a long reign of peace and ages of increasing prosperity but how uncertain is the human will, at the time we look for the most we get the least, at the time we hope for the highest prosperity, and bless of earthly mould, is often the very time we are met with scenes of the deepest degradation, and so Spain whose morning of happiness beam at the time the barbarrians foot steps were cold and no longer heard on her soil, instead of going on to still greater glory she fell back into still deeper gloom and misery her sun went down at its meridian. And now she is grouping in thick darkness. Rome triumps over her, and the inquisition shuts out the light of grace and of heaven, from which good Lord deliver her S.

THE WHOLE PARTICULARS.

A good story is told of an old lady, who had received a letter from her son, a sailor, on board a merchantman which ran thus:

"Have been driven into the bay of Fundy by a pan-poosa right in the teeth. It blowed great guns and carried away the bowsprit; a heavy sea washed overboard the binnacle and companion; the captain lost his quadrant and couldn't take any observation for fifteen days at last we arrived in Halifax.

The old woman who could not read herself; got a neighbor to repeat it to her three or four times, until she thought she had got it by heart she then sailed out to tell the story—

"O, my poor son!"

"Why, what's the matter, mother? I hope no mischief."

"O, thank God he's safe. But he has been driven into the bay of Fummeny by a hanky-sizzle right in the teeth—it blowed great guns, and they carried away the pulpit—a heavy sea washed overboard the pinnacle of the tabernacle—the captain lost his conjuration, and couldn't get any salvation for fifteen days—at last they arrived safe at Hallelujah!"

"Lo, bless us! What a wonder they weren't beat to atoms! Well, I wouldn't be a sailor."

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, JANUARY 5th, 1853.

The Legislature adjourned on the 3rd—inst. after being in session 25 days. We are not particularly informed, as to the amount of business done, but we understand that a number of bills are lying on the table, which have had two readings.

Notwithstanding, that our affairs at one time within the past year presented rather an unfavorable aspect, especially our relations with England, it is a matter, now, of congratulation that the present prospects of Liberia are of the most encouraging character. Our difficulties with England have been happily adjusted, and from Her M. Minister's, our Government continues to receive assurances of the most friendly nature. The French Government, also professes the most friendly esteem for our growing State & we are authorized in saying, that it will in a substantial way show its interest for our Government. Through His Excellency, the Prussian minister at the Court of St. James, President Roberts was assured, that the Prussian Government took great interest in the growth and prosperity of Liberia and we are happy to record the arrival of a Prussian frigate bearing the broad pennant of Commodore Schroder. The Commodore takes a lively interest in all that he sees—is very communicative, and is engaged in procuring information as to the resources, commercial and agricultural, of the Republic. The Chiefs of the several Departments of Government will be directed to facilitate the Commodore's wishes Immigrants.—The Bark "Joseph Maxwell," Ferrell master, arrived on the 1st inst: with 150 immigrants from Wilmington, N. C.—and the "Linda Stewart," Lauton master, on the 3rd inst with 176 imgts: from Baltimore via Norfolk. We hear from all quarters that the people composing these two companies, are good looking, and from appearances are capable of doing much towards increasing the number of agriculturists. Many of them are well provided. Indeed some of them have considerable property, and if they use ordinary caution, will in a few years be comparatively wealthy. We say, let immigrants come as fast as they can be induced to do so, we have a goodly heritage and the people of Liberia are willing and anxious to share it with their brethren in other lands. We ask them; why do they not come? and assist in raising up a powerful nation of their race. Every facility will be afforded them by our Government to carry out every honorable measure. We re-itterate our call to our brethren in the United States of American, to leave that land which denies them the enjoyment of those privleges which the God of nature intended them to enjoy and come to their Father land. The people of Liberia will extend to them a hearty welcome.

Exploration.—We have received much interesting information from the U. S. by the late arrivals, but we cannot now make copious extracts. That which seems to attract our attention mostly, is the dispatch of Capt: Lynch of the Dead Sea Expedition, to Liberia, by the Government of the United States to make exploration of the coast. "Capt Lynch left the U. S. for England on the 6th November thence to come by the first steamer to Liberia to take one of the U. S. vessels and make a preparatory exploration of the coast, and lay plans for one grand exploration of the western part of Africa." It is hoped by the friends of Liberia in America, that the Government and people of Liberia, will do all in their power to further the objects of the expedition. All know how very desirable it is, to have a thorough survey and history made of all the rivers, minerals, products, climate, soil, inhabitants, birds, beasts, mountains and valleys; around and adjacent to Liberia" Now we have the hope of seeing this accomplished, and the council and co-operation of Liberia is very important. We feel quite certain that Capt: Lynch, who is daily expected will be kindly received, by the Government and people of Liberia.

Gen. Pierce Elected. The whigs with General Scott at their head have been defeated at the election for President of the United States. Gen Pierce was elected by a very large majority. It is not known how he stands in regard to Liberia It is hoped he will be favourably disposed towards it.

We publish below the captions of the several acts and resolutions adopted by the Legislature at its late Session, ending Janv: 3rd, 1853.

No. 1. An Act authorizing the President to adopt certain measures for adjusting and terminating the disputes and wars, at present existing between the Vey and Golah Chiefs, occupying portions of the Little and Grand Cape Mount territories:—To prevent the revival of the Slave Trade, which is being attempted by Prince Manna, at the Gallinas. —And to establish a Settlement at Grand Cape Mount.

Lawrence, in the Courts of this Republic, as requested by Her Britannic Majesty's Government, &c., &c.,

" 18. An Act to incorporate the inhabitants of the Township of Edina, G. B. into a body Politic.

Slave Barracoon destroyed:—We are glad to learn, from good authority, that Commander Phillips, of Her Majesty's Steam Sloop "Polyphemus," has, with much gallantry and great ability, destroyed one of Crispo's slave barracoons, at a place called Balbah in the Sherbro Country, We understand that Crispo had collected and ready for shipment, about 110 Slaves. Commander Phillip's visit was in the early morn—Crispo, however found, means to escape—though in his shirt—and carry off with him about 100 of the slaves—ten only were rescued, and taken to Sierra Leone. The Slave barricoon, and the house of the Chief, who aided Crispo, were burned. This notorious slaver is still in the country. He is however, closely watched, and we, doubt not will find it difficult to succeed further in his nefarious interprise.

Admiral Bruce seems determined to route these fellows wherever found—we are glad of it, and wish him every success.

The Royal Prussian Frigate Gefion, left Vlissingen in Holland the 11th of November, and arrived at Madeira the 30th, having on her passage thither encountered very severe gales of wind which caused considerable damage to the rigging, sails and spars of the vessel.

When leaving Vlissingen the Frigate was accompanied by a sloop of war of 12 guns; which in the night of the 16th, during a most furrios squall that lasted for several hours, was parted from the Frigate and is supposed to have lost her masts and run for some port in the island to repair damages.

The Frigate is armed with 48 guns and carries the pendant of Commodore Schroder, and is Commanded by Captain Sundervall.

POETRY.

THE GOBLET OF LIFE.

BY HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

Filled is Life's Goblet to the brim;
And though my eyes with tears are dim,
And see its sparkling bubbles swim,
And chant a melancholy hymn
With a solemn voice and slow.

No purple flowers—no garlands green,
Conceal the goblet's shade or sheen
Nor maudening draughts of Hippocrene.
Life gleams of sunshine, flash between
Thick leaves of mistletoe.

This goblet wrought with curious art,
Is filled with waters that upstart,
When the deep fountains of the heart,
By strong convulsions rent apart,
Are running all to waste.

And as this mantling passes round,
With fennel, it is wreathed and crowned,
Whose seed and foliage sun embrowned,
Are in its waters steeped and drowned,
And give a bitter taste.

Above the lovely plant it towers,
The fennel with its yellow flowers,
And in an earlier age than ours,
Was gifted with the wondrous powers,
Lost vision to restore.

It gave new strength, and fearless mood;
And gladiators fierce and rude,
Mingled in their daily food;
And he who battled and subdued,
A wreath of fennel wore.

Then in Life's Goblet freely press
The leaves that give it bitterness;
Nor prized the colored waters less,
For in thy darkness and distress,
New life and strength they give.

And he who has not learned to know
How false its sparkling bubbles show,
How bitter are the drops of woe.
Which from its brim may overflow—
He has not learned to live.

The prayer of Ajax was for light;
Through all that dark and desperate fight,
The blackness of that noonday night,
He asked but the return of sight,
To see the foeman's face.

Let our unceasing earnest prayer
Be, too, for light—for strength to bear
Our portion of the weight of care,
That crushes into dumb despair
One half the human race.

O suffering, sad humanity!
O ye afflicted ones who lie
Steeped to the lips of misery,
Longing and yet afraid to die,
Patient though sorely tried!

I pledge you in this cup of grief,
Where floats the fennel's bitter leaf!
The Battle of our Life is brief,
The alarm—the struggle, the relief—
Then sleep we side by side.

THE CALORIC SHIP ERICSSON.

The following article on the caloric ship Ericsson is from the New York Independent, and is written by the celebrated congregationalist of Brooklyn, Henry Ward Beecher, brother to Harriet Beecher Stowe, authoress of Uncle Tom's Cabin. Mr. Beecher says publicly, "This caloric principle will be the greatest missionary ever sent forth."

"The Ericsson is externally a first class steam ship, perhaps a trifle neater, trimmer, and more graceful than usual; seemingly a steamship—the same contrast of black and gold, the same high-arching paddle-boxes revealing the red iron wheels and floats, the same half-way preparation for canvas. But really and within, what strange work! No steam, and no boilers to make steam, and no place to put them if they were wanted. No smoke, and no chimneys worth naming. No more hiss and roar, no more explosion. Hereafter all is to be dry and still. This is the caloric ship. A costly experiment truly, and, if successful, destined to work an entire revolution in mechanics, nothing less than and entire disuse of steam as a motor. There is something sublime in the daring displayed in this undertaking; a single invention entering the list and challenging the perfected work of ages. The daring wins attention and commands intensest interest. The marine steam-engine is the result of years of experiment and study, and consequent progress. A very few years ago no workshop in the world would have dared to undertake such a massive work. Castings of 40 tons weight, and complicated to the last degree; shafts of wrought iron welded up big as a pine tree; cylinders large enough for a comfortable bedroom. Had any man dared devise the work and execute the drawings, no shop could have satisfied the conditions; but now, by short, and slow, and easy steps, every dimension has been increased inch by inch, until at last our engines seem like the very wheels and machinery of nature. We build iron caverns, pour in an ocean, and set them over volcanoes, and modestly call them boilers and furnaces, as it were a mere device to boil eggs withal. A pair of first-class steeple-lever marine engines, slowly swinging their immense proportions to and fro in ponderous silence, approach as near to sublimity as it is lawful for the work of man to come. He that can look upon them with no emotion of awe, and no thrill of apprehension, will do well to be anxious at once about his soul. Notwithstanding this, and unabashed by the imperial renown and majesty of the modern engine, there is come an unknown champion into the lists to dispute the empire and claim the first rank to itself. Not by slow steps of progress does it propose to rise to dominion. Not by a long apprenticeship or slavery to pumps, mills, ferries, and river boats, the steps by which steam attained to royalty—not so will the caloric engine win its way. All or nothing. All at once, or nothing. And so the hull is builded and launched, such a hull as has never before been set afloat for beauty, strength, and costliness. Her register is over 2,000 tones. There are not ten steamers in the world larger than she, and not one of equal workmanship in respect of seaworthiness and strength. Her engines are built with the same elegance and precision that we should anticipate were they the fiftieth instead of the first of their kind. Four huge cylinders, each 13 feet in diameter—96 inches is the largest diameter the writer ever saw given to a steam cylinder—are to be set in a line along the keel. Under each is a little furnace, having two small fire-doors, each furnace capable of holding, perhaps, three or four bushels of coal. A ton of anthracite will start them all. Each pair of cylinders constitute an engine. Their united power is transmitted to a single crank upon the main shaft. The agent that is to give motion is air, expanded by the heat of the furnaces already named. The detail of valves, &c., must be, in effect, identical in all reciprocating cylinder engines, whatever be the motor. In the caloric engine the valve chests are just like those in use in the ordinary 'beam engine.' In a word, the caloric engine is a steam-engine made to go by elastic expansive air at a low pressure, instead of elastic expansive steam at a high pressure. Hence the necessity of so many and so enormous cylinders; for, the pressure upon each square inch of piston-head being less than in a steam-engine, of course the area, or number of square inches, must be increased by the same ratio or factor that measures the decrease of pressure if we would secure equivalent effects in the two cases. This is done by four-folding the area of each cylinder, and by doubling their number. Four 13-feet cylinders, with a pressure of 5lb. to the inch, friction aside, will yield as much power as one cylinder 78 inches in diameter, with 16lb pressure to the square inch. The advantage claimed for the caloric engine are imposing. 1. Economy of space. A moment's inspection justifies and admits this claim. 2. Safety from explosion and accident. This, too, is undeniable. 3 Incidental ventilation for the entire ship, since it is proposed to draw the supplies of air from the ship's hull. This, also, seems indisputable. 4. Economy in first cost. The engine is about equal in cost to a steam-engine, and hence saves the cost of boilers, having no use for them. 5. Economy in running, requiring but one-fifth the men. This remains to be proved. 6. Lastly and chiefly, economy in fuel; a saving of nine-tenths, or at least four-fifths, the fuel ordinarily consumed by steam-engines of equal power. This remains to be proved. Will the engines fulfil the inventor's expectations? Will they work? A tough question. The writer cannot hazard an opinion, not having seen the soul of the invention, 'the regenerator,' as the inventor has christened it, an attachment sustaining the same relation to a caloric engine that a 'condenser' does to a steam-engine. There is no question as to whether air will expand by heat; expanding, it will drive a piston, no doubt; about these elemental postulates there can be no question. Moist air will expand by higher ratios than dry air; but even dry air will increase its volumn over ten per cent. by receiving 90 degrees of heat; ordinary atmospheric air increases its volumn fifty per cent. between zero and the boiling point. (Encyc. Met., 'Pneumet.,' §§ 20-21.) But the question, 'Can air be quickly heated and quickly cooled; can it be made to shrink in the cylinder instantly, as steam does when it escapes into the condenser?' This is a question which the writer cannot answer. Captain Ericsson's 'regenerator' is intended to accomplish this. It is to heat the air as it rushes into the cylinder, and cool the air, or receive back the heat, all but 34 or 40 degrees lost by radiation; as the air makes its escape. Furthermore, it is to discharge this office promptly, instantly, so that the slenderest volumn will, on entering, become round and stout, and portly as an alderman; but, on returning, unlike the alderman, will disgorge its gettings, and go forth slim as it came, and leave its heat and sudden portliness for the next occupant. The furnaces have need to supply only the little loss of 30 degrees or so out of 400 or 500 which the air receives by inheritance from its predecessors, merely the leakage by radiation. Such claims as these excite scepticism. They do not necessarily involve an absurdity, and if this 'regenerator' will do what is claimed to be doing already in an experimental engine, then beyond a question the caloric engine will work, and the days of steam are numbered. A few weeks will settle the question. The Ericsson is a float, and her engines are well nigh complete. Expectation is on tiptoe."—The Daily News

NAPOLEON IN FRANCE.

We cut the following from the Paris correspondence of the New Orleans Picayune. It is George W. Kendall who is writing:

At last accounts—and the telegraph brings us intelligence down to yesterday, Louis Napoleon was at Baden-Baden, whither he had gone after a perfectly triumphal reception at Strasburg. The papers will tell you that the object of his visit to the lattet city was to be present at the opening of the new rail-road connecting it with Paris. At every point on the long route his appearance was marked by an enthusiasm most unwonted even in France—there is no mistake about this—while at Strasburg the inhabitants went almost crazy in their desire to do him honor. I know this to be so from private accounts; I do not gather it from the public reports of his progress. After the ceremonies of the inauguration of the road were over, he appeared among the citizens in plain clothes, and without escort of any kind, when the enthusiasm seemed to increase. I note these things as matters of history, and to show the real state of feeling in France, wherever its ruler appears openly among the inhabitants. I have never been an admirer of Louis Napoleon; on the contrary, I have ever looked upon the act by which he assumed power as a positive and unjustifiable usurpation. But at the same time I have ever contended that the French were utterly unable to govern themselves—that the despotism of the one-man power, as the masses are at present educated, was preferable to the absurd attempts of the many to carry on a republic—and I simply point to the present happy state of the country as proof that I have not been far out of the way. Every day the evidence accumulates that the people of Europe are utterly incapable of self-government—they are half a century behind us in all the essentials that render men able to govern themselves, the preachings of swarms of revolution—mongers to the contrary. And when we all know that the Dictator of France walks about openly among all classes of his subjects, without guard or escort, and when we furtner know that the Emperor of Austria has just returned from a visit to Hungary, through the length and breadth of which he has passed without a corporal's guard, and amid the rejoicings of a community which seemed to greet him as one man—when all this passes under our notice, or comes well authenticated by facts, it is nearly time for us to receive our sympathy and our intervention until we can find a better market for them than Europe at present offers. But I will pester you no more with politics this morning.—Macon Republican.

A GOOD ARGUMENT.

A correspondent of the Boston Traveller, in an article on the liquor law, thus treats of the cant about the wrong of prohibiting the sale and confiscation of liquors:

"When it is wrong to prohibit by law the promiscuous sale of gunpowder—when it is wrong to prohibit by law all persons from importing, printing publishing, selling or distributing any book, any phamphlet, ballad, printed paper, or any other thing containing obscene language, or obscene prints, pictures, figures or discriptions, manifestly tending to the corruption of the morals of youth, upon penalty of fines and imprisonment,—then I shall believe it is wrong to probibit by law an article that is ten thousand times more destructive of life than gunpowder, and the parent of more obscenity than any other manufactured article in existence. And you might as well talk about its being wrong to confiscate the property invested in obscene prints and publications as that intoxicating liquor designed as a beverage."—The Southern Baptist

SPIRTUAL SETTLEMENT.—CURIOUS MOVEMENT.—A colony of sixty persons gathered from Northampton, Mass., Brooklyn and Auburn, New York, all firm believers in what is termed Spiritual Philosphy (announced by A. J. Davis, et al.' (have purchased 9000 acres of land in a splendid location, about forty miles from the head of steamboat navigation, on the Kanawha, and fifty miles from Charleston, Va. upon which they have settled. They do not have a community of property, but each man is steward of his own substance—'maintaining unity of faith in the bonds of peace." In general, they receive all they spiritual and temporal, advice from the spirit world. The object stated is spiritual and integral development, which they expect to promote by living in one community. On the property purchased, are mills, a tavern stand, post-office and store.—The Southern Baptist

EXTRAORDINARY PRODUCT OF A PEA.—Mr. David Hamlin, of Oley, lately left at the office of the Syracuse Journal, the product of a single common field pea, grown the present season, in his garden. The vine is five feet in length, and about three inches from the roots divides into six branches, each of which grew more luxuriantly than do ordinary vines. There were upon this vine one hundred and fifty-three pods, which contained seven hundred and forty peas—very nearly a pint in bulk.—N. Y. Sun.

LONDON AT NIGHT.

BY HORACE GREELY.

In one of his letters to the Tribune, Mr. Greely thus describes "London at Midnight."

"London is given to late hours. At 6 A. M., though the sun has long been up, there are few stirring in the principal streets; occasionally you may meet a cab hurrying with some passenger to take an early train; but few shutters are down at 7, and scarcely an omnibus is seen till after 8. The aristocratic dinner hour is 8 P. M., though I trust few are so unmerciful to themselves as to postpone their chief meal to that late hour when they have no company. The morning to sleep, the afternoon to business, and the evening to enjoyment, seems the usual routine with the favored classes.

"Walking home from a soiree at the West End, through Regent street, Haymarket and the Strand once at midnight, I was struck, though accustomed to all manner of late hours in New York, with the relative activity and wide awake aspect of London at that late hour. It seemed the High Change of revelry and pleasure-seeking. The taverns, the clubs, and drinking shops, betrayed no symptoms of drowsiness; the theatres were barely beginning to emit their jaded multitudes, the cabs and private carriages were more plentiful than by day, and were briskly wheeling hundreds from party to party; even the omnibuses rattled down the wide streets as freshly and almost as numerously as at mid-day. The policemen were alert on nearly every corner; sharpers and suspicious characters stepped nimbly about the cross-streets in quest of prey, and innumerable wrecks of womanhood, God pity them! shed a deeper darkness over the shaded and dusky lanes and by ways, whence they momentarily emerged to salute the passer by. Beneath the shelter of night, misery stole forth from its squalid lair, no longer awed by the police, to beseech the compassion of the stranger, and pour its tale of woe and suffering into the rarely willing ear. Serene and silvery in the clear night air, rose the nearly full moon over Southwark, shedding a soft and mellow light on pillar and edifice, column and spire, and enduring the placid bosom of the Thames with a tranquil and spiritual beauty. Such was one glimpse of London at midnight. I have not seen it so impressive by day.—The Southern Baptist

A DUTCH JUDGE.

A friend gives us an amusing idea of "a Dutch judge" in the following sketch; He was about to sentence a prisoner, and on looking around for him, found him playing chequers with his custodian, while the foreman of the jury was fast asleep. Replenishing the ample judicial chair with his broardcast person, he thus addressed the jury: "Mister voreman, and t'oder jurymans: Der brisoner, Hans Vleckter is vinished his game mit der sheriff, and has peat him, but I shall dake gare he don't peat me. Hans has been dried for murder pefore you, and you must pring in der vardick, but it must pe'corgin'to der law. Der man he kill't wasn't kill't at all, as it was broved he is in der jail at Morrisdown for sheep sdealing. Put dat ish no madder. Der law says ven dere ish a ton't you give' em to der brisoner; but here dere ish no ton't—so you see der brisoner ish guilty. Pesides, he ish a great loafer. I haf know'd him vifty year, and he hasn't done a sditch of work in all dat dimes, and dere ish no one debending upon him for deir livin', and he ish no use to no pody. I dink it would be goot blams to hang him for de examble. I dink, Mr. voremans, dat he pette be hung next four't of July, as der militia ish goin' to drain in anoder gounty, and dere would be no vun goin' on here." It should be added, to the credit of the jury, that in spite of this "learned and impartial charge," they acquitted the "brisoner," finding him "not guilty, and he would leave the state."—True Flag.

THE INFLUENCE OF MAN OVER MAN.

THE world is filled with the countless and interlacing filaments of influence that spread from each individual over the whole surface and frame-work of society. The infant that lies waiting and helpless in the arms of its mother, is already wielding an influence felt through the whole household, by his fretfulness, disturbing, or by his serene smiles, gladdening that entire home; and as with added years, his faculties are expanded, and the sphere of his activity widens itself, his influence increases; and every man whom he meets, much more whom he moulds and governs, becomes the more happy or the more wretched the better or the worse, according to the character of his spirit and example. Nor can he strip from himself this influence. If he flee away from the society of his fellows to dwell alone in the wilderness, he leaves behind him the example of neglected duty, and the memory of disregarded love, to curse the family he has abandoned. Even in the pathless desert he finds his own feet caught in the thorns and entangled web of influence that bound him to society, and his cords remain wherever he was once known, sending home to the hearts that twined around him sorrow and pain. Nor can the possessor expect it to go down into the grave with him.

The sepulchre may have closed in silence over him, and his name may have perished from among men, yet his influence, nameless as it is, and untraceable by the human eye, is floating over the face of society. As in the external and visible world, the fall of a pebble agitates, not perceptibly, indeed, yet really, the whole mass of the earth; thus in the world of morals, every act of every spirit, is telling upon the system of moral beings to which God has bound him. No man leaves the world in all things such, as he found it — the habits which he was instrumental in forming, may go on from century to century, an heir-loom, for good or for evil, doing their work of misery or of happiness, blasting or blessing the country that has now lost all records of his memory. In the case of some, this influence is most sensible. Every age beholds and owns their power. Such men have lived. The church yet feels, throughout all lands, the influence of the thoughts that passed, perhaps, in the solitude of midnight, through the bosom of Paul, as he sat in the shadows of his prison, an old and unbefriended man—thoughts which, lifting his manacled hands, he spread in the epistles before the eyes of men, there to remain forever. They feel the effect of the pious meditations of David, while roaming on the hill side, an humble shepherd lad; of the family piety of Abraham, and of the religous nurture that trained up the infancy of Moses. Every nation is affected at this moment by the moral power that emanated from the despised Noah, as that preacher of righteousness sat among his family, perhaps dejected and faint from unsuccessful toil, teaching them to call upon God, when all the families of the earth beside had forgotten him — And if the mind, taking its flight from the narrow precincts of these walls, were to wander abroad along the peopled highways, and to the farthest hamlet of our own land, and passing the seas, to traverse distant realms and barbarous coasts, every man whom its travels met—nay, every being of human mould that has ever trodden this earth in earlier ages, or that is now to be found among its moving myriads, has felt, or is feeling, the influence of the thoughts of a solitary woman, who, centuries since, stood debating the claims of conscience and of sin, amid the verdant glories of the yet unforfeited paradise.—Williams.

STEAM COMMUNICATION WITH AFRICA.—Those who have had their early fancies pleased by the poetical fictions of the golden and iron ages can scarcely forbear some amused recollection of their classic readings when they observe the combined influence of gold and iron on the proceedings of the present period. In place of figurative allusions, however, we have practical effects, and the two metals, the precious and the useful, are daily giving fresh impulse to the progress of a plodding people, who are pushing forward their affairs with a celerity sometimes amazing to themselves. Gold is absolutely turning up in glittering heaps beyond the visions of eastern story-tellers, and iron is realizing wonders exceeding those fabricated by the wildest imaginations. What will be the sum total of the effect to be produced by a largely increased supply of gold is difficult to foresee, and those who are interested in the markets of the world are already perplexed in their forethought of future relative values. One effect of the abundance of a commodity whose value is so readily recognized may, we think, be safely predicted. It will give increased impulse to all projects having for their object increased rapidity of intercourse and increased celerity of operation. And here iron comes in to play its important part in the great scheme of reality, and, while displacing old systems, rapidly leaves them all "looming in the distance." Iron roads and iron locomotives have already changed, and are still changing, all the internal operations of the active populations of the world, and iron steamers are destined to have a wider and still more important effect upon ocean commerce. It is foreign to our purpose to show that the recognized superiority of iron screw steamers will give England the lead in the most important branches of trade; but a very little reflection will make it evident that even America herself must either employ us to construct that class of vessel for her, or she must quietly resign to England the palm of superiority. The genius of the age tends to rapidity of operation in every branch of service. Men of interprise are not now content unless they can perform with increased safety and effect, and more perfect system, two, three, four or five operations in the same time that was formerly only sufficient for one. We have been led into this train of reflection by learning that a line of iron screw steamers will, ere long, be brought into action for the purpose of trading entirely along the whole line of the African coast. It is intended that the new iron casks invented and patented by Mr. John Clare, jun., of this town, shall work a conspicuous part in facilitating the transactions of those who conduct these steamers. The contract for these casks has been undertaken by Messrs. Fox, Henderson, and Co., who, having tested them in every way, have given them the sanction of their judgment. The advantages set forth in their favour are manifold. They are cheap, portable, and durable. They can be carried in a far less compass than wooden staves, and will outlast hundreds of cargoes of these their most inconvenient predecessors. They can be set up into casks of the usual capacity by the commonest labourer, so that the expensive aid of the cooper, who dreads the African coast, and will not proceed thither but for high remuneration, will no longer be needed. When set up and filled with palm oil, they may be rolled and stowed with facility, and the absorption and leakage, which have been such serious items of loss, will no longer take place, for iron absorbs not, shrinks not, neither does it yield in any way to the subtle influence of the oil. It is anticipated that, when the arrangements for trading along the coast are properly systematized, the use of the casks will so facilitate operations and economize the trade that a complete revolution will be affected in that important branch of commerce. Without iron casks even iron steamers will be retarded in their operations, and subjected to all the losses and vexations to which the palm-oil trade has hitherto been liable. We might mention numerous other purposes connected with commerce for which iron casks are suitable, and for which they will shortly be used, but, as our immediate object was not so much to give notoriety to this new invention as to mention the project with which it is connected, and incidentally to show the important use to which iron may be turned, we need not pursue that portion of the subject. We may observe that, when iron is found to possess such advantages as the material of so humble a receptacle as a cask, we may expect shortly to hear of its employment in the manufacture of other articles for which its adaptation has not yet been made manifest.—The London Times of October 23.

"I CANNOT STAND THAT"

AND what could it be that the sailor could not stand? He had stood the beating of many a storm. Often had he mounted up to heaven, and gone down again into the depths. Many a time had his soul been melted because of trouble. Yet he has rode on the storm; trod the billowy deep boldly, and given his troubles to the winds. But now he meets something which he "cannot stand." What is it? He can stand the perils of a lee shore. He can bear a gale a night and a day in the deep. He can buffet the hardest gale that ever blew off the "Horn." He can do and endure more severe labor and hardship than any other man; but now he knocks under. It is the picture on the cover of a tract of a woman teaching a child. "O," said he, "I cannot stand that; it reminds me of my poor dear mother; it is just the way she used to teach me; but she is gone;" and he burst into tears.

Mother! there are no human teachings like your own. Call your boy to your side, and give him instructions warm from a mother's heart. And should that boy break away from his home, and become a rover on the deep, some little incident may recall the scenes of his early years. He, too, may be reminded of his "poor dear mother," who used to call him to her side, and tell him about Jesus Christ, and the way to eternal life.—Sailor's Magazine

DUTY AND GLORY.

IT has been said that the Duke of Wellington never wrote a despatch in which the word duty did not occur, and that Napoleon never wrote a despatch to which the word glory was wanting. That is the difference between the two men, and the two countries to which they belonged. It was that moral superiority that made Wellington the final victor. As a mere General, the Duke of Wellington was immeasurably the inferior of Napoleon. Napoleon displayed more genius in any one campaign, than Wellington did in his whole life; but the dogged man of duty triumphed at length over the brilliant man of glory;—so it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be. The French may laugh at the stolidity and stupidity of the Englishman, but so long as the one race is capable of believing in the august and commanding nature of duty, and the other race is not, England's supremacy will be maintained. For every Napoleon produced by France, Britain will be able to find a Wellington.—Home Journal

The lava of Etna, since the eruption, has taken another direction, and is fast approaching Milo, the inhabitants of which, to save the wood, are cutting down their chesnut trees, and, of course, emptying their houses. A specimen has been sent to Malta, and has been pronounced of the very best quality.—The Baltimore Weekly American.

LOUIS NAPOLEON.—The London Times of October 18 has the following article, elicited by the circumstances attending Louis Napoleon's return to Paris from his tour to Marseilles:

The triumphs and stately processions which the world has witnessed in various ages, from the barbaric splendor of Oriental monarchy or the military solemnities of the Roman Commonwealth to the ceremonious festivities of the middle ages or the compact array of modern armies, have commonly been regarded as the symbols of established authority or the highest rewards of great achievments. It might indeed be observed in past times, that whenever a power started up less regularly constituted or less known to fame, the splendor of its trappings and its parade seem to augment in an inverse ratio to its exploits, since it was easier to copy the externals of majesty than to acquire its real character. The Tribune Rienzi is still remembered by the conspicuous attire and pompous cavalcade with which he marched from the Capitol to the Lateran; and the fisherman of Naples so soon outshone in his brief magnificence the Viceroys of Spain, whom he expelled.

As the Court of Byzantium faded into degeneracy and impotence, until retained nothing of the ages of Imperial Rome but the purple buskins of the Emperor and the servile adulation of the people, the luxury of the palace and the gorgeous exhibitions of the circus and streets increased, as if to hide the decay of real power and manly virtue. Augustus Cæsar, when he had risen to the absolute and perpetual master of the world, maintained in the titles and in all the places of social life that of a private Roman; the Porphyrogeniti of the late Empire affected no such simplicity, and posterity itself is amazed by their magnificence while it smiles at their dominion.

We cannot defend ourselves against these associations, as we relate the unexampled parade with which Louis Napoleon accomplished on Saturday his laborious return to Paris. The stimulants unsparingly administered to the curiosity and the taste of that great city the indefatigable exertions of the Government, and the example of provincial enthusiasm, had certainly stirred the masses of the population. Never, probably, did so prodigious a concourse of people throng those well trodden streets; never did a nation display greater unconsciousness of the past or indifference to the future. Six triumphal arches spanned the magnificent avenue of the Boulevards from the site of the Bastile to the gate of the Tuileries. The houses and terraces were profusely decorated with the colors and emblems of the Imperial dynasty, and the cipher of Napoleon III. was everywhere allow to anticipate the formal proclamation of the new autocrat. An immense array of armed men proceeded, followed, and encompassed the practic heir of Napoleon; for to use an expression applied by Tacitus on a similar occasion, he advance "sepultus armatus" to take possesion of that Empire which we are told is Peace."

In this guise he proceeded with all the state of absolute power, saluted by the priests and sanctioned by the spontaneous and unreluctant servitude of the nation, to take possession of that palace from which less than five years ago the outraged sovereign of a constitutional monarchy was ignominiously expelled; The people who threw off the yoke of Louis Phillipe's authority have never stopped till they immolated the last of their liberties and prostrated themselves before Louis Napoleon; and that historic edific to which M. Louis Blanc once assigned the name and destination of a "Hospital for Civil Invalids" is once more the seat of a military Court. It is still the same people which has rattled with frantic acclamations the rise and down fall of ten or twelve successive Powers in half a century—which defiled from morn to sunset before M. Ledru Rollin at his Feast of Fraternity, and listened with rapture to the Republican harangues of M. de Lamartine. The very pavement over which this colossal pageantry did parade was thrown up to make the barricades of February and of June, and the windows which were thronged with enthusiastic spectators, and hung with spangled draperies and banners, are the same into which the brutal and brutal and indiscriminating fire of the troops of the Dictors was poured on the 5th of last December.

If these contrasts occured as forcibly to the French people as they do to the rest of the world and if the present were ever placed beside the past, such solemnities, as that of last Saturday would furnish an ample subject of reflection and surprise, rather than one of enthusiasm or of joy. But each of these scenes has passed away as rapidly as running water; the very person who took part in them are just as ready to wear the new badge and rise the cry of the hour; for to-morrow the engagements and noises of to day will be to them as those of yesterday. With the exception of the diplomatic body, which wisely stands aloof, every class of public servants was represented in this procession and on this occasion. The workmen of the Faubourgs—the very men who were described but a few months ago as untameable barbarians to be hewn down without mercy in street warfare—are not behindhand in giving in their allegiance to the most despotic form of authority, and we do not question that a large proportion of the enthusiasm witnessed on the occasion was genuine, though it has been heightened by all the artifices that could be employed by the Government. It is a singular proof of the tenacity of Louis Napoleon's character that after having failed in two attempts to kindle the excitement of the populace of Paris at the Feast of Eagles and at his entry from Strasburg, he should now have repeated the experiment on a larger scale, and with success. He has attained the great object of his ambition, and the crown which he is about to resume is tendered to him by millions who care not to know more of the true character of their future ruler and his policy than they can discover from his holy-day speeches and holyday dresses.

Arrived at this point in his singular career, it is certainly in the power of Louis Napoleon to repair some part of the evils and injustice that have attended his dictatorship and to confute the suspicions and the resentment which the lawless policy of the last few months has justly excited. If his Government really possesses the strength to mitigate those measures of security which are henceforth useless. If those measures are, on the contrary, its main support, it rests on them, and not on the gratitude and affection of the people of France. But the new Emperor, as we suppose he will soon be styled, may, unquestionably, inaugurate his reign, if he be so advised, by acts of clemency, confidence and justice, which would obliterate from the facile memories of his subjects the traces of those flagrant acts which accompanied his rise. He may proclaim a general amnesty to the victims of those political parties which he professes to have extinguished and united; he may set an example to Europe, which would be the soundest pledge of peace, by effecting a large and immediate reduction of the army; and he may gradually restore at least some shadow of that former freedom to the people he aspires to govern.

If we have been foremost to denounce a series of acts which were disgraced by all the excesses of arbitrary power, and which cannot but excite the gravest apprehensions for the future we shall not be the less ready to acknowledge any change in the policy of the French Government which bears the stamp of magnanimity and sincerity. It is obvious that the maintenance of the existing Government within the bounds of moderation and of peace (if those limits can be observed by a power so constructed) promises more tranquility to Europe than the occurrence of any fresh revolution leading to incalculable consequences. But until some such measures have been adopted, and until those pledges have been given, even this momentary tranquility, purchased by the loss of all freedom, is, as insecure as it is oppressive, and the acclamations that welcomed Louis Napoleon on his return to Paris were elected from the people by hopes and expectations for which we can at present discover no solid foundation.

REMARKS ON LIBERIA.

If the colored man is determined to remain in this country, in spite of the wrongs he is obliged to suffer, we know of no way but to let him. None but criminals can properly have a residence assigned them other than they please to choose. But what we insist is, that the colored men of intelligence and energy are willfully blind to their own interests and those of their race, in decrying colonization. It is most evident, if they remain with us, they must forego political and social equality for a long time to come; while in the colony of Liberia, their rights would be unquestioned. "Ah!" says the American-born African, "Liberia is a foreign barbarous and pestilential clime. America is our native land, for which our fathers fought and bled side by side with yours. We won't go to Africa; give us our rights where we belong."

Now, we always thought they ought to have the same political rights with other men, and our vote was one of the few so vastly out numbered by the nays when the question of colored suffrage was before the people. But when things don't work as we think they ought, we have to accept them as they are. Colored men were refused the right of suffrage, and, if the question was up again to-day, they would again be refused, probably by as heavy a vote, if not heavier, than before. So the plain alternative of political and social inferiority here, or of sovereign, unquestioned manhood in Liberia is presented. Yes, but Liberia is "foreign." So is California foreign to the thousands who are constantly urging their way to its distant shores; so is America foreign to the multitudes of Irish, English and Germans, who forsake their native land for homes where they can enjoy political rights. Emigration is a great feature of the age, and a great promoter of human progress.

Liberia is "barbarous." How is that? The Colonization Society has transported some eight or ten thousand of the most respectable and intelligent colored people of this country to the colony. Schools, churches and newspapers flourish among them. Good order and social refinement are prominent characteristics of the people. If they are barbarous, what is civilization? To call them barbarous is to impeach the capacity of the African for improvement. No sagacious colored man should do it.

Liberia is "pestilential." No doubt, in low swampy localities there is an unhealthy element. It is so in all parts of the world. But all reliable accounts represent the climate of Liberia to be as salubrious and genial as the soil is fertile and prolific. If our colored population would possess themselves of some information about the country of their ancestors, cease swallowing, without digestion, the crazy denunciations of men who find their interest in crying down colonization, they would soon obtain better opinions of their mother country. And, with a better notion of the country, hundreds of men would voluntarily improve their condition by removing thither. Every intelligent and worthy colored man, like the writer of the foregoing article, ought to aspire to civil honors, and a high degree of political and social distinction. The vote on colored suffrage teaches him what to expect by remaining in this repressive land."

One word as to the test of the African's capacity for civilization and self-government, and we dismiss the subject.

That numerous slaves even have proved their humanity by well-developed minds and high moral worth is well enough known. Individual specimens do not exactly settle the question we are after. When the colony of Liberia shall become the seat of a powerful nation, and the centre of republican liberty wisely sustained by the native population of Africa, a far more interesting problem will have been solved. Nowhere on the face of the earth is there a free community of civilized negroes except that of Liberia. Even Hayti has her Emperor; and Sierra Leone is ruled by subordinates of the British crown. Therefore Liberia is one of the most interesting germs of national growth the world has ever seen. The negro should watch the issue of the experiment with quite as deep a solicitude as philanthropists of any other color. Its success will be the harbinger of honor and liberation to Africa at home," as well as Africa on the Continental shores of the Eastern Continent.

From the Liberia Herald.

THE REPUBLIC OF LIBERIA

On the Western Coast of Africa was planted a few years since a colony of free colored people from the United States of America, which is already attracting to it the attention of almost the whole civilized world.

For [illegible] since, this colony declared itself independent, and, with the consent of those who had the government of it, were erected into a Republic. Prior to that period it had been governed by an agent appointed by the Society which had undertaken to found the Colony.—On the 24th of August, 1847 the Colony entered upon the experiment of self-government. Our government had given the problem of the capacity of the Anglo Saxon to govern himself, a problem which had hitherto been doubtful. Liberia is now solving a still more doubtful problem, whether the African race can govern themselves. It is this fact that throws around the infant Republic the intense interest with which it is regarded by the world. If it fail the hopes of Africa and her scattered sons go down with it, if it succeed, she will speedily stretch forth her hands unto God. Their government like our own, is strictly representative. It consists of a President, a Vice-President, a Secretary of State, a Treasurer, a Senate, a House of Representative, and a Judiciary. The Republic extends about 400 miles along the western coast of Africa, between 4 deg. and 7 deg. North latitude and reaches from the coast into the interior about 25 miles. Monrovia, situated in the northern part, is the capital; adjacent to which there are several quite flourishing towns & villages. In its southern part is Cape Palmas. North of Liberia is the English possession of Sierra Leone, containing some 43,000 inhabitants blest with the means of progress and civilization, under the fostering care of the British government. Between eight and ten thousand colored persons, many of them being emancipated slaves, have emigrated from this country to Liberia. More than 80,000 of the natives have become citizens of the new Republic; and besides suppressing the slave trade in their own dominions, treaties have been formed with several other tribes having the same object in view.—The commerce of the Republic amounts annually to about $500,000. The expense of conducting the government for the year 1851, ending 30th of September, amounted to $34,039, 14. The Methodists, the Presbyterian, the Baptist, and the Episcopalians, have, each of them, established missionary stations in Liberia. The people have the Sabbath, the Bible, the Christian ministry the church, the school system, a free government, a good soil and fine climate, as the elements, of their future growth.

They have been exceedingly fortunate in the choice of their first Presiding officer, who seems, in many respects, like our own Washington, to have been raised up, and qualified by Providence for the difficult position which he is called to occupy. Seeing no hope of rising to the level of a true and independent manhood in this country, he emigrated to his father land, and after a few years residence, received the appointment from the American Colonization Society of Agent for the government of the Colony.—When they declared themselves independent he was chosen President by the people, and at the late election was re-elected to the same office. He has had much to do in shaping the Constitution and laws of the Republic and will have his impress for good or evil upon it, for all coming time. His inaugural Address, and his annual Message, have been lately received, and bear the impress of a mature mind, deeply sensible of the difficulties and responsibilities of the position which he occupies. He opens with the following cheering and heneful announcement:

"For four years Liberia has maintained her position as an independent State; and though her path has been strewed with innumerable difficulties who can deny that her course has been onward? I question whether history can produce an instance where any people, under the same adverse circumstances, have made greater progress in nationality than the people of Liberia. And I have yet to be convinced that any other people, of whatever race, have presented greater proofs of capacity for self-government. Who can point to the period in the history of Liberia, when anarchy and confusion, when law & order were no longer maintained among her citizens? No, gentlemen; the skeptic must stand mute; the people of Liberia understood too well their true interests, and appreciate too highly their republican institutions."

In regard to the bearing and influence of the republic upon the surrounding tribes, which is one of the most interesting aspects in which it can be looked at by the Philanthropist and christian, President Roberts make the following encouraging assatement in his message:

"It affords me great satisfaction, to be able to inform the Legislature that, except the difficulties in Grand Bassa, our relations with the tribes bordering on our territories, and those within our jurisdiction, have undergone no material change since your last session. And generally from a conviction that we consider them a part of ourselves, and cherish with sincerity their rights and interests, the attachment of the natives is daily gaining strength. Constant applications are being made to the government to supply them with school teachers, and with other qualified persons to reside among them, to instruct them in the civilized modes of agriculture and the mechanic arts; and it is a matter of deep regret that the government, for want of pecuniary means, has not been able to meet their wishes but to an exceedingly limited extent.

"The superiority of civilized over savage life is here brought to the view of the natives in a way in which they cannot shut their eyes against it. Whatever differences of opinion may exist upon the question as to what influence the existence of such a Republic is to exert upon slavery in this country, all must admit that it is to work a mighty revolution among the native tribes of Africans, if it continues to live and flourish. In this view of it, it is an enterprise which all good men, who love their race and wish to see them christianized and civilized, whether they live at the North or the South, must unite in promoting. The superiority of civilized, and especially Christianized man, naturally impresses his barbarous neighbor.

Rome conquered Greece with her arms; yet the latter conquered the former with her civilization. We cannot but hope, we are strongly disposed to believe that the Republic of Liberia is destined to work out important results for Africa. It is yet in its infancy; let it, however, be preserved and enlarged, and it must become a stupendous power in that dark and bleeding land.

We can conceive no good and valid reason which ought to induce a philanthropist, either of the extreme South or the furthest North, to oppose it. To us it seems clear that self interest as well as duty, ought to incline our citizens, as well as our government, to lend a helping hand to this young Republic. England and France have recognized its independent nationality; and the former has already entered into a treaty of commerce with it. President Roberts announces the fact that Prussia has recently taken the same course; and adds, that he has assurance that two or three other European governments will soon follow the example of Prussia, in the recognition of our Independence." As to the attitude of our own government, the President says:

"We have cause, however still to regret that the United States government has not yet seen fit to acknowledge the Independence of this Republic. And though we are not insensible of the cause of this delay, still we had every reason to hope and expect, notwithstanding the peculiar institution of that country, that it would have been among the first to extend to us the friendly hand, to welcome Liberia among the Family of Nations. I am happy to remark, however, that we have still grounds to hope that the United States government will not much longer withhold this token of friendship."

And we would ask, is this hope and expectation an unfounded one? Has not Liberia been planted and fostered by our own hands; have not our greatest and best statesmen, our Jefferson, our Monroe our Harrison, our Taylor, our Clay, and Fillmore expressed the liveliest interest in its success, some of them in their official capacity? Liberia is a separate and independent nation as much as we are. She has copied our laws and is endeavoring to reproduce our institutions. Why shall we not take her by the hand and encourage her feeble and tottering steps. She may yet enable us to solve the inexplicable enigma of our own destiny as a nation. Who knows but that Providence has caused her to [illegible] for this very purpose.

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr Editor.

Saturday the 15th inst being the anniversary of the day on which the memorable battle was fought, and the famous victory achieved at Boyer's town; it was celebrated according to a previous arrangement of the city authorities, with appropriate honors. A gun fired from Central Hill announced the hour of 8 A M when the star and stripes were hoisted at the Government House, State House and Fort Carnot guns were also fired from Central Hill at 12 M. and at 6 P M.

But perhaps the best was reserved for the evening. At 6. P. M. the officers of the 1st regiment assembled in Regimentals, at the residence of President Roberts where they were formed in line and marched, to music of the [illegible] under command of Col. to the Seminary building, where a supper had been procured for them by the Ladies of the L. L. Institute.

Before the supper was served, there were certain exercises performed of a very interesting character, and with which we were particularly pleased. The Ladies had invited the Rev. A. F. Russel, who accompanied the regiment during the campaign, as chaplain, and Major Erskine, to deliver addresses on the occasion.—After they had sung two stanzas of a hymn, and Revd D. B. Warner had prayed Mr Russel rose and spoke at considerable length, with remarkable effect. He said he was not aware he had been opposed to war for several reasons which he stated,—but that there was [illegible] of war to which he was, and always was opposed, especially opposed, and that was aggressive war—war caused by the ambition [illegible] sake of fame territorial acquisitions &c. He believed such wars to be opposed to the spirit of christianity.—But the late war [illegible] Fish men was not of such character—it was not defensive war—it was the only means of honor and dignity of Liberia against the [illegible] conspirators and insurrectionists &c and he defied any man in the world to assert truthfully that there has been any other kind of war fought in Liberia.

Mr R. then gave a description of the Campaign from the marching of the troops from Fishtown to their arrival at Tradetown, the scene of the illustrious battle. After which, he took his seat.

Major Erskine then rose and continued the narration, describing the battle &c. He closed with some very happy remarks relative to the prospects of Liberia—the civilization of Africa &c. The exercises were then concluded with singing by the Ladies of the Institute.

Soon afterwards the supper, which was not intended to be a very sumptuous affair, was served—There was an abundance of nice things however. The time was most aggreeably spent especially was it leasing when the voice of the Ladies began to be heard.—for there was a number of these lovely creatures present, besides the members of the Institute—The company dismissed about 10 O'clock, very well pleased with the exercises and enjoyments of the evening.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, JANUARY 19th, 1853.

Another year has been fairly entered upon, and while the hearts of the people of Liberia should be filled with thanks and praise to the Great Doner of the Universe for the many favors he bestowed upon them through the year just passed, in warding off dangers which the most unobservant, could not refrain from contemplating with fearful apprehensions as to the final result of them, they should not forget, at the commencement of a new year, to implore that His gracious protection may be still extended over them, and that He will continue his manifestations of kindness while they further continue to strive to make Liberia the centre of civilization and christianization to the thousand upon thousands of heathens with which our coast abounds. Upon the Government and people of Liberia a fearful responsibility rests. In the providence of God, Liberia was founded, and the people thereof, have been peculiarly protected and guided by His almighty power for the furtherance of His own wise purposes. We are led to fall in with this opinion, if for no other reason, than that, in every step which Liberia has taken to reach its present position, His guidance and protection have been very remarkably manifest. What people on earth commenced their career under circumstances so peculiar, as those of the people of Liberia. They left the land of their birth under the auspices of a Society whose resources were derived from voluntary contributions, & upon which no assurance could be placed but such contributions would be constantly made. We say, home and friends were forsaken, and Africa was sought as an asylum, where liberty could be enjoyed and where a home could be established for every portion of our race who might be disposed to avail themselves of it. We have no intention of following the pioneers to Africa, nor of referring to the trials and dangers which assailed them on their arrival on its shores. It is sufficient for our present purpose, that they succeeded in founding a state after surmounting difficulties which would unpal the stoutest hearts, & but for the powerful interposition of the God of Heaven, our fathers would have been swept off by their savage foes. When the historian some quarter of a century hence, shall write the history of Liberia & faithfully record every remarkable circumstance associated with the early settlement on this mount, the readers of that day will be inclined to treat it as a romance and be incredulous in believing it. The great dangers that for years stared the pioneers of Liberia in the face & their miraculous preservation in almost every instance and the slow but steady growth of Liberia up to the present time, amidst many severe trials and difficulties.—it assuming an independent position and recognized by some of the most powerful nations of the earth, when, it is but scarcely a quarter of a century ago, that the first pioneers placed their feet on these shores—we say in view of all these facts, the history of Liberia will be unique—it will be without a parellel. And to whose agency is to be attributed the success? Surely none will presume to give credit to it to poor feeble man—he may have been the instrument in the hands of God for the accomplishments of his own wise purposes but all the honor is due to Him alone. Are the people of Liberia endeavering to carry out what are evidently his designs? Have they properly considered the fearful obligations they are under, for the spread of civilization and christianization among the aborigines of the country. The fiat has gone forth, and its fulfilment is certain—"that Ethiopia shall stretch forth her hands unto God"—and the people of Liberia, no doubt, are destined by Him who uttered the decree, to bear a prominent part in its accomplishment. Are we (the Liberians) fully aware of the duty assigned to us? Is it our daily thought to look about us, to discover if we are srtetching forth our powers to raise the heathen upon a level with ourselves—to instil into him the doctrines of the Cross? If we are not filled with this impression, depend upon it, the mission with which we are charged has not commenced. We know that many of both sexes, taken from the bonds of idolatry & superstition have been reared in our families, and that they have ceased to worship stocks and stones; but have we done as much as we could have done?

In making these remarks, our aim is to call the attention of our citizens to a subject which we consider of paramount importance, and it is for them to determine if they have attempted to perform their duty. If we fail to carry out the mission assigned to us, be assured that other means will be resorted to, for its accomplishment, and that we will then be under the displeasure of the Almighty—the very thought of such a displeasure should fill our hearts with sadness. We call upon the people of Liberia to use all their endeavors to civilize and christianize the heathen, and it they fail to do so, we recommend to them a strict & an impartial reading of the history of the disobedient Jews

The Superintendants of Sabbath Schools are hereby informed that President Roberts, while in England, was kindly furnished, by Sir Horace St. Paul, with a goodly number of Bibles for the use of sabbath schools, in Liberia; which will be supplied to said schools on application at this office

The 15th, January. Every one will remember the joy and enthusiasm that prevailed in our city, when, on the 23rd, of January 1852, the 1st Regiment returned from the Campaign in Grand Bassa. The soldiers were glad to return home, after having, for so many days, wandered through the wilderness, now wading horrible swamps, and now fording rivers or sailing their way through thick as and dense woods, and their enraptured families and friends were no less glad to welcome them back to their peaceful and pleasant homes from such scenes of difficulties and dangers. And their joy was increased by the reflection, that they welcomed them [illegible] conquerors too, as truly, if not more [illegible] than those of Cæsar and Rome Victorious.

The noble victory which they achieved at Trade Town is next to that of Dec. 1st 1822, without a parallel in the history of Liberian warfare and will doubtless, always be remembered by the people of Liberia—especially will there be a living remembrance of it in the county of Grand Bassa the scene of the battle—as upon the result of that conflict—was suspended the destiny of that county if not of the whole Republic

Had the patriotic band yielded one inch to the enemy in that desperate struggle, the honor and dignity of Liberia, would perhaps have been lost forever. But though they knew that they were in contest with a horde of savages whose numbers were untold, still, they were undaunted and manfully contending they put the enemy to flight scattered and reduced to ashes the town, and as some suppose, impregnable fort and also making such an impression on the natives as will perhaps, always deter them from making aggressive attacks upon the settlements. Now should memory cease to—

"raise her trophies o'er the tomb" of those faithful few, who fell gloriously in the field they fell in the defence of their country

The 15th inst being the anniversary of the day on which the battle was fought and the victory won, appropriate honors were paid it. In another column our readers will find a communication from our correspondent "Patriot" giving a history of the doings of the day.

Recognition.—The President has received from His Excellency the Belgium Minister near the Court of St James a despatch containing a formal recognition of the Independence of the Republic of Liberia, by His Majesty the King of Belgium.

We had hoped that the disturbances so long existing between the Veys and Golahs had measurably ceased, and that tho' it was not probable that sincere friendship would subsist between Dwar-looh-Beh and Boombo, the contending chieftians, yet we were not without hope that they would mutually agree to cease hostilities and lend their united aid in the re-establishment of a general peace. In this opinion, we regret to say we are most sadly disappointed, and we can form no idea as to the duration of of the hostilities now raging at Little Cape Mount. It is not our intention now, to give a history of the causes which first led to the outbreak between these two chieftains, and of the several pacific measures resorted to by our Government, at considerable expenditure of money to reconcile the billigerents—nor of their meeting in congress in this city with a number of kings and chieftians, at the command of the President, that their matter of quarrel might be heard and adjusted. The last meeting of these chieftians took place in December 1851, and when they left for their homes it was well understood that all matters of quarrel were amicably arranged and that in future they would be friends. The President gave them to understand in strong terms that he would not permit them to resume hostilities—that if any cause of difficulty should again aris, between them, and they could not arrive at an amicable understanding between themselves, they should refer their cases to the Government—all of which was well understood and consented to. In case however, either party should commence a war, the chief who acted only on the defensive was to be assisted by Government, and every means would be resorted to to humble the aggressor, and bring him to merited punishment. As soon as it was known that peace was restored, the intercourse with Little Cape Mount largely increased, trade was revived, and songs of rejoicing were heard, where but a few months before, the din and turmoil of savage warriors, only predominated. This peaceful state was but of short duration, owing to the turbulent spirit of Boombo joined with that of Prince Cain of Grand Cape Mount. In May last Boombo again raised the standard of revolt, and burned and sacked the towns of Dwar-loch Beh, and who true to his obligations to the Government, resorted to arms only in defence of his towns and people. The administration of Government was then in the hands of Mr Williams, and Dwar-loch-Beh sent to him for assistance, and for permission to make reprisals—this was not granted, but commissioners were sent to Boombo to demand his reasons for violating his solemn engagements—the commissioners were discourteously received, and they returned without obtaining the least satisfaction. The Government did not cease to remonstrate with Boombo, who all the time was sorely pressing Dwarloo Beh, and as this chief was denied the privilege of making an aggressive movement, he ventured to visit Monrovia, to urge the Government to take immediate measures to relieve him—while here, intelligence reached him that Boombo had taken advantage of his absence and succeeded in capturing his principal town, murdered a number of his people, and held his family prisoners—Mr. Williams accompanied with three commissioners went up to Little Cape Mount in the "Lark" and sent the commissioners on shore with a message to Boombo—he met the commissioners, and while in conference with them, his warriors crossed the river, attacked one of the principal towns of the inoffensive Deys, murdered more than a hundred of them, carried off hundreds into captivity, burned the town to ashes, and all while the Lark was in sight with the then executive officer of the Government on board. The commissioners returned home, and very soon after the regular meeting of the Legislature took place, when the whole of Boombo's treachery and violations of his treaty were laid before it. The Legislature knowing all the facts, passed a Law authorizing a military force to be put on foot to subdue the rebellious chief. The President has delayed to adopt this course, hoping that other measures might be resorted to, to end the difficulties. Dwarloo Beh was in Monrovia the first of the month, the object of his visit was to call the attention of Government to the continued agressions of Boombo—the President assured him that he had the subject then under consideration, and would be hope soon have the country in peace. Dwarloo Beh returned home, and but a very few days after his departure from here news reached the President that Boombo had captured another of his principal towns. Now what is to be done in the premises! Is it just to Dwarloo Beh, that because he has always maintained his integrity to his treaty with the Government, that he should be hindered now, to make aggressive movement to resist the encroachments of this bloody minded desperado? We speak candidly when we say, that the Government too must remember its promises, and if they fail to act strictly up to them, how can it be expected that the native chiefs will! It is in our opinion the duty of Government, without delay, to send an armed force to Little Cape Mount to chastise Boombo, and to Grand Cape Mount after Cain, who has all along acted in connection with Boombo.

WOMAN'S WILL.—Dip the Atlantic ocean very with a teaspoon; twist your heel into the toe of your boot; make mosquitoes perform their promises, and subscribers pay the printers; send up fishing hooks with balloons, and fish for stars; get astride a gossamer and chase a comet; when the rain is coming down like the cataract of Niagara, remember where you left your umbrella; in short, prove all things hitherto considered impossible, to be possible; but never attempt to coax a woman to say she will, when she has made up her mind to say she won't.

POETRY.

THE SABBATH BELL—BY ELIZA COOK.

Peal on, peal on—I love to hear
The old church ding-dong soft and clear!
The welcome sounds are doubly blest
With future hope and earthly rest;
Yes, where no calling changes round,
There's not a place where man may dwell
But he can hear a Sabbath bell.

Go to the woods when winter's song
Howls like a tamished wolf along,
Or when the south winds scarcely turn
The light leaves of the trembling fern—
Although the cloister-chimes ring there,
The heart is called to faith and prayer,
For all Creation's voices tell
The tidings of the Sabbath bell.

Go to the billows let them pour
In gentle calm or headlong roar;
Let the vast ocean be thy home,
Though find a God upon the foam;
In rippling swell or stormy roll
The crystal waves shall wake thy soul,
And thou shalt feel the hallowed spell
Of the wide water's Sabbath bell.

The lark upon his skyward way,
The robin on the hedge-way spray,
The bee within the wild thyme's bloom,
The owl amid the cypress gloom,
All sing, in varied tone,
A vesper to the great unknown;
Above, below, one chorus swells
Of God's unnumbered Sabbath bell.—The Weekly Clipper.

LOVE OF TRUTH.

Sincere love of truth never yet ignited the faggot, or reared the stake of persecution.—Men who scrupulously endeavor the advancement of this invaluable principle, are actuated by a sensitiveness of feeling and reverence for its beauties which operate as salutary checks upon those morose and disorderly passions of our common nature, the gratification of which, though ostensibly consecrated by the most holy pretences of virtue, and of meditated usefulness, would inevitably effect its harm.

What was the conduct of Luther! His persecution of Servetus stamped the lie upon all his pretensions, and made a mockery, even of the cause he espoused. The pleading of passions, not sanctified by the divinity of truth; the desire for worldly aggrandizement, itself at variance with all this more honorable ennobling instincts of the human heart, these too often wrest the right and give impulse to the wrong. Yet let not the sincere disciple of truth despair. In the language of Bryant.

"Truth, crushed to earth shall rise again,
The eternal years of God are her's,
While error, wounded writhes in pain,
And dies among its worshippers."—Christian Banner

A SMART BOY.—A little boy, "well in his boots," for the first time, and very proud of them, said to his mother, after reading his customary chapter in the "family Bible" in the morning:—"Mother, why didn't Moses wear boots?"

"Why, my son, what makes you ask that question? Perhaps he did wear boots, my dear; we don't know.

"No, mother, he didn't because the Bible says that the voice came out of the burning bush, 'take off thy shoes.'"

There was no rejoinder to this "clincher."—Christian Banner

Why is an auger hole' when made too deep, like a man in the water? Because he is overboard.

HUSBANDS AND WIVES

THEIR ERRORS AND THEIR DUTIES.

"But happy they, the happiest of their kind,
Whom gentle stars unite, and in one fate
Their hearts, their fortune, and their beings blend!

Marriage is said to be a lottery. It would seem so indeed in some cases, the contrasts are so extraordinary, and the circumstances so novel. But so solemn a compact, so sacred in the eyes of Heaven and the Law, and so calculated to affect for better or for worse" not only the temporal but the eternal happiness of the parties, should not be thought of lightly or determined upon rashly. We fear that in too many marriages, worldly considerations are permitted to exercise a controling influence. Hands are united, not hearts.—Pecuniary objects, and not harmony of sentiments constitute the motive power! Matches are made with reference to an 'establishment,' and not to a life of peace, tranquility and happiness. The best affections, the highest sympathies are trifled with and sacrificed if not sold, while the glitter of fashion and the pomp and vanity of worldly display, conceal the breaking heart within. Hence the frequent divorces—the unhappy homes, the lonely and deserted wives, the dissolute and reckless husbands. On the other hand, how many rush into matrimony who do not duly consider its responsibilities, who take no note of the future! Controlled by a sudden fancy, influenced by a wild impulse, they hasten on and find 'too late,' that they have assumed a position to which they are inadequate, that the struggles and trials of the world are fearful, that more nerve, patience, and perseverence are necessary than they can command. The excitement, too, the delusion may have passed away, and they are surprised to find imperfections in the angel of their idolatry. They forget that they themselves are human, fallible, full of errors, and thus they cannot make proper allowance for others. They become petulant and prevish, harsh and brutal and the 'rosy and sunny home' that was pictured in the day of dream is converted into a scene of 'strife,' and anger of passion and discord. They find themselves disappointed, sour'd. The prospect has changed, and instead of discovering the cause in themselves, instead of pursuing a magnanimous and manly course, they turn upon the 'ge the one,' into whose ears they so lately poured fond vows and earnest protestations, and make her the source of all the bitterness and vexation! Alas! for the victim under such circumstances. How, day after day, must her withering dream fade, and the withering reality of a long life of sorrow loom before her! How, in her quiet hours, she must remember her early home, and the lovish love that she enjoyed beneath the paternal roof! At times, too, she may recall a mothers love—and feel disposed to unburthen her heart, and communicate the secrets of her soul to the being who watch over he cradle! And yet, why disturb, why agonize unnecessarily—why communicate a sorrow that will only pain and wring without the means of affording relief?

But there is another side to this picture.—There are gentle ones who forget or neglect their duties, and who, by coldness and asperity, make home a scene of perpetual discord. The husband is welcomed with frowns! Complaints are ever uppermost. Nothing satisfies. Toil on, by day or by night, and still the murmur is the same. A peevish, a fretful spirit seems to have taken possession of the better half,' and after struggling in vain against such a constant source of disquiet, the husband abandons his home in despair, and seeks elsewhere for companionship, or at least for exemption from perpetual fault finding.—How fearful this mistake on the part of young wives—how they trifle with affection—how they peril peace of mind! The out door world is full of care and anxiety. The struggle for the means of subsistence often taxes all the energies of body and mind. The competition in trade, the rivalry in business, the vicissitudes of chance and courage, the perils of misfortune, the treachery of friends! Alas! these seldom enter the ordinary reflections of a thoughtless wife, especially if she be vain, proud, and devoted to display. Her ideas are false pride, inflated vanity and a desire to excel; and if her husband do not minister to every whim of the hour, if he be unable to comply with her demands for funds—if he venture to remonstrate against unnecessary expenditures, anger and passion and invective are by no means unusual. He may at the moment be pressed to the earth by some sudden pecuniary exigency, may require the exercise of extraordinary moral courage to maintain his position & sustain his character—may need consolation, encouragement and incentive to exertion, and instead, find reproaches angry looks and harsh insinuations at home! How many men have been maddened and ruined under these circumstances!

How in some sudden moment of excitement have they abandoned the control of their own fortunes, and yielded to the dark impulses of despair. Partners in trade are bound by the law to say nothing of higher and nobler considerations, to assist and sustain each other by every honorable means. How much more incumbent, therefore, is such policy in partners for life, and between those who have united themselves, not only on grounds of affection and principle, but to a certain extent have made their destinies one! How essential the wisdom and duty of mutual forbearance, mutual assistance! How important that each should strive to contribute to the happiness of the other—to soothe the sorrow to share the joy—to counsel and encourage in a moment of adversity, to restrain and subdue in the hour of prosperity! The bond of marriage when entered into wisely, thoughtfully, kindly and generously, is indeed the bond of affection, of concord and of happiness. But the obligation is mutual, and while every husband of a right mind and a right heart, will endeavor to provide to the best of his ability for the necessities and the comfort of the being of his choice the wife should not forget the smile of welcome at night fall, the look and the manner of love that subdued and won. She should not forget the honor, the interest, the happiness and prosperity of the head of the house hold," and the the source of all its comforts!—From the Philadelphia Inquirer.

BREEDING FISH.

VERY interesting experiments have been made in France upon breeding fish. The spawn of fish is scattered in inconceivable profusion, and but a small per centage of the eggs ever develope to animal life. They are washed away before being impregnated, are eaten by other fish, and lost in a hundred ways. The spawn of a fish contains hundreds of thousands of eggs. Over half a million of eggs have been counted in the spawn of a mackerel, and 1,357,000 in the spawn of a single cod. Of the exceedingly small proportion of these eggs which come to life, the greater part are destroyed while the fishes are very young. But few escape the accidents of the deep and reach maturity. The discovery in France, we understand to be simply the preservation of the spawn, and its protection from accident and depredation until it has matured. This is easily done; and thus with trifling care, and with no expense, the production of fish can be secured to an indefinite extent. We suppose, however that some supply of food would be necessary if the experiment should be tried on a large scale; although by the production of differents pecies of fishes in the same waters, the product of one might serve as food for the other.

In this way the shad, the salmon, and other fish, which formerly abounded in our rivers, but which have become almost extinct, might be brought back, and the waters again stocked with their natural tribes. The subject is worthy of public attention. In the present high price of animal and vegetable food, a project which promises an abundant supply of wholesome and cheap diet should be fully investigated. We hope that some scientific men will take up the matter, and that some of the numerous scientific or agricultural associations in the country will furnish the necessary funds and facilities for giving the experiment a fair trial upon a sufficient scale.—Providence Journal.

ENEMIES OF THE OYSTER.

THE enemies of the oyster are many and all of them go about seeking what oyster they may devour. First comes the sea-crab, who seats himself on an oyster and drills a little hole in his back and makes poor oyster's back ache, which causes him to open his mouth to take a long sigh, when the villainous crab runs a "stinger" down his throat and poor oyster is in the sea crab's stomach. On the sea shore bushels of shell are found perfectly riddled with holes by the crab. Sometimes the crab files the oyster's nose off so as to run in his stinger.

Second, come the drum-fish who weighs, about forty or forty pounds, and is about two feet long; he is large about the stomach, and tapers off toward both ends. He is by no means a modest fish, for just as soon as his eye rests on an oyster, he starts towards him, for the purpose of making his acquaintance, and grabbing him in his mouth, smashes him into chowder "in the twinkling of a cat's tail," and immediately looks about for his nearest relative—being opposed to have families seperated, he is anxious to have them all rest in his stomach at once. It is often the case that two or three pounds of oyster shell are found in a drum-fish's stomach.

Third, comes the sea-star—every body knows what a sea-star is for they look just like a star. These stars have points, but no legs; and, as they do not keep horses and wagons, they find it very inconvenient to go a foot—not having any feet—so when they wish to travel, they lock themselves fast to each other until they form a large hill, sometimes ten feet in circumference, and permit themselves to be driven about by the waves of the sea, and roll away, they know not, nor care not whither; but if they happen to roll over an oyster bed, they all immediately let loose of each other and hug the oyster, and wrap their five points about him, and hug him closely, hug him dearly, until the oyster desires him to stop, and just opens his mouth to say, "hold, enough," when the rascally star runs a little "nipper" down oyster's nose, and he is a "gonner."

Fourth, comes man with dragging irons, with scoop, shovels and tongs, pulling him, and making him into an oyster soup, pie, fry, roast, and so on and so forth, eating him whole, and indiscriminately body and soul, without saving the pieces. Thus it is with poor oyster; troubles beset him on every side, and though thousands desire to save him, yet none wish to be him.—Northern Journal

INTERESTING EXPEDITION TO AFRICA. Our government at Washington has completed arrangments for despatching a scientific and exploring expedition to Central Africa, with a view of finding a healthy position some distance inland fitted for the purpose of colonization. The command and entire management of the expedition is entrusted to Commander Lynch of the navy.

The U. S. ship Constitution, under the command of Capt. Mayo, has been detailed for the service, and is to land Comm. Lynch and his party on any part of the African coast he may select. Commander Lynch himself sailed for England, a few days since, in the steamer Arctic and has probably made arrangements as to the time and place of his joining the Constitution. Besides his instructions as to selecting for a district suitable in all respects for colonization, a search for the sources of the river Niger will form part of his duties in Africa; and other views important to the commercial interests of the country.—N. Y. Herald.

SINGULAR FATE OF AUSTRALIA. For three or four generations the Dutch alone had any precise knowledge of Australia. The Dutch had eyes, but saw not. Their Commander, Carsten's, sent out to explore the country, described it as consisting of "barren coasts, shallow waters, islands thinly peopled by cruel, poor, and brutal natives—of very little use." The natives had not found the gold that nature had thrown in their river beds and creeks, and the voyagers did not suspect its existence. The people were hostile and ugly. They wore no glittering chains, as the natives of Peru did. The aspect of the coast was wild, gloomy, barren. No tropical vegetation, no luscious fruits invited the strangers to prolong their stay, or penetrate the thick bush in search of mineral treasure. The Hollanders did not want land; they came in search of trade and gold; and finding neither of these, they threw away a continent as large as Europe, in disgust.—Athenæum.

BOY LOVE.

One of the queerest and funniest things to think of in after life, is "Boy love." No sooner does a boy acquire a tolerable stature, than he begins to imagine himself a man; and to ape manish ways. He casts sideling glances at every tall girl he happens to meet, becoms a regular attendant at church, or meeting; sports a cane, carries his head erect, and struts a little in his walk.—Presently and how very soon, he falls in love: yes, falls is the proper word; because it best indicates his dropsy, debrosé, self abasement. He lives now, in a fairy region, somewhere collateral to the world, and yet, somehow, blended inextricably with it. He perfumes his hair with fragrant oils, scatters essences over his handkerchief, and desperately shaves and annoints for a beard. He quotes poetry in which "dove," and "love," and "heart," and "dart," peculiarly predominate; and, as he plunges deeper into the delicious lethe of his folly, fancies himself filled with the divine afflatus, and suddenly breaks out into the scarlet rash—of rhyme. He feeds upon the looks of his beloved; is raised to the seventh heaven if she speaks a tete-a-tete word; is betrayed into the most astonishing ecstacies by a smile; and is plunged into gloomiest regions of misanthropy by a frown.

He believes himself the most favored lover in the world. There never was such another.—There never will be. He is the one great idolater!—He is the very type of magnanimity, and self abnegations. Wealth! he despises the grovelling thought. Poverty, with the adoration he loved, he rapturously apostrophises as the first of all earthly blessings; and "Love in a Cottage with water and a crust," is his beau ideal paradise of dainty delights.

He declares to himself, with the most solemn emphasis, that he would go through fire, and water; undertake a pilgrimage to China or Kamschatka; swim storm tossed oceans; scale impassable mountains; and face legions of bayonets, but for one sweet smile from her dear lips. He dotts upon a flower she has cast away. He cherishes her glove—a little worn in the fingers—next his heart. He sighs like a locomotive-letting off steam. He scrawls her dear name over quires of foolscap—fitting medium for his insanity. He scornfully depreciates the attentions of his own age; cuts Peter Tiboots, dead because he said that the adorable Angelina had carrety hair; and passes Harry Bell contemptuously, for daring to compare that ugly sky Mary Jane," with his incomparable Angelina.

Happy! happy! foolish Boy love; with its woes, and its fears; its joy and its sorrows; its jealousies and delights; its raptures and its tortures; its ecstatic fervors, and terrible heart burning; its solemn ludicrousness, and its intensely prosaic termination.—[Author's Home Gazette

A HAPPY HOME

A happy home is a glorious and attractive sight; one which it does the heart good to see, and which once beheld, leaves an ineffaceable impression on the mind. Alas, alas! how rarely is such a home to be met with! Every day, we enter family circles that, to our unaccustomed eyes, seem brimming over with mutual love and happiness. But how much of it is real? Do we not too often find that it is nothing more than a holiday garb put on for the occasion, and vanishing with the guest in whose honor it was donned? This fact will not seem strange, when we recollect how easy it is to destroy the peace and unanimity of home. One unquiet spirit, one restless and unruly soul, will transform the calmest circle into a place of torment. A family circle resembles an electrical one. As long as all are similar in disposition, as long as all are actuated by the same motives of mutual love, the current of affection will flow freely and undisturbed; but, introduce one foreign nature, one, impenetrable member, and the circle is immediately broken, the current is disturbed, and where before all was harmony and peace now chaos and confusion. Still, even under its worst aspect, there is a charm in home. Which of us is it, that wandering in the stormy path of the world, does not look back with a certain degree of reverential affection on that old familiar spot, even though its memories may be linked with many an unhappy thought? The limetree beneath whose shadow we rested our weary limbs in the sultry days of summer; the old garden, the theatre of many a daring exploit; the small bed-room where in the long winter nights we wept ourselves to sleep, and there slumbered soundly until the broad sunshine woke us again with all our cares forgotten, and cast off with the joyous indifference of childhood—all these come refreshingly back upon our memories, when, amid the roar and turmoil of the world, we sigh over the chequered days of our youth; when we begin to discover that the age and independence of manhood has not brought that happiness we once imagined; and that after all, the careless boy, even with the rod in back ground, may be a fairer picture than the worldly, calculating man.—Christian Reader

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

Always tell the truth; you will find it easier than lying

Ambition is like a wild horse, which prances once singly untill it has thrown of its rider,

There is nothing like a fixed, steady aim. It dignifies your nature and insures your success

Gratitude is the music of the heart, when its chords are swept by the breeze of kindness.

Though we travel the world over to find the beautiful, we must carry it with us, or we find it not.

In whatever you engage, pursue it with a steadiness of purpose, as though you were determined to succeed.

Be thankful that your lot has fallen on times when, though there may be many evil tongues and exasperated spirits, there are none who have fire and faggot at command.

Sincerity is like traveling in a plain beaten road, which commonly brings a man sooner to his journey's and than bye-ways, in which men often lose themselves.

Have the courage to prefer ease to elegance; to get out of bed when you ought to do; to acknowledge your altered opinions upon conviction; and to confess your fear of God.

He is a great simpleton who imagines that the chief power of wealth is to supply wants. In ninety nine cases out of a hundred, it creates more wants than it supplies.—Ibedem

THE CHINESE IN CALIFONIA.

Passing over economical views of this matter, let us look at it for a moment as Providential. "The heaven, even the heavens are the Lord's, but the earth hath he given to the children of men." And to whom would he be more likely to give a part in peopling its wastes, than to those who are suffering the heaviest ills of over-population? Judging the earth to be a common inheritance, who have better claims that those so suffering?

But there may be higher Providential designs in this movement, than the mere question of elbow room for the Chinese. A large Chinese population, springing up at the West, would ultimately exert an immense reflex upon the land of their origin. Who thinks that Europe will yet feel the influence of the millions whom she is pouring over our unoccupied acres? So will China be influenced by the destiny of those whom she casts upon our shores. Already this expectation is recorded in the letters of American missionaries in China. It is an inevitable thing.

How then shall these Chinese be received? Shall they be treated as human beings—children of a common Father? Shall the gospel be given to them, and be commended to their consideration by the treatment which they receive at our hands? Shall the intelligence which they send back over the oceans commend the religion of a Christian nation? Shall those who return, return missionaries of a pure faith? Such we believe to be the ultimate design of Providence, and to be hastened or delayed, according to the conduct of the present generation. It may not be within the power of American Christians to present hardships as sufferings as their immediate lot; nor is their christianization to be effected but by slow and patient processes. But something can be done; something by way of protest against wrong, and something by way of a beginning, in leading them to the knowledge of the true God, and the great salvation. Thousands of Pagans are brought to our very doors, and our foreign missionary operations can hardly have the merit of consistency if we put forth no efforts for their evangelization.—Watchman & Reflector.

TWENTY PERSUASIVES FROM DESPONDENCY.

1st. If you are distressed in mind—live; serenity and joy may yet dawn upon your soul 2d. If you have been happy and cheerful—live; and diffuse that happiness to others. 3d. If misfortunes assail you by the faults of others—live; you have nothing wherewith to blame yourself. 4th. If misfortunes have arisen from your own misconduct—live; and be wiser in future. 5th. If your are indigent and helples—live: the face of things, like the renewing season, may happily change. 6th If you are rich and prosperous—live; and enjoy what you possess. 7th. If another has injured you—live; the crime will bring its own punishment. 8th If you have injured another—live; and recompense good for evil. 9th. If your character be unjustly attacked—live; that you may see the aspersion disproved. 10th. If the reproaches be well founded—live; and deserve them not in future.—11th If you be eminent and applauded—live; deserve the honors you have acquired. 12th. If your success be not equal to your merit—live; in the happy consciousness of having deserved it. 13th. If your success is beyond your merit—live; in thoughtfulness and humility. 14th. If you have been negligent and useless in society—live; and make amends. 15th. If you have been active and industrious—live; and communicate your improvement to others. 16th. If you have spiteful enemies—live; and disappoint their malevolence. 17th. If you have kind and faithful friends—live; to protect them. 18th and 19th. If you have been wise and virtuous—live; for the benefit of mankind. 20th. If you hope for immortality—live; and prepare to enjoy it.—Hogg's Weekly Instructor.

ANGER.—There is a carelessness, with some in regard to the minor offences against Christian character. Anger is the besetting sin of many. They make little or no effort to subdue or control their passion. The Bible declares that he who ruleth his spirit is better than he who taketh a city. Why not be a conqueror too? How much peace is lost by letting anger rule. How tormenting are unkind and malevolent feelings towards others.

One half of mankind pass their lives in thinking how they shall get a dinner; and the other in thinking what dinner they shall get; and the first are much less injured by occasional fasts than are the latter by constant feasts.

What the impulse of genius is to the great, the instinct of vocation is to the mediocre; in every man there is a magnet,—in that thing which the man can do best there is a loadstone.

It is not study alone that produces a writer,—it is intensity; in the mind, as in a chimney, to make the fire burn hot and quick you must narrow the draught.

One thing is quite clear, that whether Fortune be more like Plutus, or an angel, it is no use abusing her; one may as well throw stones at a star.

The great struggles in life are limited to moments; in the drooping of the head upon the bosom,—in the pressure of the hand upon the brow.

Our minds are like ill-hung vehicles, when they have little to carry they raise a prodigious clatter; when heavily laden they neither creak nor rumble.

Politeness is the outward garment of good-will; but many are the nutshells in which, if you crack them, nothing like a kernel is to be found.—American Paper.

NEW ROUTE TO INDIA

Till the year 1840 all travelers to India were obliged to double the Cape of Good Hope. Since then, the over land route has been established; so called, although the whole distance is water, with the exception of eighty miles across the desert from Cairo to Suez.

Steam power has shortened the distance wonderfully. But a shorter passage is talked of in London with considerable earnestness.

The elimination of the Cape of Good Hope was a noble beginng, and may be extended with good effect to the country of Arabia, and also the Bay of Biscay. Therefore, instead of sailing round the Bay of Biscay, and passing through the whole extent of the Red Sea, thence to Ceylon, and Madras, and Calcutta, a railroad is proposed running from Ostende, in France, to Trieste, at the head of the Gulf of Venice; thence across Asia Minor to the Orontes, eighteen miles north of Antioch; from the river Orontes to Bussorah, near old Babylon, and then following along the valley bordering on the Persian Gulf, to Hydrabad, situated on the river Indus, from which India takes its name, and from the river Indus in a direct line to Calcutta, the "city of palaces," and headquarters of this Eastern world. The whole distance from London to Calcutta by this route is five thousand six hundred miles. The one half of this distance, a railroad is either projected, or in process of construction, leaving a comparatively moderate distance to be provided for. The road is said to be entirely feasible, and, when accomplished, it will bring London and Calcutta within the distance of seven days travel. The progress of nations in their march of improvement can hardly stop short of this. Worldly motives are strong enough to bring it about, and this worldly-wise policy may be overruled by Divine providence to the rapid extension of the knowledge of salvation through the earth.—Southern Baptist.

BATTLE OF WATERLOO.

In this great battle the French had 256 guns on the field, the English 156, and the Prussians 104—making a total of 506.—The noise of these pieces exceeded every thing of the kind the old soldiers had ever heard, and made the very earth to shake for miles around the field. After the action, the gunners could hear nothing that was said to them. The guide pointed out a spot where, during the heat of the fighting, one of the powder tumbrils exploded, threw the artillerymen into the air, and shook the houses to pieces. The echoes of the cannonade of this awful battle are said to have been heard on the Southern borders of the British coast. Upwords of 50,000 men fell in the strife; 20,000 on the side of the allies, and 30,000 on the side of the French. The losses of this day put Europe in mourning. England and France wept like mothers together. A victor, who passed over the field, on the following day, states that as he approached it the first thing that struck him at a distance was the quantity of hats and caps strewed over the ground. It appeared as if it had been covered with crows. The field itself seemed flooded with blood. The number of dead horses and men baffled computation. The peasantry employed in burying the dead generally stripped the bodies first, and thereby gained vast booty. The track over which the guard moved, and over which they fled, was still covered with their spoil, and marked by the traces of horses, the wheels of cannon, and the deeper of furrows of bombs and shells. A thousand French lay dead on the spot, and the quantity of holster, standard-holders, bridles, straps, and girths, denoted a fearful conflict of cavalry. The ground seemed quite cut to pieces with the struggling of the horses' feet. The well known caps of the grenadiers of the French guard lay yet in considerable numbers, with the rags of their uniforms, and pieces of tartan and black ostrich feathers; the plaids and plumes of Scotland.

REMARKABLE FACULTIES OF THE ARABS.

A FRENCH surgeon, who has seen service in Algiers, states the follow facts respecting the remarkable perceptive powers of the Arabs. They wonderfully illustrate the degree to which the faculties of man may be improved:

"The Arabs are gifted with remarkable dexterity in steering without compass, recognizing a footstep imperceptible to the common eye, scenting the water at a distance, and finding their way by marks which would escape the most observant European. A Saharian once affirmed to Col. Panouns, 'I am not considered remarkably sharp-sighted, but I can distinguish a goat from a sheep at the distance of a day's journey; and I know some who smell the smoke of a pipe, or of broiled meat, at thirty miles. We all know each other by the track of our feet in the sand, for no one tribe walks like another, nor does a wife leave the same footprint as an unmarried woman. If a hara has passed, we know by its footprint whether it is male or female, and in the latter case, whether it is with young. If we see the stone of a date, we know the particular that produced it.

THE BATTLE OF LIFE.

Our life, from the cradle to the grave, is a series of antagonisms. Sickness, sorrow, remorse, poverty, fatigue, hunger—these are the enemies that wage a continual fight against us. Within and without, the foes of the flesh and foes of the spirit, generally acting in concert make our life one long and earnest battle. And in this strife how many fall, wounded and faint, and yield to the enemy, fierce and subtle, which is fighting against the soul. How different the circumstances and the inherent powers of those who are carrying on his conflict. Some are left from the first to contend single-handed and unaided, while others are surrounded by a friendly band who encourage, by cheering words, valuable advice and efficient aid, him who, if left to himself, would fall.—Some have an innate strength and energy of spirit which knows no defeat, while others yield ingloriously to the most insignificant foes.

There is no spectacle more interesting, more sublime, than a young man going out alone into the world to fight the battle of life. There are thousands every year leaving their homes to enter the arena of conflict and contend as they best may with the adverse influences which beset their paths. And how often do we observe that those who seemed weakest and least furnished for the contest, are most triumphant. It is in his own soul that the young man finds his most efficient armory. If he can draw weapon from the e which may parry the thrusts of his adversaries, there is no fear of his being vanquished. Sometimes a young man seems for a time to succumb to evil influences, and we deem him lost, but he finally rises again above temptations and triumphs at last. He has, perhaps, been drawn back from destruction by the influences, which were shed around his childhood by a wise and gentle mother. The influence of a mother's early prayers and and counsels see ns but slender cord, but it is fastened to the tenderest spot in our bosoms, and if, in after life we stray from the right path, that little cord will be found tugging at our heart strings.

In this battle of life the most sublime achievements, the most glorious victories are won in silence and in secret. The struggle goes on where the world cannot see, and the final reward to the conquering spirit cannot be fully realized until it has passed away from the world altogether. If we were gifted with keener perceptions, ye might every day witness upon earth triumphs which would shed around poor human nature a halo of glory, and cause us to remember and realize that man was truly created in the image of God.—Christian Banner.

Mr. Herald.

The undersigned has noticed and now records with much pleasure, that some of the sisters of the church, of which he has the honor to be Pastor, have by a laudable expedient, raised the sum of eighty two dollars, to aid in completing their house of worship. They gave a tea, and sold tickets for admission. Not the least agreeable part of the matter was, the heartiness with which our brethern and sisters of the Methodist Church patronised the enterprise. May our common God and Father prosper and bless them. He learns further that the sisters will form themselves into a permanent committee to aid in increasing the funds of the church. This is as it should be. Many movements require to be made to get back our good old baptist ground. Where is the funds for the poor and sick of the flock, and for other purposes which might be named.

He has also learned that the younger brethren excited by a "jealousy" are also meditating a movement. Be urgent "young men" while ye are strong. "If ye would excel, ye must do at once what your hand findeth to do." Recollect, female engagedness is a sure earnest of success in whatever cause they engage. Their movements cannot but be contemplated with pleasure. They promise some relief from the crushing burden under which a few have had to toil, while they illustrate the devotion of that portion of the human family of which it has been pithily said "Last at the cross and first at the sepulcher"

The French Revolution of 1848.

Introduction.

We close our review of historical facts, to present our readers, with a review of the French revolution of 1848. And we invite the attention of every young man and woman, to a serious consideration of the facts in, the case of this great revolution, in this, one of the highest polished nations of the earth. Here are many lessons to be learned by young and old of the deepest interest. The young man should learn by this sad calamity, in this country of such high refinements, that unless there is a love of country, a love of home inducted, into the mind, through a sound moral principle. The very highest happiness, and the most choicest pleasures that home can afford become inspired, and the man who should weep at the least semblance of disquietude in his country, becomes, its sad destroyer. This every citizen of Liberia should most minutely consider. young friend we speak no parable, now. Every bloody page of history bears witness to what we do most solemnly affirm, we turn neither to the right or left, for a far fetched account of the calamity of devastation, the sound is borne on every breeze and we feel a dread at every sound of wo. The cry of the widow and the fatherless, is ever ascending up to the God of mercies, for protection, when there is no earthly arm, that's strong enough to save from the impending ruin. The gulph yawns, the awful chasm extends its ever craving jaws. There is a shout a piercing cry, a bitter groan, a nation bleeds, a nation falls. We go no not abroad to make ourselves acquainted with these things, the sound comes, like the ghost of Orla, over hill and valley, and we irrisitibly catch the sad & hollow notes of a nation weeping, under the iron hand of desolation. And when this sad sound alarms the ear, should not every man love his home above all things, should not the love of country form one of the principle features of the character of every man. It is no matter how inferior, our home may be, it ought to be to us most dear; for let every man, woman, and child constantly bear in mind, that an humble home is no disgrace.

The man who would make his home a pleasant place to himself and to the stranger, must, love that home, he must unite and bind his energies there. and if he is thus found in his private dwelling, we may be sure that he has a high regard for his country. The love of country has laid the foundation of the greatest inspires, and kingdoms that have existed. Nineveh, Babylon, Egypt, Jerusalem, Rome, and all the happy homes of Europe and in the world at large, have been made so by those who loved their country, and if any land is ever made a happy home, it must be through those who love their country, for it must be very obvious to all, that what is properly proceeded in, is through the energy of those who have had strong attachments to the objects in which they were engaged, this must ever hold good in matters of state, as well as those of a secular nature, whoever then would see his country happy must have a love for it, above all else of an earthly nature. for in so doing he makes, his own fire side rejoice through his labour of love. It is plain to be seen then that love universal or national, flows into the most private channals, and the king and the humblest peasant may vie with each other here, labouring for the good of the country because it is the home of their love; hence a long and increasing prosperity.

And he who has not an inexpressible zeal for his own country is not worthy of it, is not worthy of being called a friend or a good citizen It is thought, however, that a thief cannot be considered a good citizen. I grant it. But he could be a lover of his country, though it may by some, be hard to distinguish between, the character of the man who wilfully pilages his neighbour's pocket, and he who joins a lawless mob to break and destroy the work of years. leaving out of the question the disorganization of the tranquility of society.'

The casuists have, stretched every nerve, and exhausted their powers of reason to properly deliniate what, are the various properties of crime, and to find its remedy by the most impartial rule of justice, and the wisdom of Ethical Philosophy, has indeed been a blessing to the world. But when we come to speak of the lover of country the good citizen and contrast their characters, with the theif, the lawless Banditti, and the no less desperate lawless mobites, the first we applaud, but the two last, run so near the same polluted stream, that the most critical casuist, must find it difficult to properly draw the line of demarkation. But that such should not be a continual pest to moral society, in general, wholsome laws, or descepline of reproof have been adopted and enforced. Such as, the chain gang, the penetentiary, transportation, and as a last resort the gallows the gullitine block and the like, and by such means the desperados have been removed with their contaminating influence from society. But do we cast these off forever, is there no love for his country in him who has fallen under the censure of the criminal code? is there no love for his country in him who has for cause unknown to the world joined a lawless mob! we must affirm that there may be many sparks of emulation in the bosom of each of these parties fallen, though they be: but our question is, which is the worst man of the two to his country, which has the least love of home or country. Now all may not agree with us in our decision, but we must conclude that the petty thief, and the lawless bandit are both alike, and if there is a difference in the magnitude of crime it is in this. there was a want of opportunity on the one part, for them both to stand on equel ground, and they are thus summed up both, as far more injurious to a country than the man who, joins a lawless mob, for that man may scorn the act of stealing from his fellow, but through some exciting cause he may be led away with a mob and though in such a state of frencied passion he may commit deeds which, his life time cannot atone for, yet he is far more excusable, than the man who wilfully robs his neighbour of his goods, for he has no exciting cause to plead an excuse, while the other can call forth even injured parties to speak in his behalf, but a thief has no one to speak for him, no honest man can so outrage the just indignation of a country as to hold forth sympathy for such a man, because he is a hater of good society, consequently he is a hater of his country, he may plead that he is not a murderer but who can credit what he says, a man who wilfully robs his neighbour is a murderer in the second degree, and only wants the chance, to be so in the first, does any ask proof. How often is it the case that the most daring robbers and murderers who are conspicuous in the history of crime, on the terrific register, commenced their downward career, in some petty theft. Joseph Hare, the notorious robber confessed under the gallows that his first act of theft, was the taking of a lump of sugar from his mother's sugar dish, so from little sins in theft, arise the most awful deeds, it will not then in the face of this be argured in palliation of the guilt or character of the theif, that although a rogue, he has, notwithstanding a love for his country, or in plainer terms, a love of country in his narrow soul. I think the man who would plead his case, knowing him to be a theif, would take sides with him in every dark design.

We have now dwelt on the character of the thief, in which, we make him the worst of men, but while we in candor to this one, we do not over look the crimes of others which truly are less in magnitude, but pernicious in their whole tendency. And in reviewing those characters, it will be but doing them justice, to consider them singly.

1st. Strong are the ties that bind all animals to their country, but man above all has the strongest attachments as far as human reason can judge,—the love of country develops itself in the character of man above all animals on the earth, on the account of his powers of reasoning and judging of things, and of his capability of making himself agreeable to his own species, and of rendering his home or his country happy by his wisdom and industry, other animals have high feelings and regards for the localities in which they were generated, but man has those feelings in a far higher sense, hence so much the more is required of him, and when we speak of a man's love to his country, or the love of country natural to man, there are very many things of deep interest connected immediately with the idea, by which we judge of the amount of love he bears, for instance, if we see a person indolent and careless, about the affairs of his own premises, which of course in themselves are of a private nature, the idea of a bad citizen is immediately associated with the formation of our opinion, relative to the character of such a person. for carelessness about secular affairs, evinces most clearly that the love of country is most, remote, for a man who loves his country will use every means to make that country worthy of the dignity of the highest cultivated genious, and from the native African, I mean the aboriginees, we may learn this very important lesson; viz: how far this carelessness and indifference, about country will lead a man or a nation downwards, in the scale of degradation. We see them remaining in one position for more than a thousand years, in a country of their own, shut out from the world by the peculiarties of that country, a home that had they have loved with a reasonable feeling, would have been a most enviable home. They have been by Providence, cast in a land that yields spontaneously the most they desire for food, & they set down in indolence and ignorance on their land, the golden citron ever shoots out and invites the eye from beneath the green leaves The bird of Paradise sweetly sings out his morning hour, and the Nightinggale ceases not its lavished song, with many other things to invite the love of country, but alas! there is a carelessness of all these beneficences of Providence and nature, and we find what might have been an Eden, a gloomy wilderness, a sad desolation

It is plainly seen then that unless there is a reasonable love, an ambitious love, a sensible love, a holy love of country, there can be no prosperity, but brias and thorns which choak the very dwelling, will continue to grow spontaneously in every pleasant place.

But we do not wish to pass unnoticed that other character, who although, he may not be classed among bandits and petty thieves, he is not entirely exempt from censure; viz. The man who joins a party of desperados and destroys property which he nor any of the party can ever repalce, cannot by any means be called in the strict sense of the term, a lover of country, for of all the sheders of human blood, the man who creates sedition at home is the worst, it has been so from the beginning, and condemned by all good citizens of every country. This may not apnear to some persons to be any thing of much magnitude, but when it is properly seen into it is found to be more ruinous to a country than an invading army; because the root of contention, and fire brand is in the very heart of the country, and on this history from the time of Homer and Huoditus, has fully revealed the truth: But we need not go into remote anticquity for cases of this kind, if we but turn to a neighbouring country whose wounds are still bleeding from the scourge of the late revolution, ask France when will she atone for the deeds of cruelty, the loss of life and property which were the consequences of the late revolution, and there would be a mournful glance of the eye, at the sad effect of what happened, when the Rappel who beat in Paris, to awake the slumbering citizen from quiet repose. And that the people of Liberia may form some idea of what, a civil war or revolution is, we present them with a concise, but true account of the revolution in France in 1848, and we hope the perusal of these facts in the history of a country, subject as it is, to so very many changes, will inspire every bosom with a love of country too great to ever suffer the iron rule of revolution as a modification of established rule, and law. In many countries no doubt a change is needed, but better far to wait the wearing of one system, which must die at its own proper time, than to pave the way for a new reign through human blood, and build monuments up of human skulls to show valor when it only in fearful tones speak out our folly and disgrace, for this is all the honor gained. The ruled to day must seek to rule to-morrow, and the iron grasp of tyrany is drawn still tighter, and the oppress'd's voice ceases not to be heard in the new reign. This matter shou'd be deeply considered by every man in every clime. The good king of Israel has given us all a golden rule which should be duly considered. He asks an important question, and then he answers it himself. Where with all shall a young man cleanse his way By talking heed thereto, according to thy word, the word of God.

Having introduced our subject, with a few ethical remarks, we proceed to give our readers, a short account of the revolution of France in 1847, 8, from the history of those sad times by an eye witness, of that terrible scene of carnage.

The Rev. W. O. Arthurs commenced his narrative by saying;—

Sir my duty to night is to submit a few remarks on the French Revolution of 1848.

In the year 1793, just after the revolutionists of the day had perpetrated the executions know as the massacres of September, a young man of the blood Royal who had destinguished himself in the revolutionary army, presented himself to Danton, and remonstrated on the excesses that had been committed;—young man said the revolutionist, you are too young to judge of these things to comprehend them you must be in our place, go back to the army, fight bravely but do not needlessly expose your life, you have yet many years before you. France does not love a Republic. She has the, babits the weakness the needs of a monarchy, after our storms she will return to it, and you shall be king. Adue young man, remember the prediction of Danton These predictions or words nigh have been prophetic After a career of unbridled madness. France was yoked to the triumphant car of a naughty soldier, and for a time was so elated to see the number of captives dragged at the wheels of that car, as to forget that to urge its progress, she had to bear a crushing yoke, and to make almost deadly efforts But the smiter was smitten, and the crown of France shone once more on a Bourbon brow, in a short time however the restored dynasty had exhausted all the little respect reserved for them by the French people, and in fifteen years had exhausted even their forbearance. The throne of France was again vacant, and the French people, called to occupy that throne the very man to whom Danton had so long before prophesied, that he should arrive at that high post of honor The propheay was fulfilled, destiny so far had run its course, & Louis Phillippe ascended the throne of France: This prince of the blood brought with him to his high elevation, great mental powers a knowledge of the people and government of every free people, & country, an experience in the private & political vicisitudes never perhaps equalled in any prince before, & with all to heighten his dignity, exemplary personal habits. Never we may suppose did natural aptitude to govern, and an education, fit for governing meet, so beautifully and completely in one individual, as in Louis Phillippe, late king of France. When he was firmly establish on the throne the friends of France might well have hoped that the time had come when Providence in mercy to her many distractions was about to accord her a wise government and a happy progress of long continuence.

But now his hand was stretched still, France has yet to bleed and the throne to be shaken, totter and fall, as if the spirit of Napoleon still brooded over the land envious of his glory, whose sun went down, when he landed on a barren rock in the land of Ham, alas what is earthly greatness the crowned heads only finds a resting place in the one silent retreat, and there with the beggar they are at ease, Napolen fell L. Phillippe fell, and now Napoleon Again. S

NATURAL RESULT — A [illegible] down to write a deed, and began with; Know all women by these presents.'—'You are wrong,' said a bystander 'it ought to be 'know all men.'' 'Very well,' answered the other, 'if all women know it, all men will of course.'

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, FEBRUARY 2nd, 1853.

From late advices from the leeward, we are rejoiced to learn that there is no disturbance with the natives, and that upon the whole, every thing wears a favorable appearance. In Grand Bassa peace & tranquility predominate—a few months past the citizens were under serious apprehensions that Boyer and Grando would make another attack upon one or more towns in that county. All cause of fear is now wholly removed. Grando has to a certainty left the country, and is now sojourning at Rock Cess, under the surveilance, we think, of the Niffou people. Of one thing we are sure, that his own tribe treats him as a prisoner of their own. When they took him from Trade Town it was then proposed by the chiefs to drown him, but when it was put to the vote, a majority favored the postponement of the execution. It is proper to state that the intended execution of Grando by his countrymen has connection as well with his rebellion against our Government, as for violations of the laws of his own country. The people of Liberia need not in future, fear that they will be harrassed by Grando and his party, his time has nealy run out, and it is far from being probable that he will be permitted to live a few months longer. It may indeed happen, that he will be delivered up to our Government, such a promise has been given lately, but if he is not, there is no doubt but that his tribe will kill him.

Boyer of Trade Town is seriously inconvenienced by his hostility to our Government, and he is now, it is said, sincerely desirous to propitiate the Government. Messengers are frequently going from him to the authorities at Grand Bassa with overtures of a pacific character, but we believe them not to be such as the Government will or should approve. Boyer has acted too outrageously, for him now to expect to be pardoned on making limited concessions, a full and free acknowledgement of his wrongs—and an assurance that he will, in future demean himself as a peaceful citizen, should be given to the Government, before it even condescends to notice any of his propositions. His position is far from being an enviable one—he has enemies on either side, either one of which, in his present weak state, is capable of mensuring arms with him. Boyer is not liked—he was always overbearing, and supposed himself more powerful than all the princes in the Bassa Country. His present distressed condition pleases them much, and they do not hesitate to profit by his downfall. Powerful he was, and all the chief in a two days travel dreaded him. Such is not the case now, they fear him no longer, & he can do no more than chafe and roar like a caged lion. There need be no hurry with Boyer—let him continue to suffer on until he feels sufficiently his weakness and is completely humbled and be obliged to understand his proper position. To deal in half-way measures with such a man as Boyer, is to invite him to a repetition of the bloody deeds, of 1851 & 2.—

Little Cape Mount.—We have had a long conversation with a gentleman, just returned from this district of country, and the representations he makes of the present distressed condition of that country, are of the most deplorable character. Boombo has been, and continues to be successful in his bloody deeds, & the country will, unless a strong arm interposes, soon become depopulated—that is of the tribes over which Dwar-loo-Beh and Tom-Gum exercise jurisdiction. Boombo butchers men, women and children indiscriminately—neither gray hairs, nor infants at the breast, receive the least sympathy from this bloody minded butcher—there is no rest for the unfornate people.—Our informant further says, that Mannah, in whom the Government placed some confidence, is an ally of Boombo, and that it is mainly through his power, that Boombo has been so very successful. And we regret to say, that through the backwardness of our government, in granting permission to the Golah Chiefs, to act as well on the offensive as defensive is partly to be attributed the present distressed condition of the country. While Dwar-loo-Beh and Tom-Gum have all along, in obedience to the Government, acted only in defence of their towns and people, and not in no one instance made an aggressive movement, when they might have done so, in several instances with effect—Boombo regardless of his obligations to Government, has continued to push foward his aggressive marches, and now he has several towns of our friends sorrounded, & in a few days unless his head way is suddenly arrested will capture their them, and murder the inhabitants. Must these things be? Is there no help for these people? Humanity, apart from treaty stipulations, should influence the Government to adopt some speedy measure to relieve our friends from the sad fate which now surrounds them. Messengers with friendly overtures, & threats not backed with men & munitions of war, will not deter Boombo from his sanguinary career. AT ONCE, WITHOUT DELAY, let Government take steps to arrest the bloody career of Boombo.

After what we have said, all must know that there is an end to safe travel in the Little Cape Mount Country, and that there is no trade.

We are informed that the Vey Chiefs are collecting at Grand Cape Mount, the ostensible object of their assembling is, to devise means, for the settlement of the difficulties between Dwar-looh Beh, and Boombo, and George Cain. We hope this may be true, and that it may shortly be known that peace is restored. Such news will be very gratifying to every friend of peace, and will we doubt not, obviate the necessity of Government disbursing a large sum of money in forcing the belligerents to maintain the conditions of their treaty stipulations. Will it not be politic if the authorities take some steps to ascertain the character of this meeting! If Prince Manash of the Gallinas is a member of the Congress, we anticipate nothing good from it.

Leeward counties. We have full advices from our leeward counties, and it is gratifying to know that peace prevails and that the cultivation of the soil is claiming a considerable portion of the time and funds of the people. In Grand Bassa, the Saw Mill is in full operation, and is capable of supplying orders for any amount of lumber. The stock-holders assure the citizens of this county that they will supply them with any description of lumber at reasonable prices. Lumber is greatly in demand here, and if our friends in Grand Bassa will fall on some plan to get lumber here, they will find a ready market for almost any quantity. The Cove is now firmly settled and the people residing there are under no aprehensions of an attack from Fishmen or others—it is well fortified and capable of being defended from the assaults of any number of savages. Agriculture is becoming to be the principal ambition of at least, a majority of the people in that county, and the merchants and traders are doing a good business. Owing to the commencement of the farming season, trade is not as brisk now in any part of Liberia as it was a few weeks since. In Sinoe, there is a Saw Mill in successful operation, and the people are industrious and contented—In the settlements in the farming districts an idle man, we are informed, is not to be seen. A gentlemen of this city, has just returned from a visit to that county, he visited every part of it and we are assured by him that tho' he had heard, that considerable improvements had been made within the last four years, he was agreeably surprised to find that the improvements are on a more enlarged scale than he had any reason to expect. He is decidedly of opinion from all he saw, that more attention is paid there to the clearing of farm lands, than in any other part of Liberia—and that there appeared more system in their agricultural arrangement.

Some four or five weeks ago, a rumor reached us to the effect, that measures were being taken by the U. S. Government, for an exploration of the rivers of this Republic, and of the country east of Liberia. We are now gratified by more certain intelligence upon the subject; and are happy in being able to lay before our readers the following extract from the Report of the Secretary of the Navy- December 4th 1852—which embraces the objects contemplated by the Government. The Secretary remarks:—

"My attention has been invited by the Colonization Society of Pennsylvania to the necessity of prosecuting some researches into the character of the continent of Africa, and especially that portion of it lying eastward of the settlements of Liberia. It is supposed that an exploration of this region would lead to the discovery of a broad tract of fertile and healthy country, well adapted to the extension of that system of Colonization, which or some years past has greatly interested the public attention, and more recently attracted the favorable consideration of Congress.

I have accordingly directed a preliminary investigation to be made by an officer of the navy, whom I have attached to the African Squadron, with orders to devote the months of the coming winter to an examination of the necessary conditions which this undertaking may require.

In Commander Lynch, to whom the country is already indebted for important services in Motherfield, I have found a prompt and ardent volunteer for this employment. He is now on his way to the African coast. He will land at Liberia, Cape Palmas, and other points, and will pursue his inquiries as far as the river Gaboon, with a view to the ascertainment of such localities on the margin of the African continent as may present the greatest facilities, whether by the river courses or by inland routes, for penetrating, with the least hazard, into the interior. He will collect, information touching the geographical character of the country, its means of affording the necessary supplies of men and provisions, the temper of the inhabitants, whether hostile or friendly, the proper precautions to be observed to secure the health of a party employed, and other items of knowledge upon which it may be proper hereafter, to prepare and combine the forces essential to the success of a complete and useful exploration of the interior.

It will require a liberal appropriation of money, and an enlarged discretion to be confided to the Navy Department, for the organization and arrangement of a plan of operations, which must embrace the employment of a number of men, the supply of boats, armaments and tools, and the enlistment of such scientific aid, as a long and laborious inland exploration, but with many dangers and difficulties, will suggest.

With a view to the preparatory operations of Commander Lynch, and also, in consideration of the need which the African Squadron has, at all times, for such an auxilary, I have directed the small Steamer Vixen to be prepared without delay, and sent to that coast, to constitute a part of the force under the command of Commodore Tayo, who is about to take charge of the squadron.

He will be instructed to furnish Captain Lynch with every facility which his position will allow. A small sum of money has also been placed at the disposal of Commander Lynch, for the contingences of his present service."

We are happy to announce the arrival of Captain Lynch, at this place, on board the U. S. Ship "John Adams" on the 31st ultimo—which vessel he joined at Bathurst, Gambia,—having visited Teneriff and Goree; and subsequently Sierra Leone, collecting such information as may be of service to him in carrying out the objects of his mission.

Captain Lynch is a gentleman of distinguished literary and scientific acquirements and of universal renown, as the conductor of the expedition from Lake Tiberias down the Jordan river to the Dead Sea and the circumnavigator of that sea; and perhaps, of all others, he is the man to undertake, and carry out successfully the immensely important work of exploring this country. We most heartily wish Captain Lynch every success.

This subject is one of great importance to the interests of Liberia—in respect either to health, commerce, or agriculture—and we doubt not our fellow citizens will gladly extend to Captain Lynch every facility in their power; especially by communicating such information in regard to the character of the interior tribes, and of the country east of Liberia, as they may possess. It will be observed that Captain Lynch's present object is only "a preliminary investigation, with a view to the ascertainment of such localities on the margin of the African continent as may present the greatest facilities, whether by river courses or by inland routes for penetrating, with the least hazard into the interior." When such information shall have been obtained Captain Lynch will return to the United States for the purpose of organizing an expedition adequate to the service upon which he is employed.

As many of our citizens—from their knowledge of the Liberian coast, and of the interior for some hundred miles or more—are competent to give important information; we would invite such to favor us—for publication—with any remarks or suggestions which may be of service to Captain Lynch in determining his future operations.

WE HAVE A BRIGHT LAND OF OUR OWN.

BY JAMES LEO SIMS.

We have a bright land of our own,
In the midst of the heavens, far off and alone;
Where the gale on its pinions of aroma flies:
And sweeping the forest it mournfully sighs,
Here flowers are blossoming all the year long,
And the hills of the warblers are ever in song
Our country an oasis no longer a wild:
And happy are we in our bright land.

We have a bright land of our own,
With all the blessings of a tropical zone;
The Pawpaw, and Orange, are ever in bloom:
And the flowers of the valley shed a sweet perfume.
Then tell me no more of America's gay bowers,
Nor tell me no more of her dew breathing flowers;
For Afric wears nature's sweetest smiles:
And may God ever bless our brigh land.

LEAVING HOME.

I can conceive of no picture more interesting than one which might be drawn from a young man leaving the home of his child-hood, the scene of all his early associations, to try his fortune in a distant country, setting out alone 'in the forest.' A father on the decline, the down hill of life, gives his parting blessing invoking the best gifts of heaven to rest on his beloved off-spring, and to crown all his efforts with complete success; tears gush from his eyes, and words, are forbid utterance. A kind, a most affectionate mother, calling upon him as he is departing from the parental abode, and with all the dangers to which he is about to be exposed rushing into, and pressing upon her mind, she says; 'Go, my son—remember there is a right way and a wrong way.' Her advice is brief.—Language is inadequate to the expression of the feelings that there crowd on the mind of a virtuous child. Every reader has a case of this kind, and may have been the subject of one in some respects similar. Here may be found eloquence more touching to him to whom it is delivered than even the orations of Cicero or Demosthenes.

WOMAN'S LOVE.

How few women have ever been in love. How few even marry from election.—They marry because they are asked, and because the marriage is suitable. It is their vocation to be married—parents approve, and they have no other attachment. Any observant person living in society, where there is a continual marrying and given in marriage, must be struck with this fact. Cupid's quiver must be exhausted, or his arrows blunt, as he pierces few hearts now. I incline to think that a girl really in love, one who bore the evident symptoms of the malady, would be thought very improper; yet I have often fancied that there must be a man born in the world for every woman; one whom to see would be to love, to reverence, to adore; one with whom her sympathies would so entirely blend that she would recognize him at once her true lord. Now and then, these pairs come together, and woe to her who meets this other self too late! We should be more humble and merciful if they did not through ignorance and thoughtlessness measure the temptation of others by the ir own insignificance.—Adventures of a Beauty, by Mrs. Crowe.

PEOTRY

Whatever task thou hast to do,
  It should be done today;
Ere time's swift sands have run
  Should in its course
Bear all thy hopes away;
Delay, indeed are dangerous things—
  Improve the present hour;
To carry out thy fondest schemes
  May not be in thy power.

The losses which delay has caused
  Upon the human heart,
Tongues cannot tell—their bitterness
  No language can impart;
Then when thou hast a task to do
  Thy duty's call obey;
Postpone not that for future time
  Which can be done today.

Delay has lost the richest gifts
  Of knowledge, wealth and power;
The treasure of a lifetime has
  Been lost within an hour;
Delay has to its votaries
  Brought care and costly sorrow;
And they who look to future time
  May never see tomorrow.

Like "Felix" they intend to hear
  The truth in home truths of reason;
But still defer that chosen time,
  "A more convenient season";
But in this doubtful world of ours,
  Man's race is quickly run;
And ere that season comes—alas!
  Life's labor may be done.—The Olive Branch

From the African Repository.

WESTERN AFRICA.

The Westminster Review contains an article of great interest and, considering the subject of great importance, having reference to the Western or slave coast of Africa. It affords the clearest and fullest insight into the interior life and habits of this great nursery of slavery, in which Christian civilization remorselessly trafficked for so many successive ages that has yet met the public gaze.

The existing condition of things; the state of the people, mental and social, their actual being as a people, are the first inquiries which naturally suggest themselves when we get a glimpse at the original sources of this enslaved race with whom we are so fatally associated. And in this instance we see what we were not prepared for by any previous account. Settled habitation, ownership and cultivation of the soil, manufacture of iron, gold, and cotton goods, fortified towns, grades in society, responsible government, and even the institution of domestic slavery, that truest type of an advanced, civilization, present themselves to our astonished view. The fortifications are rude, mud walls and stockades, and the huts nearly as bad as some of those of the poorer Irish, but more cleanly. Of the fortifications it may be observed, that they are adapted to their use, and perhaps more tenable, considering the means of attack than the fortifications of Paris when assailed by all the modern appliances of civilized warfares; and as to the huts, their superiority over the Irish depends in a great measure, we opine, on the fact that the climate is intolerable, and has saved them from English dominion. A more intimate connection with that Government would adjust the equation of the social destiny of Irishman and African.

This description applies to the African nations or tribes on the coast, some of which are far in advance of others, and all of which are in advance of the tribes in the interior, who are inaccessible in general to Europeans. The former are divided into several distinct nations. Most of them are Mohammedans, forbidden by their religion from holding or selling Mohammedan slaves, and therefore, as a general rule, the powerful tribes of that religion, and even the weak ones, cannot be enslaved. The principal tribes at the Gambia are the Joliffes, the Mandingoes, the Foolahs or Fellahs. The Mandingoes are the landed class—the proprietary, as they would be called in England. They rent out their lands to the Foolahs to feed their flocks, and to other neighboring tribes for agricultural purposes. For themselves, they are addicted to aristocratic pursuits—war, excess and idleness. The Joliffes, the remaining tribe, are said to be intelligent and well looking, and are generally mechanics.

The Foolahs are not all engaged in herding; one section of them are given to war, and perhaps a little plunder. But the agricultural section forms a very interesting nation. Their traditional habits, sports, festivals, &c., are no doubt national and characteristic, but approach European nations so closely in refinement, and a view to taste in dress, as to become interesting to the traveler.

In religious opinion, the whole of the Mohammedan population is divided into two great sects—the Marabouts, who adhere strictly to the laws of the Prophet, and the Sonnachees, who eat swine's flesh & get us drunk as Christians. We are not told whether they have any martyrs, or, in fact, whether a Soonachee is proscribed. The intelligent reviewer does not enlighten us on this branch of African politics.

The responsibility and constitutionality of Government is exemplified in an account of an interesting discussion which took place in reference to an innovation proposed by the English resident agent, vaccinating children for the purpose of arresting the fatality of the small pox, whose ravages had been very general. More than one king called together his council to submit the proposal to the concrete wisdom. They generally assembled under a great tree, perhaps of a thousand years growth. The chiefs and sages here debated the question and singularly enough, in every instance the popular opposition to the innovation was based on the privilege of the council to control the legal power.—The argument somewhat resembled our canal opposition reasoning. They were partially indifferent to the issue—whether vaccination was good or bad, safe or dangerous—but whether it did not infringe on the constitutional right of the council. We find, however, that the jogie did not prevail; nor are we informed whether the Sonnachees—the patriotic rum drinkers—resigned in a dungeon or not, in one instance this extreme sacrifice was rendered unnecessary; for after grave deliberations, decided in favor of the salutary reform, the lady mammas scampered off to the woods with their sable angels to save them from the profanation. Perhaps, indeed, the opposition was pushed to extremes with the view of showing the English—who did everything, and said everything, concluding their prayers in the name of her gracious Majesty—how much more circumscribed were their rulers and how more securely their liberties were guarded. However that may be, the reform is progressing, and by degrees the mammas and the patriots are yielding to its salutary influence.

The laws of the Africans in respect to debtors are stringent and severe, and here is the fountain and spring of the whole institution of slavery. If the debtor fail to satisfy his obligation he becomes the creditor's bondman, and once a slave, he and his offspring are slaves forever. Not alone this but in many instances, if the debtor himself escape, any of his family or relations, or even tribe, can be held to service" with his progeny forever. These are cruel laws, but they are scarcely more cruel than hanging a man or woman for petty larceny, stealing 2s. 6d. and such was the law in England within our memory. Further, the African law has had a far more salutary effect, for there prevails among the mercantile community at Gambia one of the most perfect senses of security, and no where in the world is property more secured than among the African population.

We have mentioned one source of slavery. Another and more fruitful source is war. Every captive taken in war becomes thereby a slave forever. The victor can hold him or sell him at his pleasure. And generally, the plea that he is a Mohammedan, will not avail him. In the din and tumult of war, there is else where the voice of justice, mercy and truth is unheard.

The commerce of these settlements is rapidly increasing, and promises a rich return to those who engage in it. The demand of the natives for various articles of wear, with them articles of virtu, is scarcely to be satisfied, and there is no doubt but the productions of the country which are absolutely without limit can be had in exchange on terms most profitable. On this head we let the article before us speak for itself.

"The palm oil alone imported into England is now of the value of more than $800 000. In 1835, forty-seven bushels of ground nuts were exported from the Gambia; at present between 8.000.000 and 9.000,000 bushels are annually exported. The palm ceases to flourish two miles from the sea, but the Chea Butter tree is abundant throughout the whole of the interior. The Chea Oil is worth from £3 to £4 a ton more than the Palm Oil, but as soon as water communication opens, it can be sold as cheaply as the Palm Oil.

The product of Indigo and Cotton can be increased ad libitum, and, by proper attention and enterprise, the facilities of transit can be so arranged and provided as to make the cost price less than one-half. A great and rich field is there, and needs only care and cultivation. That it will receive them, the enterprise of Englishmen is sufficient guarantee."—N. Y Tribune.

Mr. Editor: The following advertisement extraordinary, revised and enlarged, from him who sits upon the "Pale Horse," [Rev. 6 chs. 8 v.] I am induced to circulate from the best motives, no doubt. I confess, with a view to facilitate the designs of this "Co." but the very reverse, and this I judge will be the more readily accomplished, by giving publicity and a "general circulation," as Boz would say, to their advertisement. This is not only the species made by some of our law-makers when they are advocating unconstitutional measures. They are found to contain all that is necessary for a successful refutation of them. You will therefore please give us a place in a corner of your paper when convenient, and forward account.

DEATH & CO.

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in Spirits.—Take this opportunity of informing their friends and the discerning public, that they continue the trade of making Drunkards, Bankrupts and Maniacs on the most reasonable terms—at the shortest notice.

The advertisers return their sincere thanks to their numerous, steady, and attached customers, and to all the tippling part of the community, for the increasing countenance and extensive patronage which they now receive; and they hope that the many spots which are to be found in every town, village, and district of America, of the success of DEATH & CO., in the above line of business, will secure to them the same increased support of all Drunkards, Apostate "Pledge" men, and occasional customers, as well as forever to silence the advocates of True Temperance, those bitter enemies of their long established and popular trade.

Death & Co., beg leave to assure the public that the above article in which they deal, is the best and most pleasant poison in the world, and has never been known to fail in any instance where the individual has persevered in the use of it for the limited time Death & Co.' procure.

In order to do business in a respectable style the advertisers have obtained a License from the State, under whose benevolent auspices they are legally authorised to furnish the means to bring the Wives and Families of their customers to misery, and to wound, maim and beggar, and drive to Delirium and Death, as many as the public good requires.

In particular, Death & Co. will spare no pains to secure the final overthrow of as many as will favour them with their countenance and support. To accomplish these desirable ends, it is only necessary for the individual to take half a glass occasionally, till he feels that quantity insufficient to gratify the craving appetite which it will soon create; and when the Whiskey appetite is formed the "manifest destiny" of the individual is obvious; and the results at which Death & Co's., aim is secured; as the person is then prepared to brave temporal and eternal misery for another glass.

For the accommodation of these numerous customers, and for the more safety of their increasing business, Death & Co. have appointed a sufficient number of subordinate agents, who are constantly dispensing their blessings along the High ways and Cross roads, and in the villages throughout the country. Death & Co's agents have various signs and may be found [illegible] business at all hours by night (Sundays not excepted) [illegible] gave privately to all members of Temperance societies. [illegible] Grocers will retail their water, (which does not change the colour of the water,) to Private Families. Taverns and beer shops [illegible] publicly to the Rabble. Lunatic Asylums, Hospitals and Jails, the Gallows and the Drunkard's fire side.

N. B.—Death & Co [illegible] all customers [illegible] giving heed to whatever Persons Meetings, or all advocates of Temperance, may say against hard drinking, as these Gentlemen are enemies to this Soul and body destroying business;—And particularly would Death & Co., caution all their customers from attending to what such old fashioned, strait laced folks say, as Solomon, Isaiah, Joel, Habakkuk and Paul, in the following passages in their books.

"Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging, and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise." Prov. 20 chs. 1 v.

"For the Drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty, and drowsiness shall clothe a man with rags."

"Who hath woe! who hath sorrow! who hath contentions! who hath babbling! who hath wounds without cause! who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine, they that go to seek mixed wine. Look not upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth its colour in the cup, when it moveth itself aright.

At last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder." Prov. 23 chs. 21. 29. 30. 31. 32. and 33 vs.

"Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning, that they may follow strong drink, that continue until night, till wine influence them."

"Woe unto them that are mighty to drink wine, and men of strength to mingle strong drink." Isa. 11 and 22 vs.

"Awake, ye drunkards, and weep, and howl all ye drinkers of wine, because of the new wine, for it is cut off from your mouth." Joel 1 chs. 5 v.

"Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink, that puttest the bottle to him, and makest him drunken also, that thou mayest look on their nakedness." Hab. 2 chs. 15 v.

"Nor thieves, nor covetous, nor Drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the Kingdom of God." 1. Cor. 6 chs. 10 v.

Death & Co. would further remark to the readers, Gentlemen, Prophets and Christians, to their strictures upon drunkenness &c. and their denunciations against this trade so dreaded behind the age," and therefore should not be regarded.—American Baptist

THE SABBATH.

The Sabbath is the vital organ in the Christian existence, and, therefore, is in true national life. It is as essential to the health of the state, the well being of the body political and social, as the lungs are essential to the life and health of the physical frame. The Sabbath is for the regulation of the social state, what the lungs are for respiration; we breathe through the Sabbath; thought and feeling, purpose and resolve pure, high, and holy, comes and goes. As in passing through the lungs, the blood takes coloring and life from the most ethereal element of the air, so in passing through the Sabbath, our individual, social, and national existence is purified, energized, and vivified from heaven. Our mental and moral life receives its sacredness, its worth, its vigorous health, its permanence there, its power to endure labor, its security against corruption, its ability to resist disease.

Hence we affirm, every injury to the Sabbath is an injury to life. You may make your attack upon many points in this mortal frame, and yet, the object of your injuries may recover; you may do him no mortal, but only a transitory harm. But when you approach the lungs, you come to the citadel of life, and injury there, is the near approach of death. So it is with the effect of the profanation of the Sabbath on our moral, social and civil, welfare; when that profanation is permitted and becomes prevalent, there is no more hope. There is mortal disease and weakness through the whole frame, and the very social system hastens to its dissolution, or to a chaos of permitted licentiousness and sin, which is worse than even its absolute destruction. A social state without the Christian Sabbath may go far to realize the conception of a hell on earth.

The secret of our unexampled thrift in our unparalleled, unexampled progress, power and happiness as a nation, is just here, in this gift from God to us of the Christian Sabbath, observed and sustained for so long a time in a sacredness, fullfulness, purity and power, so like the brightest glory of its pristine life.

Near two hundred years did it take God to keep us under this discipline, almost every thing in our economical, political, as well as social and moral existence takes its coloring and character from the strict observance of the Sabbath. Thus till we lived and breathed, and have our being, and hence (according to the analogy of the Lungs,) results still our vigor as a nation, our freshness and lastingness of growth and life, which, compared with the nations of Europe, is like the health of the mountaineer, who has cheerily labored in the pure open air, beneath the [illegible] in the varied and salutary activity of a free people's occupation, in comparison with the sickly, pallid shrivelled faces, and meager, attenuated forms of men shut up in dark garrets or confined in stooping over trestles and hot pestiferous gases, at the manufactories looms.

To the life and health giving power of the Christian Sabbath over us and in us we owe our whole superiority: for the influence acted from the outset, and acted in every direction. It set our whole existence as a plant is set in its growth, and poised into maturity. It was as omnipresent as the atmosphere, and as direct as a stream of electricity; there was nothing hid from the heat thereof. It was the only example of Sabbath-born and Sabbath-educated nations in the whole history of the world. Our Pilgrim Fathers came to this continent that they might be free to keep the Christian Sabbath in its purity, and to educate their children and their children's children beneath its power. It is this same benefit and blessing which God has imparted to us in trust for another generation.—Southern Baptist

People never improve after marriage. The girl that's insolent to her parents, will be very apt to give 'sass' to her husband.

"John," said a girl to her sweetheart, "you have been paying your distresses to me long enough—it is time you were making known your contentions, so as not to keep me in expense any longer."

ADVICE TO YOUNG MEN.

Socrates did not urge his friends to enter early upon public employments; but first to take pains for the attainment of the knowledge necessary for their success in them.

Are you stepping on the threshold of life? Secure a good moral character —Without virtue you cannot be respected; without integrity you can never rise to distinction and honor.

Be careful lest a too warm desire of distinction should deceive you into pursuits that may cover you with shame, by setting your incapacity and slender abilities in full light.

People who have the rashness to intrude into stations without proper authority and the requisite preparation for the service of the public, not only involve others in loss, but subject themselves to ridicule.

The tricky deceitful, and dishonest, are rarely prosperous; for when confidence is withdraw, poverty is likely to follow.

The shortest and surest way to live with honor in the world, is to be in reality what we would appear to be.

When once a concealment or deceit has been practiced in matters where all should be fair and open as the day, confidence can never be restored any more than you can restore the white bloom to the grape or plum that you have once pressed in your hand.

Error is the cause of man's misery, the corrupt principle that has produced evil in the world; 'tis this which begets and cherishes in our souls all the evils that afflict us, and we can never expect a true and solid happiness but by a serious endeavor to avoid it.

Falsehood is not only one of the most humiliating vices, but sooner or later it is most certain to lead to serious crimes.

BOASTING.

Some Yankee philosopher says you should make it your rule never to be outdone by a boaster. "If any such one says with an air of superiority, that he keeps a yacht, directly affirm that you have a man of war of your own private property."

We would also recommend that when a blustering fellow tells you he can whip his weight in wild cats, you immediately coolly observe that you can tame a hyena with a wink, and hug a grizzly bear so as to make him grunt enough!" If a man, a man should tell you that he swam across the Gulf of Mexico, you can swear that you left Liverpool in the middle of the Atlantic, and swam back to New York, dodging the sharks all the way! Keep in advance of a boaster on all occasions, and in the end he will have to "give you his hat."

We cut the above from an exchange paper: The advice contained in it brings to our recollection an occurrence at a country tavern a year or two since; a travelling dentist and a notorious boaster was partaking of a christmas dinner, when he stated to his comrades that an uncle of his was in the habit of taking a turkey on his fork at dinner, in one hand, and holding it up, whilst he carved it by the dexterous use of the knife in the other. Nothing dashed by the boldness of the doctor's lie, a constable who was present, instantly asserted that he had a cousin in Texas who could go through the same performance with a young Buffalo, holding a pitch fork in one hand an axe in the other! The doctor stood a treat all round—N. Y. Tribune.

FISH STORY.

A correspondent of the Portland Transcript tells a story quite as large as we can swallow:—He recollects an anecdote that was told many years ago by a gentleman of Eastport, respecting a cat's fishing, that may hap you have heard. The gentleman alluded to, had his shop or store over a wharf under which the tide ebbed, and in the floor was a trap door used for various purposes, and through which he was accustomed to let down a line to catch a fish now and then for pussy's dinner. One day having to attend to a customer, he was surprised to see pussy go to it and touch it gently. This led him to watch her, when presently a fish caught hold, and mistress grimmalkin immediately commenced mauling in the line with one paw, securing the slack hauled in, by placing the other upon it as fast as hauled up. In this way she at last secured the fish. After that, said my friend, I baited her hook and let her fish for herself, and hundreds have seen her catch her own dinner.—Virginia Herald

CO OPERATION OF THE WIFE.

No man ever prospered in the world without the co-operation of his wife. If she unites in mutual endeavors, or rewards his labor with an endearing smile, with what confidence will he resort to his merchandise or his farm, fly over lands, sail upon seas, meet difficulty, and encounter danger, if he knows that he is not spending his strength in vain, but that his labour will be rewarded by the sweets of home! Solicitude and disappointment enter the history of every man's life, and he is but half provided for his voyage who finds but an associate for happy hours, while for his months of darkness and distress no sympathizing partner is prepared.

THE POETS FAIRLY PUZZLED.

"I led the horse to the stable, when a fresh perplexity arose. I removed the harness without difficulty, but after many strenuous attempts, I could not remove the collar. In despair I called for assistance, when aid soon drew near. Mr. Wordsworth brought his ingenuity into exercise, but, after several unsuccessful efforts, he relinquished the achievement as a thing altogether impracticable. Mr. Coleridge now tried his hand, but showed no more grooming skill than his predecessors; for, after twisting the poor horse's neck almost to strangulation, and the great danger of his eyes, he gave up the useless task, pronouncing that the horse's head must have grown since the collar was put on. (gout or dropsy.) for he said it was a downwright impossibility for such a magnos frontis to pass through so narrow a collar! Just in this instant a servant girl came near, and understanding the cause of our consternation, 'La master,' said she, 'you don't go about the work in the right way; you should do like this'—when, turning the collar completely upside down, she slipped it off in a moment, to our great humiliation and wonderment; each satisfied afresh that there were heights of knowledge in the world, to which we had not yet attained."—Coll.

Sir John Herschel says, of all the amusements which can possibly be imagined for a hard working man, after his daily toils, or its intervals, there is nothing like reading an entertaining newspaper. It calls for no bodily exertions, of which he has had enough or too much. It relieves his home of its dullness and sameness, which, in nine cases out of ten, is what drives him to the alehouse to his own ruin and his family's. It transports him into a livelier, and gayer, and more diversified and interesting scene—and while he enjoys himself there, he may forget the evils of the present moment, fully as much as if he was ever so drunk, with the great advantage of finding himself next day with his money in his pocket, or at least laid out in real necessaries and comforts, for himself and his family, and without a headache —Nay, it accompanies him to his next day's work, and if the paper he has been reading be anything above the very illest and slightest, gives him something to think of besides the mechanical drudgery of his every day occupation—something he can enjoy while absent, and look forward with pleasure to return to.—American Paper

A LAUGH ALL ROUND.

The pleasure arising from seeing others laugh is a common cause of laughter;—so common, that it is difficult to refrain, even without knowing the cause of their mirth. "I was, by nature, an admirer of happy, human faces, says Goldsmith, "and I seldom, if ever, enter a merry party without sharing their mirth. Walking, some time since, in Lincoln's Inn Fields, I followed a party of chimney sweepers, who, at turning under the gateway, suddenly met three Chinese, apparently just arrived in London. It was clear they had never before seen chimney-sweepers, had never, till that moment, seen such figures as the Chinese! Each party, and every spectator, was in a convulsion of laughter.—Youth's Penny Magazine.

TO KEEP YOUNG.

No surer destroyer of youth's privileges and powers and delights, than yielding the spirit to the empire of ill-temper and selfishness. We should all be cautious, as we advance in life, of allowing occasional sorrowful experience to overshadow our perception of the preponderance of good. Faith in good is at once its own rectitude and reward. To believe good, and to do good, truly and trust fully is the healthiest of humanity's conditions. To take events cheerfully, and promote the happiness of others, is the way to ensure the enduring spring of existence. Content and kindness are the soft vernal showers and fostering sunny warmth that keeps a man's nature and being fresh and green. "Lord keep my existence fresh and green," would be no less a wise prayer than the one so beautifully recorded respecting man's memory. If we would leave a gracious memory behind us, there is no way better to secure it, than by living graciously. A cheerful and benign temper, that buds forth pleasant blossoms, and bears sweet fruit, produce an undying growth of green remembrances that shall flourish immortally after the present stock is decayed and gone.—Mrs. Cowden Clarke.

A BRIGHT BOY.—The following dialogue recently occurred between a mistress of a village school and a scholar. "Jones, if you take three from five, how many will remain?" "I don't know, ma'am," replied the boy, biting his thumb-nail. "Not know? If five birds were singing on a tree, and a naughty boy should fire a gun and kill three, how many would be left?" "None," was the prompt reply. "Why, yes, there would be some left, wouldn't there?" "No, I should think not, because the others would fly away."

A FABLE.—A mule laden with salt, and an ass laden with wool, went over a brook together. By chance the mule's pack became wet, the salt dissolved, and his burden became lighter. After they had passed, the mule told his good fortune to the ass, who, thinking to speed as well, wet his pack of wool in the next water; but his load became the heavier, and he broke down under it.

What's one man's meat is another man's poison. One may drink what another's a fool to touch.

THE RULE AND THE REASON.

Horne Tooke, when at Eton, was one day asked by the master why a certain verb governed a particular case? He answered, "I don't know."

"That is impossible," said the master. "I know you are ignorant but obstinate."

Horne, however, persisted, and the master threatened him. After the punishment the master quoted the rule of grammar which bore on the subject, and he instantly replied, "I know that very well, but you did not ask me for the rule, you demanded the reason."

HEALTH AND MONEY.—There is this difference between these two temporal blessings—health and money; money is the most envied but the least enjoyed; health is the most enjoyed but the least envied; and this superiority of the latter is still more obvious when we reflect that the poorest man would not part with health for money, but that the richest would gladly part with all his money for health.

A GOOD NAME.—Always be more solicitous to preserve your innocence than concerned to prove it. It will never do to seek a good name as a primary object. Like trying to be graceful, the effort to be popular will make you contemptible. Take care of your spirit and conduct, and your reputation will take care of itself. The utmost that you are called to do, as the guardian of your reputation, is to remove injurious assertions. Let not your good be evil spoken of, and follow the highest example in mild and dignified self-vindication. No reputation can be permanent which does not spring from principle; and he who would maintain a good character should be mainly solicitous to maintain a good conscience void of offence towards God and man.

STRANGE INCONSISTENCY.—There are many men, and women too, for that matter, who would handle a watch worth twenty five dollars with the utmost care, for fear of deranging its mechanism, while they would not hesitate to lay rough hands on the feelings of others, worth twenty five years of happiness. Many a man there is who would turn to let a reptile live, who would not scruple to set his foot upon a human heart and crush it! Many a lady, who would deem it a sin to ruffle a lace cap, is not slow to rend the more exquisite net-work of the human heart!

AUSTRALIAN PURSUIT OF GAME.—When a hunter wishes to ascend a tree in pursuit of game, he cuts a small notch with his tomahawk in the bark of the tree, on a level with and opposite his left thigh, and another higher than, but in front of his right shoulder. These notches are cut by two strokes of the tomahawk, one nearly horizontal, and the other sloping down upon it. They are just deep enough to receive the edge of the big toes, and into these notches the toes are inserted. He has thus advanced two steps, and the full height of himself, when he cuts two more notches at similar distances, and in similar relative positions. The strides seem enormous, each notch in its own line, right or left, being about the man's length from the one below it, but as the hunter requires only one foot in a notch at a time, and the notches for the different feet alternate, he has only a stride of half his length to make. In this way a hunter will climb the highest and what is more surprising, the thickest gum tree, even when it seems to offer to the view little else than a flat surface. The pliable arms seem to cling and wind round objects like the hands of the * * * * while the toes lay hold of the smallest projection with the tenacity of * *. Frequently the hunter will stick his tomahawk into the tree overhead, or pass the handle through his belt, so as to hang at the back, while he advances the two steps that he has taken. The girls climb the trees in a totally different manner, and make more rapid progress, though the men advance at an astonishing pace in their own way. Having procured from a vine a long and pliable vine of the thickness of a finger, the girl passes it round her own body and the tree. She then leans her back against the boon, plants her feet upon the side of the tree, and so works her way, jerking the vine up as she advances her feet. It is generally in pursuit of honey that the women climb the trees in this fashion. Williamsburg Daily Times

Two attorneys wishing to be very civil to a certain judge, one of them began;

"Your honor knows how to manage these fellows' equal to clock work."

"Yes," said the other, "when your honor gets a parcel of these ragmuffins around you your honor is perfectly at home."

☞Industry and Economy will get rich, while Sagacity and Intrigue are laying their plans.

A CARD.

MR. HERALD—I beg, through the medium of your columns to acknowledge the receipt of the half of a ten pound note, of the Bank of England, handed to me by President Roberts; the same having been forwarded to him by the Rev. Thomas Scott, of Dublin, for the benefit of the Episcopal Church in this City. I have great pleasure, in behalf of St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal Church Monrovia, in presenting this, her grateful acknowledgments, and sincere thanks to the Rev. Doner. It affords us great satisfaction to know that the Church in Ireland looks with affection and deep interest on the Protestant Episcopal Church in this place; and the efforts which are being made here to introduce the blessings of Christianity amongst the barbarous tribes of this coast.

I had not the pleasure of making the acquaintance of the Rev. Thomas Scott—which I very much regret—during a short visit I made to Dublin about the middle of July 1851. However, while at Mrs. Pricis boarding house 68 Amgier Street, had the satisfaction of making the acquaintance of many of the Clergy of our Church—among whom were the venerable Archdeacon West, the Rev. J. Day, the Rev. Mr. McSorely of St. Peters, and others whose names I do not now remember, who were fully acquainted with me and my mission, and with whose advice I left Dublin to return during the next autumn, but circumstances preventing I wrote to them, informing them of my departure for Monrovia, and bidding them farewell for the present. And now that a way of communication is opened between London and Monrovia, I hope that our friends will continue to lend us their aid in our struggles to build up the Church of Christ in this benighted land. And we shall always be most thankful to receive any donations that may be sent to your care in behalf of the laudable cause in which we are engaged.

In behalf of St Paul's P. E. Church—
With high regards I beg to,
Remain your most obedient, servant in Christ,
E. W. STOKES,
Rector of St. P. E. Church;

We present our readers with the second series of a continuation of the revolution in France in 1848. hoping that it may be read with interest. by all, and especially those who, wish to improve by copying the the virtues of a nation, or improve, by shuning the follies of others, for through a disposition to copy virtue we excel, and by shuning the follies of others, we proportionably increase in prosperity. Thus it is with man, and whatever nation excels, it is through all that constitute virtue in its most extended sense. Therefore we deem it benificial, to study the character of nations, on the one hand to learn their wisdom, education and urbanity; and to copy their highest virtues, and on the other hand to beware of falling into the very least of their follies. This is a quality always found amongst intelligent people, and there are none who will deny that such a principle has been the making and the elevation of the strongst and most literary nation now in the world. But we need not puly thus, let our readers attentively consider the calamities brought on France, in the late revolution, and let them judge of the truth and necessity of our remarks.

Our lecturer, in continuation of his narrative said, on the 28th of Dec. 1847, I was passing the place, de la concorde on my way to visit a prisoner of some note in the cells of the Conciergeric. My progress was arrested by a file of national guards which stretched from the Tuileries across the bridge, to the Chambers of Deputies, on the other side of the road. was a similar file of troops of the line. The wind was blowing cold, and moist with scattered flakes of snow. All the soldiers, both civic and regular, looked shivering and discontented. It was evident that whatever duty they were on yielded no aminating feeling to warm them in that chilly wind! What is taking place to day, I asked of a national guard. The King is going to open parliament he replied (coldly) or with most perfect indifference, I turned away with a presentiment chilly as the day, for I felt that the King in passing through that cold guard was about to open a session that must be critical for his throne and dynasty

The causes which led to an expectation that the session of 1847, 8, would be cutical are soon told. In Paris, existed a small, but very determined republican party. They were sorely disappointed in 1830 to see a monarchy arise out of a revolution. They immediately set all their force to malign the policy of the new king, and to mar his good name. This plan they prosecuted throughout his reign with a perseverance rare in Frenchmen, and did much to alienate from Louis Phillippe the affections of his people His own character unhappily subserved their purpose. Although possessed of unlimitted revenues, his court exhibited none of that splendour that would tilitate fashion or foster trade. The impression was universal that to acquire for himself and his family treasures and power, was the sole object of his existence. Towards the latter part of his reign it began to be freely asserted that his avarice was not only unkingly but unprincipled. To such a point had things proceeded, that shortly before his down fall it was repeated by all, and beleived by many that some rail-way companies had not found prodigious bribes, spurned even by the Royal hand. A conviction had also arisen and widely spread, that in ruling the nation, the sole principle in which he relied was corruption. The whole constituency of France numbered only 240.000 The multiplied public officers till the Government, had in its pay a number of men greater than that of the electors of the entire kingdom every man who had a hope to have a relative in office was expected to support the elections the ministerial candidate.

Thus did the ministry secure for itself a majority in the Chamber of Deputies, of the 450 members of that chamber, 204 were actually holders of place and in the pay of Government, thus making that body simply an instrument of the Royal will. The Peers again were not hereditary as in England, but were named for life by the King. That house also was therefore but an instrument of the Royal will. thus the three estates of the realm were virtually—merged in the cabinet. Besides this, an opinion whether true or false, had become almost universal, that the King by his ability and his obstinacy subjected to his own plans, every minister who came into his service, instead therefore of the odium of unpopular measures falling only on the head of the King's adversaries, it fell chiefly upon his own. Again, during his reign, the taxes gradually increased till in a time of profound peace they were more burdensome, than under Napoleon amid his gigantic wars. In this state of things arose a cry parliamentary reform. The Government had taken from the people the right of meeting in public, except under special permission of authorities. That permission was granted to hold reform dinners or banquets in different parts of France. At these banquets the King's personal politics were freely criticised. and on some occasions his name was omitted from the list of toasts, a feeling dissatisfaction spread throughout the country Then appeared Lamartine's histry of the Gerondists, sheding a new lustre on the old revolutionist. Upon this came the famine year, the people of France suffered much, and though wrongly, very naturaly attributed their sufferings to Louis Phillippe. The Spanish marriage followed and then he lost that moral strength which he had always derived from his alliance with England. Many, and especially Lamartine, now began to prophecy his down fall. While this was fresh in the public mind, came the trial of M Teste a peer and a former minister, this gave to the public lamentable proof of what they had all a long believed that the government was odiously corrupt. Close upon this came the tragic murder of the Duchess de Praslin by her husband. The two circumstances raised among the populace a loathing and contempt of the peerage. I knew a water-carrier of the lowest class in Paris. who just at that time, when addressed by the approbious epithet of canaille replied, you may call me any thing you like, but a peer of Frane. Blow followed blow. In the Swiss war the French had their feelings out raged by seeing their national diplomacy employed on the side of the Jesuits. Italy became a spring of political excitement The French were not a little chafed to see nations, whom they had been wont to despise, making swift progress. In liberties just at the time when they felt the hand of a powerful monarch dragging themselves back to the old despotisism of Louis the XIV. Under such circumstances did the session of 1847, 8; open and for such reasons did every man, acquainted with the country look to the opening of that session with intense anxiety. All felt that either the King must, that day announce some conciliatory measures, or the country must pass through struggles more or less disastrious. That in fact France was brought to one of these crises when of two things one is inevitable, reform or revolution. In a few hours from the moment I have mentioned, the report was rushing over France like a whirl wind, that in the speech from the throne, the hoary monarch, instead of conciliating the people, had stigmatized every man who attended the reform banquets, as blind and hostile.—In England a hard word hurts, but in France a hard word burns. Those two words were that evening on the lips of every man in Paris. They might have been creative, for they called into existence, around the unhappy King a host of passions, truly blind and hostile. The deputies of the opposition, were stung. The ministry insisted on repealing the odious words in the address to the Crown, just then fell upon the ear of Paris tidings that the banquet projected on the twelth arrondisment, had been prohibited by Government The crisis had come. Charles X had violated the liberty of opinion in the press. Louis Phillipe now violated the liberty of opinion in speech. Charles the X fell, would Louis Paillipe stand. This question shot through the heart of France. News now came that Sicilians had successfully risen against the Neapolitan Bourbons, and that in Bavaria the people had humoled their King by a public tumult, upon the excitable Parisians, neither of these events was lost. The deputies of the opposition resolved to hold the banquet in spite of the Government, daring them to prosecute.

The Government promised to allow them to meet, but threatened prosecution.

To avoid tumult the site of the banquet was changed from the twelfth arrondisament to the Champs Elysees, from the Bethnal Queen of Paris to its Hyde Park. Two days before the banquet was to occur, its conductors published the programme of its procession, such was the lack of liberty in France, that a procession for a political purpose amounted almost to an act of rebellion. They went even so far as to assign a place in procession to such national guards as might choose to attend in uniform. The walls of Paris were soon coverd with proclamations, and groups of men were every where reading them with looks that argued no good I joined one group, consisting wholly of working men, they read, in silence except one who on coming to the words, "the banquet is prohibited." Just raised his shoulders and said, that's beautiful.—As Monday the twenty first of Febuary closed, every one feared that Paris which had so often been stained with blood, would be stained with blood again. Tuesday came, an English eye would not have observed any thing very remarkable in the Champs Elysees that morning. There was simply a large number of blouses. Here I aught perhaps to say that in France the popular designation of a man of any working class is a blouse, and that of a man of any other class is a coat B. The working men almost without exception wear just such a coat of bluel inen as we see on our butchers. Hence the common appellation, on the morning in question, then these blouses covered the Champs Elysees. Here and there they stood in little groups of twenty or thirty, such as would hardly have an Englishman to ask what they were doing, but those who knew France well, pointed to those little knots of debaters and said something will grow out of that.

The place of the Tuilerres stands with its end on the right bank of the Seine, and runs in one long line towards the interior of the town. on the western front of the Palace, stretches for perhaps a furlong, the Tuileries gardens diversified with parterres, ponds, groves, avenues and statuary These gardens open westward on the Place de la Concorde.—A spacious area having in a circle round several majestic statues symbolizing the cheif cities of France interspersed with these, and richly gilded and fluted Corinthian colums which serve as lamp posts. The place is waterd by two fountains elaborally magnificent, and between these a tall Egyptian obelisk stands in a right line with the center window of the Palace. Standing at the foot of this obelisk, you have the Champs Elysees stretching westward. they are simply a grove skirted on one side by mansion, on the other by the Seine and pierced by sundry noble avenues, one of these in a right line with the obelisk leads the eye up through the grove for a full mile where at the crest of a rising ground stands Napoleon's unequalled triumphal arch. If the eye turn to the right of the obelisk, it finds a long line of colonaded buildings with a spacious opening in the center, which opening terminates in the stately corinthian peristyle of the new church, of the madeliene; on your other hand flows the same having just on its further bank, the twelve graceful pillows or columns of the chamber of Deputies. Thus when standing on the Place de la concorde, so associated with all the revolutionary history of France, you have on one side this palace of the bourbons, on another the Emperors towering arch, on a third the classic madeliene and on the fourth the seine and the national Legislative Hall.

Upon this gorgeous centre of artistic skill, converged the political interest of the day The place was crowded with troops. An unarmed populace over flowed around them, the square in which stands the madeliene was also filled with troops, and axes added to their equipments testified to an expectation of barricades. Here a long the Boulevards in the cheif streets the shops were shut, and the blouses were crowding. But no arms, no organization, no preparation for revolt could be any where seen. Every body had come out expecting to see some thing, but no one was prepared to move. Will any thing take place, you asked. No, said one how can there be a revolution. There are 80,000 troops in Paris. No said a nother there will be nothing we have no aims, no said another there are too many spies, and no organization. Another more thoughtful says no there will be nothing unless an accident occurs but if an accident occur, ah, then, and through the whole city appeared to spread this feeling, that the destiny of France was suspended or an accident, on re-entering the Place de la concorde after a tour of the city. I found the people running away in apparently great good humour, seeing nothing strange passed on against the stream, but after having emerged from it and passed by the soldiers. I fonnd that which seemed merely a scamper of the mob had been charged by the house in which some people were killed. This began a real irritation a party attempted the chamber of Deputies but were repelled, a band full of men going to a small post in the champs Elysees, one of them climbed up by the roof and called upon the soldiers to lay down there arms, they might easily have shot him, but they suffered themselves quietly to be disarmed and sent away. Proceeding up the champs Elysees I found the gamins de Paris the urchins of the town piling a heap of chairs and forms in the grand avenue, a mock barricade and busving, themselves at the same time by breaking lamps &c, actual barricades soon followed in the neighbourhood.

Here is a lengthly account given of how a barricade is formed, by tearing up the pavement, the over throwing of omnibusses, carts wagons &c

But I pass over this to give the reader a more interesting part of the narative.

The barricade began in the afternoon the streets of Paris echoed to sounds shortly after that, thank God, never troubled ours. Three short taps of a drum which a stranger would hear without emotion but which on a day like that, make every heart in Paris leap. Take your sac. Take your sac. Take your sac, cried the drums of the National guard. It was the voice of the King summoning his civic militia to rush to arms, the emotion caused by that call was intense, all knew that the ministry had not called out the national guards in the morning, simply because they could not trust them, and therefore looked on this late appeal to their loyalty as a sure proof that matters had become threatening Few of the national guard obeyed the call, for the want of confidence in them shown in the morning, was felt as an affront.

Thus we conclude the second series in the historical narrative of the French revolution and will go through the whole interesting subject with many comments, if it should prove interesting and instructive to our readers, for it is vain to fill a paper or a book with matter unless it is both instructive and interesting.

Mr Editor.

You will please insert in your paper, for the edification of the numerous friends of Judge Benedict, the following extract of a letter from Sinoe County, to John Evans, from Mr. C. L. Parsons Sec; of the Committee appointed by the citizens of Greenville, Sinoe, to make anple arrangements for the reception of Chief Justice Benedict. Who has, since been unanimously nominated a Candidate for the Presidency. Mr Parsons says, in his letter of two pages, portraying the liberal, hearty and enthusiastic manner of his reception by the people, generally, of Greenville, "that a dinner was sumptuously prepared on the day o his arrival;"—at which toasts and eager congratulations formed the past time;—at which, too, many questions were propounded to the Judge and were satisfactorly answered —He says, "with the greatest ease." The citizens regretted that his stay was, of necessity, so short. For the departure of the "Lark" was fixed upon the following morning Early the next morning the committee escorted the Judge to the wharf where many citizens were waiting to bid him adieu. Whom the judge, on solicitation, promised another and a longer visit Which he was prompted to do on account of their general wish to see the old Judge and to shake his hand As such is the desire of the citizens of the other settlements Much should be said to the praise of Mr. Marquand as the letter states, but that should, and therefore will, be left to an abler pen.

Respectfully yours
JOHN EVANS.

"My sons forget not my law, but let your hearts keep my commandments: for length of days, and long life, and peace shall they add to you Let not mercy and truth forsake you; bind them about your necks; write them upon the table of your hearts so shall you find favour and good understanding in the sight of God and man."

In the coming election, remember ye be brethern and let no strife, I pray you, be between you, let no attempt be made to tarnish the good name of your fellow citizens, and though you differ in opinion, forget not the golden rule to do as you would have others do to you.

Remember that if you succeed in your strange design to heap odium upon your brethren, you betray your country's good, & that you will be guilty of the dreadful sin of matricide

Remember that ye are a small people, that "united you stand, divided you fall."

Then let each of you act conscientiously in discharging that most important function of a citizen, the elective franchise, vote for the man of your choice vote for him you think best qualified to discharge the duties of President &c, and allow others to do the same and dwell in love as brethren.

GOODNESS ETERNAL.

The pains we spend upon our mortal selves will perish with ourselves, but the care we give out of a good heart to others, the efforts of disinterested duty, the deeds and thoughts of pure affection are never lost; they are liable to no waste, and are like a force that propagates itself forever, changing itself, but not losing its intensity. In short there is a sense in which nothing human dies; nothing, at least, which proceeds from the higher and characteristic part of man's nature; nothing which he does as a subject of God's moral law. Material structures are dissolved, their identity and functions are gone, but mind partakes of the eternity of the great parent spirit; and thoughts, truths, emotions, once given to the world, are never lost; they exist as truly, and perform their duty as actively, a thousand years after their origin as on their day of birth.

GOOD NATURE.

One cannot imagine any quality of the human mind whence greater advantages can arise to society than good nature, seeing that man is a social being, not made for solitude, but conversation —Good nature not only lessens the sorrows of life, but increases its comforts. It is more agreeable than beauty, or even wit It gives a pleasing expression to the countenance and induces a multitude of the most amiable observations. It is, indeed, the origin of all society Were it not for good nature, men could not exist together, nor hold intercourse with one another.

THE AZTEC CHILDREN.—I have, with thousands of others, paid a visit to these extraordinary people, who, it is confessed, are a complete puzzle.

It is of very little consequence from what quarter of the globe they originally came, for they are equally as great curiosities from one place as another. But if they were not (and pardon me for believing that they were,) really born and brought up in that wonderful country, long inhabited by a race now extinct, but whose idolatrous genius has peopled their land with misshapen statues and gigantic temples, from whence did they come, and to what division of the human family do they belong? Although to many it would be very gratifying to trace their geneology back through a long series of generations, the public, content to regard them precisely as they are exhibited to them, will find ample room for the exercise of their curiosity, and indeed of their imaginative faculties too. The only doubt the matter is one respecting the truth or falsity of the highly interesting and thrilling narrative of their origin, and the manner in which they were obtained. About this there is unquestionably much room for speculation and argument. But why pass by the real point of certainty that is, the actual existence of the two diminutive, but very palpable facts themselves, especially since the public have never been treated to a similar sight, and since candid spectators uniformly and unhesitatingly declare that their highest conception of them as curiosities are altogether exceeded by the reality itself.

The city of Iximaya it is true lies hard upon the confines separating fable from certainty Travelers in Central America however have mentioned its existence beyond doubt, among them is John L. Stephens.

The effect of the positive information is thus expressed by the distinguished traveler himself:

"The interest awakened in us, was the most thrilling I ever experienced One look at that city, was worth ten years of an every day life." If he is right, a place is left where indians and a city exist, as Cortez and Alvarado found them; there are living men who can solve the mystery that hangs over the ruined cities of America; who can, perhaps, go to Copan and read the inscription on the monuments No subject more exciting and attractive presents itself to any mind, and the deep impression in my mind, will never be effaced.—Baltimore Sun.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, FEBRUARY 16th, 1853.

LIBERIA:—We have read with much gratification the Address delivered at the Anniversary of the New York State Colonization Society, by John H. B. Latrobe, Esq: President of the Maryland State Colonization Society.—It would, in our opinion, tend greatly to the enlightenment of our colored brethren in the United States, if they would divest their minds of prejudice, and give the address a fair and candid consideration. Long since, we believed that abolitionism, as now preached in the northern parts of the United States, operated much in strengthening the cause of colonization; and at the same time, irritated the owners of slaves, and influenced the enactment of laws in slave-holding states, bearing severely on the free colored people—not only in slave holding states, but "free states" are curtailing them of the few privileges which they at one time enjoyed. It is not, however, our purpose now, to speak further on this subject, but we invite the attention of our Liberian readers to the singular and interesting circumstance connected with the naming of their adopted country. We take from Mr. Latrobe's address, the following item. "The name of Liberia was given to the colonies on the coast of Africa by the late General Robert Goodloe Harper, one of the earliest, most active and most distinguished friends of colonization. In 1821, Doctor Eli Ayres, an Agent of the American Colonization Society, returned from the coast, where, in conjunction with Commodore Stockton—now a Senator from New Jersey, in the United States Senate,—he had purchased the territory of Cape Messurado, now Monrovia, from the natives. He was a frequent visitor at General Harper's. On one occasion, when Dr. Ayres was describing the localities about the Cape, General Harper suggested that the speaker, then a student of law in his office, should attempt, under Dr. Ayres' instructions, to make a map of the newly acquired territory. This was done; & the map was given to the engraver, who returned a proof sheet, that the names might be added. It was agreed that this should be the work of General Harper and the map maker, each exercising his ingenuity alternately, General Harper naming the territory. Various names were suggested, and Freedonia was on the point of being adopted; when General Harper said, "can—nothing be made of Liber, a free man" and after several attempts to render the word euphonius, 'Liberia" was hit upon and adopted. This name being subsequently approved by the American Colonization Society, has ever since been retained as descriptive of the entire country occupied by the colonies from the United States: thus, when the State of Maryland founded a colony there, it was called Maryland in Liberia."

Boombo of Little Cape Mount, of whose repeated depredations—we have so frequently referred to, in violation of his solemn engagements with this Government—upon certain Golah, and other Chiefs residing in said Little Cape Mount Country, and under the acknowledged protection of this Government—have for some months past been a source of deep solicitude to the Government; and of great annoyance and suffering to the subjects of his spoliations. Boombo has surprised the towns and villages of the chiefs; captured and murdered many of the inhabitants; and carried off hundreds of others, to be held as slaves Every means, that could be suggested, has been resorted to, in the hope of putting an end to these predatory attacks, and of awarding justice to the injured parties—but without success. Indeed the forbearance of the Government, to use military force seems only to have emboldened Boombo, and his marauding followers to other, and more atrocious acts of violence.

Intelligence has reached the Government that Boombo is now extending his depredations into the Dey country—burning villages, and murdering the inhabitants:—and a few days since robbed several factories, owned by merchants of this place, established in that section. To afford protection to these inoffensive Golahs and Deys—to which this Government is pledged—to secure the lives and property of traders in that country, to put an end to these aggressions, punish the aggressors and maintain the authority of the Government, and Majesty of the laws—but one alternative remains; and no time should be lost in carrying it into effect.

The Legislature at its last session, anticipating from the state of things then existing in the Little and Grand Cape Mount Countries, authorized the employment of military force to settle, and restore peace to the country, and we are fully justified in stating that the Government will at once, adopt rigorous measures to punish Boombo and his marauding chiefs.

In our last we referred to the general meeting of the Chiefs of the Vey Countries, for the purpose of entering into permanent arrangements to restore peace to the countries between Grand Cape Mount and the Gallenas, both places included. We learn that the place of meeting will be at Sugaree, at a town about a dozen miles from the beach, and that all the Chiefs of any notoriety will be present, or will be represented by persons of note. It is said that several Chiefs have already met, and by the first of March, it is thought that all will be present at the place of meeting.

We are informed that Prince George Cain of Grand Cape Mount, has sent a message to the President, earnestly soliciting him to plant a colony at Grand Cape Mount. If we are not greatly mistaken, there are some serious charges against Cain, and they should be settled before friendly relations are opened with him.

The Immigrants are geting on through their acclimation finely. Those by the "Oriole" from New York, excepting a very few cases, had but a slight attack and they are now well, and attending to their several occupations.

The City of Monrovia presents a pleasing prospect in the way of improvements - on every side we notice the building of stone and brick houses of respectable size, and of durable construction, in other respects. Building materials of every description are in great demand, and at high rates. It is not only in the way of private building that our city is improving, but the coporation authorities have, and are now giving considerable attention to their duties.

Don Chrispo,—who for nearly a year has been lurking in the neighborhood of the Gallenas and the Sherbro, and whose establishment near the She-Bar was broken up a few weeks since by Admiral Bruce Commanding H M. Naval Forces on this Coast, is now some thirty miles in the interior of the Gallenas We are told, that the chiefs are anxious for him to leave the country, and what is most surprising to us that Prince Manna, is one of those most anxious, to drive him out of the country.

General Lewis has received orders from the President, to organize a military force of 200 men rank and file, to leave here first march next, for Little Cape Mount, to arrest Boombo in his daring outrages, and to afford protection to the inoffensive Golahs and Deys, which the Government are pledged by treaty stipulations to do.

Religious.

The Schooners "Providence" and "Pedlar" left, the first on the 7th, and the latter, on 8th: for Sinoe with delegates from the Baptist Churches in this county, to represent them in the Baptist association, to be holden in Sinoe. A number of Gentlemen and ladies were passengers in these vessels, as visitors. We are certain from the well known hospitality of the people of Sinoe, that these visitors will be gladly welcomed.

The Captured African's Farewell.

BY JAMES LEO: SIMS.

Africa—my own, my native land,
A long farewell to thee;
Farewell to the mountains rugged strand,
Farewell sweet liberty:
Farewell to Afric's burning sand.
I am no longer free.

No more will I with my twanging bow,
Ascend the mountains height;
No more will I meet the hostile foe,
In palaver or in fight:
No more will I hunt the bounding roe,
With wild delight.

My mother dear will weep for me,
In her cot beneath the willow,
Ah mother dear I weep for the;
Though far away on the billows,
Yes mother dear I weep for the:
Though far away on the billows.

I FIND NO LIGHT.

I find no light,
Tho'long I've searched within my heart to see
One filial act, one proof of love to thee.
Yet all is dark, or but a flickering ray,
Which, self-deceiving, leads my feet astray;
I've sought to keep thy law, but thoughts of sin
Are ever present, and I look within
And find no light.

I see no light—
Tho'I have prayed, I still have vainly sought
To gain a victory ov'er the sin I fought;
Upon a sea of doubts I'm tempest-tossed,
Despairing 'to be saved, yet fearing to be lost
Rebellious passions and a stubborn will
I hate, and yet indulge them still.

I'll seek no light—
For I deserve none—I have sought to find
In my own darkness guidance for the blind;
But now I'll seek no longer peace within.
I come to thee, blessed Saviour, filled with sin,
Tho' I am vile, I pray that thou wilt dress
My soul in thy fine robe of righteousness,
And be my light.

Be thou my light—
Tho' sin and darkness only reign in me,
Yet to thy cross I cling and my salvation see.
Completed there, oh help me to receive
Thy gracious fulness, faith in thee to give;
Save me from sin and in life's darkest hour,
In death's cold waters, may my spirit soar
With Christ my light.

POETRY

From the Baltimore Weekly Sun.

I aim not now with passion's power
To paint in glowing words a flame
That lived long since its troubled hour,
And sleeps beside an early flower—
A sweet, adored name.
I plead the sympathy of hearts
That blooms when passion fades away;
That sympathy I know imparts
A purer and a brighter ray,
To light the pilgrim on his way.

Thy mental and external grace
The kindling spirit of thine eye—
The glow of heart upon thy face
On every line has pressed a trace
Of feelings pure and high.
A being thus—a beauteous whole—
A flower of earth—but touch'd with heaven,
Sent forth to charm the stubborn soul,
And soften to its sweet control—
Hast thou that power given?
For good or ill, a dangerous spell—
For Heaven's sake then use it well.

So like the one so early lost—
They seem in thee again to move.—
But my heart's youthful impulse cross'd,
Is not again with passion toss'd—
It aims, a higher love.
That love sublime through reason springs;
And higher yet may souls ascend,
If holy hope on earnest wings.
Will seek beyond this life a friend,
Whose love will teach our hearts to burn
And mutual tears to triumph turn.

Thy spirit came to me lone breast
Unsought, uncall'd, unwoo'd, it came—
A timid visitant I press'd
The stranger, as a welcome guest,
To stay or leave a name.
Thou left a name but couldst not stay—
A cherished name—a memory—
An angel light along my way—
A light that gilds the darkest day,
When my thoughts turn to thee.

I love to be where thou hast been
In the wild walk by stream or hill—
Thy image press'd on every scene,
Is present with me still
And friendship's ever-kindling eye,
And soothing voice, and smile, is nigh.
I love the hymn that thou hast sung,
On the green bank, beneath the tree—
So bird-like were the notes among
The trees and flowers, had they a tongue,
Would sing in praise with thee.

But why this strain in life's late day?
Because my heart will have it so;
Its thoughts, in numbers as I may,
I sometimes strew along my way—
I may not stop their flow.
Their flow, dear lady, in my lay
May touch a chord of higher tone;
Then give the generous feeling play,
And trust it's sympathetic sway—
A sway that friends may own. E.

Market for Young Women in Hungary.—Every year on the festival of St Peter, which comes on in the latter days of June, the peasantry of this district (Bihar) meet together at a certain place, for the purpose of a general fair. This fair has a very peculiar interest for the young men and young maidens for it is then that, whilst purchasing household utensils and family necessaries, they choose for themselves partners, and conclude marriages. The parents bring their marriageable daughters, with each one her little dower accompanying her, loaded up in a small cart. This dower is, of course proportionate to the lowly condition of these adventurers, some sheep, some times a few hogs, or even chickens. These girls are attired in their best, or what pieces of gold or silver they may possess are strung upon a string, and neatly attached to the braids of their hair.

Thus fitted out, every girl who desires to find a husband betakes herself to the fair. She quits the house of her father, perhaps forever, and bids her mother a last, quite ignorant of what roof is to shelter or what fate awaits her journey's end. As to her fortune, it is in the little cart that attends her. The object of her journey is never mistaken; nobody wonders at it; nor is there occasion for a public officer to make a record of the deed. On the other hand, the youths who wish to procure themselves wives hasten to the fair, arrayed in the very best skin garments their chests contain. These savage looking beings, who would be quite enough to make our young ladies run and hide themselves, proceed with a good deal of interest and zest to inspect the fair mountain lasses that are brought hither by their fathers and mothers, casting many side glances and wistful looks towards the captivating merchandise.

He gives his fancy a free rein, and when he spies one that seems to claim his preference, he at once addresses the parents, asks what they have given her, and asks what price they have set upon the "lot" so exposed for sale—at the same time stating his own property and standing; If the parents asks too much, these gallant "boys" make their own offer, which, if it does not suit the other to agree to, the fond lover passes to seek some one else.

We may suppose that the proud young men always keep a "stop eye" open to the correspondence of loveliness upon the one hand, and the size of the dower upon the other. At last he finds one for whom he is willing to give the price, and a loud clapping of the hands together announces to the bystanders that the bargain is completed.

What a heavy blow this must be for some lazy rival who has not decided quick enough, who is halting and considering whether she will suit him, and whether she is as lovely and accomplished in household matters as some of the others. However, the deed is done, and the bargain is completed, and forthwith the young girl—poor thing—proceeds also to clasp the hand of her future husband. What a moment of interest and anxiety to her. The destiny of her life is sealed by this rude clasp of the hand. In this act she as much as said, "yes I will be yours for life, and I consent to partake of your joys and your troubles, to follow you through weal and through woe."

The families of the betrothed pair then surround them, offering their congratulations, and at once without delay, the priest who is on the ground for the occasion, pronounces the nuptial benediction.—The young woman presses the parting hand of that family who have reared her, but of which she is no longer a part—mounts the car of her new husband, whom but a few hours before she never so much as knew, and escorted by her dower is conducted to the house henceforward to be her home.

The Hungarian Government have long tried, but in vain, to suppress these fairs for young girls —Positive orders have been given that they should no longer take place, but such is the force of long established custom, united to the necessities of this pastoral race, that all such orders have been disregarded. The fair still continues, and every year such cavalcades as we have described may be seen descending into the plains of Kalnasa, there to barter off these precious jewels of the household, as though they were so many beeves or mere produce of the soil.—Norfolk & Portsmouth Herald

THE SOUL IMMORTAL

The sun is but a spark of fire,
A transient meteor in the sky,
The soul immortal as its sire,
Shall never, never die!"

The Watts sweetly sings. Yes, the mind is immortal. Infinite wisdom had otherwise never implanted longings which all of earth leaves unsatisfied, or gifted us with capacities capable of indefinite improvement.

The brute is born, attains maturity, and hastens to depart. Its powers culminate and then sink into a decay ominous of extinction, whilst man's longest life closes upon an intellect yet in rapid development. The body as it runs quickly through the cycle from youth to age, proves oftentimes, it is true, a weariness and clog to the prisoner within; but their union severed, like a bird cage-freed; the disenthralled spirit will soar away on pinions unperishable.

Distinct, as it is, in its nature from the material analogy forbids that we should anticipate the mind's annihilation when that home where it briefly tabernacled has gone back into dust. Death involves a disintegration of parts; but in the immaterial we can conceive of no such separation and hence can predicate no decay. As the insect flutters from out its chrysalis in green and gold, to sport amid flowers and sunshine so shall the purified spirit forsake its chrysalis, to dwell amid the beauties and brightness of heaven. There, in the fruition of its fondest hopes, will it find ample amends for all sorrow and every sadness and participate in pleasures which those who deny a future—because they dread its awards—can never enjoy.

Then cheer up, travel worn and christian pilgrim. With thankful heart partake of such as thy present affords, and trust unswervingly in God, assured that whatever betide, hereafter thy voice shall be attuned to angel harmonies, and thy home be in that city whose walls are jasper, and whose gates are pearl; along whose streets murmurs the crystal river, and in whose midst blooms the tree of life.—Virginia Herald.

STRANGELY—do people talk of getting over a great sorrow. No one ever does that; it must, in nature which can be touched by a feeling of grief at all. The only way is to pass through the ocean of affliction solemnly, slowly with humility and faith, as the Israelites passed through the sea. Then as very wave of misery will divide and become to us a wall on the right side and the left, until the gulf narrows before our eyes, and we land safely on the opposite shore. —Portland Eclectic.

STORIES OF THE EAST.

BY AN AMERICAN TRAVELLER

THE ROMANCER.

This is, among his countrymen, a most important character. Every body who has travelled through Egypt or Syria will bear witness that the accompanying pencil sketch is a faithful representation of the class. The old gentleman whose name is attached to it lives in the neighborhood of Beirut. He is called Ben Hozain, the King of Talkers. The handwriting is his own, and you will admit that the name looks as much like Ben Hozain as it does like Benjamin Huggins, of which I think it must be a corruption. Ben is conspicuous chiefly for the length of his moustache. His tongue is long, but his moustache is a good deal longer; in fact, it is such a moustache as any Arab in Syria, however distinguished, might be proud to swear by. It is to be regretted that people should swear at all, but if they will swear, it is better they should profane on the subject of beards or moustaches than on matters of higher import. By profession and inclination, Ben Hozain is a story-teller. I do not mean to say that he is given to wilful lying, or to any misrepresentations of facts; but the business of his life is to entertain the public of Beirut with the traditional romances of the country. Where people read but little, they make up in some measure for the deficiency by talking and listening a good deal.—This is especially the case with the Orientals. In the absence of a general circulation of newspapers, printed histories of wars, philosophical essays on man, and books of travel, they must have professional story tellers or romancers; that is to say, men whose regular business it is to deal in tradition or fiction. Throughout the whole East there is not a more important personage than the story-teller, or one who wields a greater influence upon the public mind. He is a walking newspaper, a living history, breathing essay, a personified book of travels, which envolve its stores of knowledge on self-acting principles. As such, being considered a responsible agent, he is entitled to the confidence of the community, and generally enjoys it to the fullest extent. The more marvelous his stories are the greater credit they obtain; the more rapid his political satires the greater his circulation; the more incomprehensible his theories and illustrations of human life the profounder his philosophy. He is always a popular character, and is indispensible at every smoking house. The grandest Pashas listen to him with profound attention; the morals which he points and the tales which he adorns find their way even into the sacred precincts of the Haram. In the highest circles and in the lowest his traditions and anecdotes are swallowed with avidity. Men who have listened for years to the same stories and the same jokes continue to listen for years again with undiminished delight, and always applaud at the same points and laugh at the same strokes of wit. No child of ten years, in our cold clime of matter-of-fact nature, could devour his first fairy tale or ghost story with half the delight that an Arab grandfather devours the oft-told romances of the old story-teller.

The way I came to take Ben Hozain's portrait was this: One afternoon I rode out with our dragoman to the pine grove, where the towns-people go to smoke the narguila and display their feats of horsmanship. It was shady and pleasant under the trees, and I dismounted and amused myself taking a view of a Syrian coffee-house, near which were seated a number of Turks, Greeks, and Arabs, in all their picturesque varieties of costume. An old man sat in the midst of the group, chanting at the highest pitch of his voice the famous romance of the White Princess and the Grand Vizier. Sometimes in the excitement of the love parts he screamed, and sometimes pretending to faint, and when he was reciting the more tragic parts, where there was murder and suicide, he howled like a hyena, and counterfeited all the agonies of death in a most thrilling manner. When he got over the principal difficulties he moderated down into a species of billing and cooing, winking and ogling, that reminded me forcibly of representations that I had seen of the passions in the Astor Place Opera House. I could not but think that nature had intended Ben Hozain to grace the board of that establishment, and felt that an appreciating audience of the Ultra Fen, his delineations of the passions was so exquisitely extravagant. Struck with the picturesque raggedness of his costume, and the length of his grizzled moustache, I began to sketch him. One by one his listeners dropped off one by one, and gathered around me to look into the mysteries of the art. All kinds of queer remarks were made, of which Yusef gave me a running interpretation. "Look! Ben Hozain," said one; "look! you will now the Howadji puts down his nose!" "And his eyes!" adds another. "And his moustache!" cries a third. "Tahib!" Good. "Afjaib!" Wonderful. "What a sublime genius the Howadja has!" "Tell Ben Hozain," said I, "to come a little closer, and you shall see him on this paper just as he lives and breathes!" "Adjaib!" Wonderful! "This way Hozain! The Howadji wants you" But Hozain had no notion of being interrupted in his story. He went on louder than before on the subject of the White Princess. "By Allah!" cried the Arabs; "she shall come! Hozain must be done on paper!" With which two stout fellows ran over to where he sat, seized him on each side by the moustache, and hauled him up before me. He was the most comical and good-humored old gentleman imaginable; his face was covered with wrinkles and the stubbles of a white beard, and he seemed quite delighted at affording merriment to the crowd.—Here you have him just as he sat, with his moustache in full; his eyes twinkling with fun, and a tradition in every wrinkle of his mouth. So pleased was he with his appearance on paper that he put his name to the sketch. The Arabs were all in ecstacies, and begged me to take them, one and all; but, there being about thirty of them, I had to decline, on the plea of having important business to attend to that evening.

As I was going away the old story-teller looked wistfully at me. "Well?" said I, "what do you want now, my friend?"

"Backshish," said he.

"For what? I'm going to put you in a book, isn't that backshish enough?"

"But I'll never see the book. I'd rather have the backshish now."

"That's strange. Have you no pride in the honor of the thing. Think of the fame it will give you! Ben Hozain will be known in the remotest corners of America."

"Ah, Grand Seignor Sultain of the United States, Ben Hozain is already the victim of fame. For more than forty years have I told stories for the public good; Sultans have praised me, Pashas have applauded my romances, beautiful ladies have wept over my love passages, yet here I am, as you see, with scarce a rag on my back. When I'm dead, I don't know that they'll take the trouble to bury me."

"Well, Hozain, I'm sorry to hear so bad an account of your people. In America we take a great deal of trouble about our benefactors after they die. We often spend more money in feasting over their graves and celebrating their virtues than enough to have made them comfortable during life. Your patrons must be very ungrateful, and as a mark of my contempt for such ingratitude, I shall give you the backshish you require. How much will it take to make you happy?"

"Only two piasters. Oh! Sublime Howadji! Ben Hozain can be the happiest man upon earth, for he can drink the Coffee of Delight and smoke the Pipe of Content for a week."

"Very well, take this piece of silver, five piasters (twenty-two cents). And remember (said I, proudly,) that in America we never neglect men who live by their talents. We subscribe to their newspapers, read their books, profit by their labors, and when they are dead pay them—a great deal of respect."—Baltimore Weekly Sun.

From the Vermont Chronicle.

Drink Water Only.

Drink water only! When the race
With eager numbers fills the place,
And flags in streams excitant fly,
There comes a steed with crystal eye,
Like waves that gleam in forest pool,—
And every nerve is fed as cool,
Till jockeys mount and crowds retire,
And then they strain and blaze with fire.

Drink water only! When the shade
With day nature is softer made,
And kisses breathe upon the breeze,
By birds notes answered in the trees—
Oh! softer, richer far they pour
Than twitter'd all the morn before,—
Yet none for wine hath ever sung,
But water trills them, old and young.

Drink WATER only! Were it RUM,
Earth for mortals were not home.
For mothers, with a fondness known
To their calm, sober thought alone,
To children, stooping at the spring,
For childhood's eye and heart the thing;—
But desert all, he legions crammed,
The den of devils and the damned.

Drink water only! and the will
To praise the Giver rises still;
He from the rock's young cavern leads
The sparkling crystal of the meads,
He at the river's sandy shore
The heed supplies and hard, before,
He from his well-divine will gave
The water of which souls shall live.

ORIGIN OF SENDING MONEY BY POST. In 1792, when the true British sailor was stoutly preparing to defy the French in various parts of the globe at thirty shillings a month, and when British military valor was fighting Tippo Saib, in India, at a shilling a day, it was felt as a great hardship, that the affluent warriors of both services could not transmit safely and speedily to their sweethearts and wives, even from one part of the United Kingdom to another, their surplus capital. The Government, seeing the danger of allowing the savings of its servants to burn holes in their pockets, was good enogh to concoct a snug little 'job,' by means of which such pocket conflagrations might be extinguished. The monopoly of transmitting money from one place to another was conceded to three gentlemen, in connexion with the Post-office. Their terms were eight-pence for every pound; but if the sum exceeded two pounds, a stamp duty of one shilling was levied by Government, in addition. Five guineas was the highest amount which could be thus remitted, and the charge for that sum four shillings and sixpence, or nearly five per cent., besides the price of the postage of the letter which contained the advice, perhaps a shilling more. Now, happily, the days of monopoly have passed, and Mr Rowland Hill does the same thing for the odd sixpence, with an odd penny, at a profit to the Government of about £7000 a year, exclusive of the gain derived from the enormous number of letters of advice which Post-office orders have created. EXHUMATION OF A LIZARD. A short time since, as David Virtue, mason, at Auchtertoo, a village four miles from Kirkaldy, in Scotland, was dressing a millstone from a large block, after cutting away a part, he found a lizard embedded in the stone. It was about an inch and a quarter long, of a brownish yellow color, and had a round head, with bright sparkling eyes. It was apparently dead, but after being abou five minutes exposed to the air, it showed signs of life. One of the workmen very cruelly put snuff in its eyes, which seemed to cause it much pain. It soon after ran about, which much celerity; and after half an hour was brushed off the stone and killed. When found, it was coiled up in a round cavity of its form, being an exact impression of the animal. There was about fourteen feet of earth above the rock, and the block in which the lizzard was found, was seven or eight feet deep in the rock, so that the whole depth of the animal from the surface, was twenty-one or twenty-two feet. The stone had no fissure, was quite hard, and one of the best to be got from the quarry of Cultaloe, reckoned, perhaps, the best in Scotland.—Ibedem.

MUTUAL FORBEARANCE.—That house will be kept in turmoil where there is no tolerance of each others errors, no lenity shown to failings, no meek submission to injuries, no soft answers to turn away any wrath. If you lay a single stick of wood upon the andirons and apply fire to it, it will go out; put on another stick, and they burn; add half a dozen, and you will have a grand conflagration. There are other fires subject to the same conditions. If any member of a family gets into a passion, and is let alone, he will cool down, and will probably get ashamed and repent. But oppose temper to temper; pile on the fuel; draw others into the scrape, and let one harsh word be followed by another, and there will soon be a blaze which will enwrap them all in its lurid splendors. The venerable Philip Henry understood this well, and when his son Matthew, the Commentator, was married, he sent these to wedded pair:

"Love one another, pray oft together, and see
You never both together angry be;
If one speak fire, t'other with water come;
Is one provoked, be t'other soft or dumb."

PEACE AND WAR.

Sir Robert Peel thus expressed the "hope that one great and moral beneficial effect of the advancement of civilization, the diffusion of knowledge and the extension of commerce, will be the reducing within their proper dimensions, the fame, and the merit, and the reward of military achievements, and the juster notions of the moral dignity of, and the moral obligations due to, those who apply themselves to preserve peace and avoid the eclat of war, will be the consequence." In a similar strain, George Washington, the hero of peace, has contrasted the merits of the philanthropist and the warrior. "How much more delightful," says he, "to an undebauched mind, is the task of making improvements on the earth, than all the vain glory which can be obtained from ravaging it by the most uninterrupted course of conquests! How pitiful in the eye of reason and religion, is that false ambition which desolates the world with fire and sword, compared with the mild virtue of making our fellow men as happy as their frail condition and perishable nature will permit them to be." "After much occasion," says Dr. Franklin, "to consider the folly and mischief of a state of warfare, and the little or no advantage obtained even by those nations who have conducted it with the most success, I have been apt to think, there never has been, nor ever will be, any such thing as a good war or a bad peace. All wars are follies—very expensive and very mischievous ones. When will nations be convinced of this, and settle their differences by arbitration? Were they to do it, even by the cast of a die, it would be better than by fighting and destroying each other." The illustrious warrior, Prince Eugene, assures us, "that a military man becomes so sick of blood and crimes in war, that in peace he is averse to re-commence." "I wish," he adds, "that the first minister who is called to decide on peace and war had only seen actual service, what pains would he not take to seek in mediation and compromise, the means of avoiding the effusion of so much blood." "The fabric," says Robert Hall, "of the warrior's fame, is cemented with blood; and if his name is wafted to the ends of the earth it is in the shrill cry of suffering humanity, in the curses and imprecations of those whom his sword has reduced to despair. In reply to a toast given in honour to his victories in India, to his fellow officers in the British army, Sir Harry Smith said, "Gentlemen, ours is a damnable profession. And even Napoleon, in a moment of remorse, after his bloodiest battle, exclaimed—"War is the trade of barbarians!"—North British Review.

Bissexille or Leap Year.

The following, from the Frederick Examiner, will be interesting, no doubt, to many of our readers. Beyond the circle of scientific inquiry, so little attention is paid to chronological exactness, that many intelligent persons will be glad of even a short account and explanation given of the term bissextile.

"In reforming the computation of time, Julius Cæsar ordained that the year should consist of 365 days, except every fourth year, which should consist of 366 days, the additional day to be reckoned by twice counting the 24th of February, which was the sixth calend of March. Hence the name, from the Latin words, bis, twice, and sextilis, sixth. The calends, (whence our word calendar,) or first days of the month, were reckoned backwards to the ides, thus, the first day of March was the first calend; the 28th of February was the second calend of March; February 27th the third, and so on.

"The Julian year, by which this rule was reckoned at 365 days and 6 hours, was found not to be accurate, but to exceed the length of the solar year by 11 minutes, which, in 131 years, amounted to an entire day. It was therefore corrected by Pope Gregory, in 1582, who retrenched 11 days from the Julian computation—being its excess or gain over the solar time. Out of this correction grew the distinction between the old and new style. The Gregorian, or new style, was introduced into Germany in 1770, and, by act of parliament, into England in 1752—just one hundred years ago—the second day of September, (O. S.) of that year, being reckoned as the 14th (N. S.) under the Gregorian system. Although the name Bissextile is retained with its obsolete import, we intercalate the 29th of February every fourth year for leap year, and, for still greater accuracy, make only one leap year out of every four centenary years, that is—the years 1700 and 1800 were not leap years, nor will A. D. 1900 be reckoned as one, but the year 2000 will be Bissextile."—The Friend

RELICS OF AN AGE LONG GONE BY.

☞ The Black River Watchman (S. C.) gives an account of some earthern jars or coffins thrown up by the late flood on the Congaree River, in which were found the bones of some of the aborigines of the country, which must have laid there undisturbed for unknown centuries. Were the dead honored Indian sages, or great warrior chiefs? Alas, who knows, of all that has gone before him, or shall follow after him.

These rude ancestral owners of the land which we inherit desired to be remembered and known by those who should come after them, but their simple efforts have shared the fate of those more mighty, who erected the everlasting pyramids on the banks of Egypt's river.

Alas! what atoms we are.

—The Boston Olive Branch.

"FREEDOM OF EDITORS.—We hear a great deal said in these days about the freedom of the press, by persons who seem to be ignorant of the very meaning of the term. Freedom of the press is supposed by many to be the liberty of every body to print whatever sense or nonsense he sees fit to write, at the expense of the money and reputation of newspaper publishers. While we go for free loin of the press, we also go for freedom of editors."—The True Union

Now —"Now" is the constant syllable ticking from the clock of time. "Now" is the watchword of the wise. "Now" is on the banner of the prudent. Let us keep this little word always in mind; and whenever anything presents itself to us in the shape of work, whether mental or physical, we should do it with all our might, remembering that "Now" is the only time for us. It is indeed a sorry way to get through the world, by putting off till to morrow, saying, "Then" I will do it. No! this will never answer. "Now" is ours; "then" may never be.—The True Union.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.—We copy the following paragraph from the Western Recorder:

"Not the least interesting and significant of the signs which indicate the sure triumph of Baptist principles and practices, is the large number of converts being continually added to our ranks from the ministry of the Pedo-baptist churches.

Within the past eighteen months, at least one hundred and fifty clergymen, connected with the different denominations holding to infant sprinkling and opposed to baptism by immersion, have renounced their error and united with Baptist churches. Is not this fact significant of something? Does it not indicate a tendency in the liberal-minded opposition to seek the light of truth and be made whole!'—The True Union.

A TURKISH WEDDING.

The father, the sister, and some friends of both sexes of the bridegroom's family were gone the day before to town, to fetch the young girl (twelve years old,) and to escort her to her new abode. Strolling leisurely about my garden in the morning of the eventful day, I discovered the bridegroom dressed in his every-day garments, and looking very doleful. I thought some misfortune had occurred to break off the match, and calling Hassan, I asked him what ailed him. "Nothing," answered the lad, opening wildly his large mouth with an intended smile, and winking at me with a knowing look, "nothing—but I am going to get married, and you know"——. Again the winking and the smile, but I understood nothing. Happily, the mother joined us, and, understanding my question, she informed me it was the custom in such like circumstances for the bridegroom to keep himself afar from the whole company, and if met by chance by some one, to look as serious, as sulky, and as shabby as possible. One laugh from him would be reckoned the greatest impropriety, in the world—quite shocking! and, what is still worse, perhaps would lead to the most distressing consequences, as falling under the power of the Evil Eye, being charmed or such things. During the explanation, I saw the lad made great exertions not to burst out in a hearty laugh, and, fearing to call upon his head all sorts of misfortunes, I hastily retreated, promising to come back as soon as the bride made her appearance.

Late in the afternoon, some volleys of musketry announced the expected arrival. I stationed myself upon the narrow foot path that, passing before my house, leads to my neighbor's, and, before long, saw the approaching procession. They were all mounted on horseback. First, the bridegroom's father appeared in his most splendid attire, followed by two ragged boys on foot, who figured as pages. Then the male friends; then the sister of the bridegroom, a young woman recently married, well-looking and rather intelligent; then something which I could not name at first sight, but which I subsequently guessed—by its situation in the cortege, and for the powerful reason that it couldn't be any thing else—to be the bride herself.

What was visible of her was a counterpane carefully wrapping up a sort of huge bull, as we are used to see a great many piled up upon the deck of a merchant ship. The female friends followed; then the music and dancers of the next village; then some men armed with old muskets and carbines, representing the National Guard; and lastly of all, the spectators, men and children, running laughing and shouting, quite as civilized people.

I, too, followed the cavalcade, and arrived at the bridal house just in time to see the young woman's reception. As she stopped her horse, (I rather suppose the horse stopped himself, but never mind,) a little boy of two years old was handed to her. She took hold of him, seated him before her upon the saddle, and taking out from the recesses of the counterpane an apple, gave it to the urchin, who having completed his part, was carried away. It was now the turn of the counterpaned lady to dismount, and I thought the feat rather a remarkable one; but she managed it pretty well, and reached the ground without having greatly disturbed the symmetry of the counterpane's folds. Her future mother-in-law, with some more female friends and connections, were standing at the door, ready to welcome her, and as soon as she advanced, a young boy displayed a carpet before her. Upon this carpet she knelt at her mother-in-law's feet, and remained one moment in a prostrate attitude, as if kissing the threshold of her new home, and acknowledging her filial duty toward her new mother. I had come with no feelings of compunction, and rather to assist at a ludicrous scene than at a solemn one. And yet the sight of that young girl, of a child entering a new life and prostrating herself upon the threshold of it, imploring pity and affection, moved me, and I hastened into the house, where I arrived just in time to see the mother-in-law raising her daughter in her arms, and kissing her with tenderness. Then the young bride was confined to the matron's hands, the outside door was shut upon her, and she was taken into the inner apartments. There a new prostration ensued and a new embrace, but my heart was hardened against melting impulse, and I looked at the second representation, wondering why the first had made such an impression, upon me. I expected to see the young girl disencumbered from her ample folds, but I was mistaken. Notwithstanding the burning temperature of the day, she stood wrapped in her manifold veils—her head, face, neck and shoulders quite covered—sinking under the weight of her dresses, scarfs, ruffles and jewels, in a corner of the room, sobbing and crying with all her might. The ladies dined, the ladies sang and danced, the ladies chatted and were very noisy. Not so with the poor girl, who was silent and did nothing but cry. She was the topic of the conversation; her age, her family, her fortune, and all that concerned her—to the very kisses she had received that very day from her brothers, as stimulous to her courage and fortitude—all was related, discussed and repeated many times; but she seemed scarcely aware of what they said, and took no part whatever in the entertainment.
